Following issuance of the provisional order by the transferring court, a petition must be filed in the accepting court as provided in Section 302(a) [72-5-625(1)]. Notice of that petition must be given to those who would be entitled to notice of an original petition for appointment in both the transferring state and in the accepting state. Section 302(b) [72-5-625(2)]. A hearing must be held only if requested or on the court's own motion. Section 302(c) [72-5-625(3)]. The court must issue a provisional order accepting the case unless it is established that the transfer would be contrary to the incapacitated or protected person's interests or the guardian or conservator is ineligible for appointment in the accepting state. Section 302(d) [72-5-625(4)]. The term "interests" as opposed to "best interests" was chosen because of the strong autonomy values in modern guardianship law. Should the court decline the transfer petition, it may consider a separately brought petition for the appointment of a guardian or issuance of a protective order only if the court has a basis for jurisdiction under Sections 203 [72-5-613] or 204 [72-5-614] other than by reason of the provisional order of transfer. Section 302(h) [72-5-625(8)].

The final steps are largely ministerial. Pursuant to Section 301(f) [72-5-624(6)], the provisional order from the accepting court must be filed in the transferring court. The transferring court will then issue a final order terminating the proceeding, subject to local requirements such as filing of a final report or account and the release of any bond. Pursuant to Section 302(e) [72-5-625(5)], the final order terminating the proceeding in the transferring court must then be filed in the accepting court, which will then convert its provisional order accepting the case into a final order appointing the petitioning guardian or conservator as guardian or conservator in the accepting state.

Because guardianship and conservatorship law and practice will likely differ between the two states, the court in the accepting state must within 90 days after issuance of a final order determine whether the guardianship or conservatorship needs to be modified to conform to the law of the accepting state. Section 302(f) [72-5-625(6)]. The number "90" is placed in brackets to encourage states to coordinate this time limit with the time limits for other required filings such as guardianship or conservatorship plans. This initial period in the accepting state is also an appropriate time to change the guardian or conservator if there is a more appropriate person to act as guardian or conservator in the accepting state. The drafters specifically did not try to design the procedures in Article 3 [72-5-624 and 72-5-625] for the difficult problems that can arise in connection with a transfer when the guardian or conservator is ineligible to act in the second state, a circumstance that can occur when a financial institution is acting as conservator or a government agency is acting as guardian. Rather, the procedures in Article 3 [72-5-624 and 72-5-625] are designed for the typical case where the guardian or conservator is legally eligible to act in the second state. Should that particular guardian or conservator not be the best person to act in the accepting state, a change of guardian or conservator can be initiated once the transfer has been secured.

The transfer procedure in this article responds to numerous problems that have arisen in connection with attempted transfers under the existing law of most states. Sometimes a court will dismiss a case on the assumption a proceeding will be brought in another state, but such proceeding is never filed. Sometimes a court will refuse to dismiss a case until the court in the other state accepts the matter, but the court in the other state refuses to consider the petition until the already existing guardianship or conservatorship has been terminated. Oftentimes the court will conclude that it is without jurisdiction to make an appointment until the respondent is physically present in the state, a problem which Section 204(a)(3) [72-5-614(1)(c)] addresses by granting a court special jurisdiction to consider a petition to accept a proceeding from another state. But the most serious problem is the need to prove the case in the second state from scratch, including proving the respondent's incapacity and the choice of guardian or conservator. Article 3 [72-5-624 and 72-5-625] eliminates this problem. Section 302(g) [72-5-625(7)] requires that the court accepting the case recognize a guardianship or conservatorship order from the other state, including the determination of the incapacitated or protected person's incapacity and the appointment of the guardian or conservator, if otherwise eligible to act in the accepting state.

ARTICLE 4 [72-5-629 through 72-5-631] REGISTRATION AND RECOGNITION OF ORDERS FROM OTHER STATES

General Comment

Article 4 [72-5-629 through 72-5-631] is designed to facilitate the enforcement of guardianship and protective orders in other states. This article does not make distinctions among the types of orders that can be enforced. This article is applicable whether the guardianship or conservatorship is full or limited. While some states have expedited procedures for sales of real estate by conservators appointed in other states, few states have enacted statutes dealing with enforcement of guardianship orders, such as when a care facility questions the authority of a guardian appointed in another state. Sometimes, these sorts of refusals necessitate that the proceeding be transferred to the other state or that an entirely new petition be filed, problems that could often be avoided if guardianship and protective orders were entitled to recognition in other states.

Article 4 [72-5-629 through 72-5-631] provides for such recognition. The key concept is registration. Section 401 [72-5-629] provides for registration of guardianship orders, and Section 402 [72-5-630)] for registration of protective orders. Following registration of the order in the appropriate county of the other state, and after giving notice to the appointing court of the intent to register the order in the other state, Section 403 [72-5-631] authorizes the guardian or conservator to thereafter exercise all powers authorized in the order of appointment except as prohibited under the laws of the registering state.

The drafters of the Act concluded that the registration of certified copies provides sufficient protection and that it was not necessary to mandate the filing of authenticated copies.

72-5-601. Short title.

Official Comments

The title to the Act succinctly describes the Act's scope. The Act applies only to court jurisdiction and related topics for adults for whom the appointment of a guardian or conservator or other protective order is being sought or has been issued.

The drafting committee elected to limit the Act to adults for two reasons. First, jurisdictional issues concerning guardians for minors are subsumed by the Uniform Child Custody Jurisdiction and Enforcement Act (1997) [see Title 40, ch. 7]. Second, while the UCCJEA does not address conservatorship and other issues involving the property of minors, all of the problems and concerns that led the Uniform Law Commission to appoint a drafting committee involved adults.

72-5-602. Definitions.

Official Comments

The definition of "adult" (paragraph (1)) would exclude an emancipated minor. The Act is not designed to supplant the local substantive law on guardianship. States whose guardianship law treats emancipated minors as adults may wish to modify this definition.

Three of the other definitions are standard uniform law terms. These are the definitions of "person" (paragraph (8)), "record" (paragraph (12)), and "state" (paragraph (14)). Two are common procedural terms. The individual for whom a guardianship or protective order is sought is a "respondent" (paragraph (13)). A person who may participate in a guardianship or protective proceeding is referred to as a "party" (paragraph (7)).

The remaining definitions refer to standard guardianship terminology used in a majority of states. A "guardian" (paragraph (3)) is appointed in a "guardianship order" (paragraph (4)) which is issued as part of a "guardianship proceeding" (paragraph (5)) and which authorizes the guardian to make decisions regarding the person of an "incapacitated person" (paragraph (6)). A "conservator" (paragraph (2)) is appointed pursuant to a "protective order" (paragraph (10)) which is issued as part of a "protective proceeding" (paragraph (11)) and which authorizes the conservator to manage the property of a "protected person" (paragraph (9)).

In most states, a protective order may be issued by the court without the appointment of a conservator. For example, under the Uniform Guardianship and Protective Proceedings Act, the court may authorize a so-called single transaction for the security, service, or care meeting the foreseeable needs of the protected person, including the payment, delivery, deposit, or retention of property; sale, mortgage, lease, or other transfer of property; purchase of an annuity; making a contract for life care, deposit contract, or contract for training and education; and the creation of or addition to a suitable trust. UGPPA (1997) §412(1). It is for this reason that the Act contains frequent references to the broader category of protective orders. Where the Act is intended to apply only to conservatorships, such as in Article 3 [72-5-624 and 72-5-625] dealing with transfers of proceedings to other states, the Act refers to conservatorship and not to the broader category of protective proceeding.

The Act does not limit the types of conservatorships or guardianships to which the Act applies. The Act applies whether the conservatorship or guardianship is denominated as plenary, limited, temporary or emergency. The Act, however, would not ordinarily apply to a guardian ad litem, who is ordinarily appointed by the court to represent a person or conduct an investigation in a specified legal proceeding.

Section 102 [72-5-602] is not the sole definitional section in the Act. Section 201 [72-5-611] contains definitions of important terms used only in Article 2 [72-5-611 through 72-5-619]. These are the definitions of "emergency" (Section 201(1) [72-5-611(1)(a)]), "home state" (Section 201(2) [72-5-611(1)(b)]), and "significant-connection state" (Section 201(3) [72-5-611(1)(c)]).

72-5-603. International application.

Official Comments

This section addresses application of the Act to guardianship and protective orders issued in other countries. A foreign order is not enforceable pursuant to the registration procedures of Article 4 [72-5-629 through 72-5-631], but a court in this country may otherwise apply this Act to a foreign proceeding as if the foreign country were an American state. Consequently, a court may conclude that the court in the foreign country has jurisdiction because it constitutes the respondent's "home state" or "significant-connection state" and may therefore decline to exercise jurisdiction on the ground that the court of the foreign country has a higher priority under Section 203 [72-5-613]. Or the court may treat the foreign country as if it were a state of the United States for purposes of applying the transfer provisions of Article 3 [72-5-624 and 72-5-625].

This section addresses similar issues to but differs in result from Section 105 of the Uniform Child Custody Jurisdiction and Enforcement Act (1997) [see Title 40, ch. 7]. Under the UCCJEA, the United States court must honor a custody order issued by the court of a foreign country if the order was issued under factual circumstances in substantial conformity with the jurisdictional standards of the UCCJEA. Only if the child custody law violates fundamental principles of human rights is enforcement excused. Because guardianship regimes vary so greatly around the world, particularly in civil law countries, it was concluded that under this Act a more flexible approach was needed. Under this Act, a court may but is not required to recognize the foreign order.

The fact that a guardianship or protective order of a foreign country cannot be enforced pursuant to the registration procedures of Article 4 [72-5-629 through 72-5-631] does not preclude enforcement by the court under some other provision or rule of law.

72-5-604. Communication between courts.

Official Comments

This section emphasizes the importance of communications among courts with an interest in a particular matter. Most commonly, this would include communication between courts of different states to resolve an issue of which court has jurisdiction to proceed under Article 2 [72-5-611 through 72-5-619]. It would also include communication between courts of different states to facilitate the transfer of a guardianship or conservatorship to a different state under Article 3 [72-5-624 and 72-5-625]. Communication can occur in a variety of ways, including by electronic means. This section does not prescribe the use of any particular means of communication.

The court may authorize the parties to participate in the communication. But the Act does not mandate participation or require that the court give the parties notice of any communication. Communication between courts is often difficult to schedule and participation by the parties may be impractical. Phone calls or electronic communications often have to be made after-hours or whenever the schedules of judges allow. When issuing a jurisdictional or transfer order, the court should set forth the extent to which a communication with another court may have been a factor in the decision.

This section includes brackets around the language relating to whether a record must be made of any communication with the court of the other state. As indicated by the Legislative Note to this section, the language is bracketed because of a concern in some states that a legislative enactment directing when a court must make a record in a judicial proceeding may violate the doctrine on separation of powers. The language is not bracketed because the drafters concluded that the making of a record is not important. Rather, if concerns about separation of powers leads to the deletion of the bracketed language, the enacting state is encouraged to achieve the objectives of the bracketed language by promulgating a comparable provision by judicial rule.

This section does not prescribe the extent of the record that the court must make, leaving that issue to the court. A record might include notes or transcripts of a court reporter who listened to a conference call between the courts, an electronic recording of a telephone call, a memorandum summarizing a conversation, and email communications. No record need be made of relatively inconsequential matters such as scheduling, calendars, and court records.

Section 110 of the Uniform Child Custody Jurisdiction and Enforcement Act (1997) [see Title 40, ch. 7] addresses similar issues as this section but is more detailed. As is the case with several other provisions of this Act, the drafters of this Act concluded that the more varied circumstances of adult guardianship and protective proceedings suggested a need for greater flexibility.

72-5-605. Cooperation between courts.

Official Comments

Subsection (a) [(1)] of this section is similar to Section 112(a) of the Uniform Child Custody Jurisdiction and Enforcement Act (1997) [see Title 40, ch. 7], although modified to address issues of concern in adult guardianship and protective proceedings and with the addition of subsection (a)(7) [(1)(g)], which addresses the release of health information protected under HIPAA. Subsection (b) [(2)], which clarifies that a court has jurisdiction to respond to requests for assistance from courts in other states even though it might otherwise not have jurisdiction over the proceeding, is not found in although probably implicit in the UCCJEA.

Court cooperation is essential to the success of this Act. This section is designed to facilitate such court cooperation. It provides mechanisms for courts to cooperate with each other in order to decide cases in an efficient manner without causing undue expense to the parties. Courts may request assistance from courts of other states and may assist courts of other states. Typically, such assistance will be requested to resolve a jurisdictional issue arising under Article 2 [72-5-611 through 72-5-619] or an issue concerning a transfer proceeding under Article 3 [72-5-624 and 72-5-625].

This section does not address assessment of costs and expenses, leaving that issue to local law. Should a court have acquired jurisdiction because of a party's unjustifiable conduct, Section 207(b) [72-5-617(2)] authorizes the court to assess against the party all costs and expenses, including attorney's fees.

72-5-606. Taking testimony in another state.

Official Comments

This section is similar to Section 111 of the Uniform Child Custody Jurisdiction and Enforcement Act (1997) [see Title 40, ch. 7]. That section was in turn derived from Section 316 of the Uniform Interstate Family Support Act (1992) and the much earlier and now otherwise obsolete Uniform Interstate and International Procedure Act (1962).

This section is designed to fill the vacuum that often exists in cases involving an adult with interstate contacts when much of the essential information about the individual is located in another state.

Subsection (a) [(1)] empowers the court to initiate the gathering of out-of-state evidence, including depositions, written interrogatories and other discovery devices. The authority granted to the court in no way precludes the gathering of out-of-state evidence by a party, including the taking of depositions out-of-state.

Subsections (b) [(2)] and (c) [(3)] clarify that modern modes of communication are permissible for the taking of depositions and receipt of documents into evidence. A state that has adequate exceptions to its best evidence rule to permit the introduction of evidence transmitted by facsimile or in electronic form should delete subsection (c) [(3)], which has been placed in brackets for this reason.

This section is consistent with and complementary to the Uniform Interstate Depositions and Discovery Act (2007), which specifies the procedure for taking depositions in other states.

72-5-611. Definitions — significant connection factors.

Official Comments

The terms "emergency," "home state," and "significant-connection state" are defined in this section and not in Section 102 [72-5-602] because they are used only in Article 2 [72-5-611 through 72-5-619].

The definition of "emergency" (subsection (a)(1) [(1)(a)]) is taken from the emergency guardianship provision of the Uniform Guardianship and Protective Proceedings Act (1997), Section 312.

Pursuant to Section 204 [72-5-614] of this Act, a court has jurisdiction to appoint a guardian in an emergency for a period of up to 90 days even though it does not otherwise have jurisdiction. However, the emergency appointment is subject to the direction of the court in the respondent's home state. Pursuant to Section 204(b) [72-5-614(2)], the emergency proceeding must be dismissed at the request of the court in the respondent's home state.

Appointing a guardian in an emergency should be an unusual event. Although most states have emergency guardianship statutes, not all states do, and in those states that do have such statutes, there is great variation on whether and how an emergency is defined. To provide some uniformity on when a court acquires emergency jurisdiction, the drafters of this Act concluded that adding a definition of emergency was essential. The definition does not preclude an enacting jurisdiction from appointing a guardian under an emergency guardianship statute with a different or broader test of emergency if the court otherwise has jurisdiction to make an appointment under Section 203 [72-5-613].

Pursuant to Section 203 [72-5-613], a court in the respondent's home state has primary jurisdiction to appoint a guardian or issue a protective order. A court in a significant-connection state has jurisdiction if the respondent does not have a home state and in other circumstances specified in Section 203 [72-5-613]. The definitions of "home state" and "significant-connection state" are therefore important to an understanding of the Act.

The definition of "home state" (subsection (a)(2) [(1)(b)]) is derived from but differs in a couple of respects from the definition of the same term in Section 102 of the Uniform Child Custody Jurisdiction and Enforcement Act (1997) [see Title 40, ch. 7]. First, unlike the definition in the UCCJEA, the definition in this Act clarifies that actual physical presence is necessary. The UCCJEA definition instead focuses on where the child has "lived" for the prior six months. Basing the test on where someone has "lived" may imply that the term "home state" is similar to the concept of domicile. Domicile, in an adult guardianship context, is a vague concept that can easily lead to claims of jurisdiction by courts in more than one state. Second, under the UCCJEA, home state jurisdiction continues for six months following physical removal from the state and the state has ceased to be the actual home. Under this Act, the six-month tail is incorporated directly into the definition of home state. The place where the respondent was last physically present for six months continues as the home state for six months following physical removal from the state. This modification of the UCCJEA definition eliminates the need to refer to the six-month tail each time home state jurisdiction is mentioned in the Act.

The definition of "significant-connection state" (subsection (a)(3) [(1)(c)]) is similar to Section 201(a)(2) of the Uniform Child Custody Jurisdiction and Enforcement Act (1997) [see Title 40, ch. 7]. However, subsection (b) [(2)] of this Section adds a list of factors relevant to adult guardianship and protective proceedings to aid the court in deciding whether a particular place is a significant-connection state. Under Section 301(e)(1) [72-5-624(5)(a)], the significant connection factors listed in the definition are to be taken into account in determining whether a conservatorship may be transferred to another state.

72-5-612. Exclusive basis.

Official Comments

Similar to Section 201(b) of the Uniform Child Custody Jurisdiction and Enforcement Act (1997) [see Title 40, ch. 7], which provides that the UCCJEA is the exclusive basis for determining jurisdiction to issue a child custody order, this section provides that this article is the exclusive jurisdictional basis for determining jurisdiction to appoint a guardian or issue a protective order for an adult. An enacting jurisdiction will therefore need to repeal any existing provisions addressing jurisdiction in guardianship and protective proceedings cases. A Legislative Note to Section 503 provides guidance on which provisions need to be repealed or amended. The drafters of this Act concluded that limiting the Act to "interstate" cases was unworkable. Such cases are hard to define, but even if they could be defined, overlaying this Act onto a state's existing jurisdictional rules would leave too many gaps and inconsistencies. In addition, if the particular case is truly local, the local court would likely have jurisdiction under both this Act as well as under prior law.

72-5-613. Jurisdiction.

Official Comments

Similar to the Uniform Child [Custody] Jurisdiction and Enforcement Act (1997) [see Title 40, ch. 7], this Act creates a three-level priority for determining which state has jurisdiction to appoint a guardian or issue a protective order; the home state (defined in Section 201(a)(2) [72-5-611(1)(b)]), followed by a significant-connection state (defined in Section 201(a)(3) [72-5-611(1)(c)]), followed by other jurisdictions. The principal objective of this section is to eliminate the possibility of dual appointments or orders except for the special circumstances specified in Section 204 [72-5-614].

While this section is the principal provision for determining whether a particular court has jurisdiction to appoint a guardian or issue a protective order, it is not the only provision. As indicated in the cross-reference in Section 203(4) [72-5-613(4)], a court that does not otherwise have jurisdiction under Section 203 [72-5-613] may have jurisdiction under the special circumstances specified in Section 204 [72-5-614].

Pursuant to Section 203(1) [72-5-613(1)], the home state has primary jurisdiction to appoint a guardian or conservator or issue another type of protective order. This jurisdiction terminates if the state ceases to be the home state, if a court of the home state declines to exercise jurisdiction under Section 206 [72-5-616] on the basis that another state is a more appropriate forum, or, as provided in Section 205 [72-5-615], a court of another state has appointed a guardian or issued a protective order consistent with this Act. The standards by which a home state that has enacted the Act may decline jurisdiction on the basis that another state is a more appropriate forum are specified in Section 206 [72-5-616]. Should the home state not have enacted the Act, Section 203(1) [72-5-613(1)] does not require that the declination meet the standards of Section 206 [72-5-616].

Once a petition is filed in a court of the respondent's home state, that state does not cease to be the respondent's home state upon the passage of time even though it may be many months before an appointment is made or order issued and during that period the respondent is physically located. Only upon dismissal of the petition can the court cease to be the home state due to the passage of time. Under the definition of "home state," the six-month physical presence requirement is fulfilled or not on the date the petition is filed. See Section 201(a)(2) [72-5-611(1)(b)].

A significant-connection state has jurisdiction under two possible bases; Section 203(2)(A) [72-5-613(2)(a)] and Section 203(2)(B) [72-5-613(2)(b)]. Under Section 203(2)(A) [72-5-613(2)(a)], a significant-connection state has jurisdiction if the individual does not have a home state or if the home state has declined jurisdiction on the basis that the significant-connection state is a more appropriate forum.

Section 203(2)(B) [72-5-613(2)(b)] is designed to facilitate consideration of cases where jurisdiction is not in dispute. Section 203(2)(B) [72-5-613(2)(b)] allows a court in a significant-connection state to exercise jurisdiction even though the respondent has a home state and the home state has not declined jurisdiction. The significant-connection state may assume jurisdiction under these circumstances, however, only in situations where the parties are not in disagreement concerning which court should hear the case. Jurisdiction may not be exercised by a significant-connection state under Section 203(2)(B) [72-5-613(2)(b)] if (1) a petition has already been filed and is still pending in the home state or other significant-connection state; or (2) prior to making the appointment or issuing the order, a petition is filed in the respondent's home state or an objection to the court's jurisdiction is filed by a person required to be notified of the proceeding. Additionally, the court in the significant-connection state must conclude that it is an appropriate forum applying the factors listed in Section 206 [72-5-616].

There is nothing comparable to Section 203(2)(B) in the Uniform Child Custody Jurisdiction and Enforcement Act (1997) [see Title 40, ch. 7]. Under Section 201 of the UCCJEA a court in a significant-connection state acquires jurisdiction only if the child does not have a home state or the court of that state has declined jurisdiction. The drafters of this Act concluded that cases involving adults differed sufficiently from child custody matters that a different rule is appropriate for adult proceedings in situations where jurisdiction is uncontested.

Pursuant to Section 203(3) [72-5-613(3)], a court in a state that is neither the home state or a significant-connection state has jurisdiction if the home state and all significant-connection states have declined jurisdiction or the respondent does not have a home state or significant-connection state. The state must have some connection with the proceeding, however. As Section 203(a)(3) [72-5-613(a)(3)] clarifies, jurisdiction in the state must be consistent with the state and United States constitutions.

72-5-614. Special jurisdiction.

Official Comments

This section lists the special circumstances where a court without jurisdiction under the general rule of Section 203 [72-5-613] has jurisdiction for limited purposes. The three purposes are (1) the appointment of a guardian in an emergency for a term not exceeding 90 days for a respondent who is physically located in the state (subsection (a)(1) [(1)(a)]); (2) the issuance of a protective order for a respondent who owns an interest in real or tangible personal property located in the state (subsection (a)(2) [(1)(b)]); and (3) the grant of jurisdiction to consider a petition requesting the transfer of a guardianship or conservatorship proceeding from another state (subsection (a)(3) [(1)(c)]). If the court has jurisdiction under Section 203 [72-5-613], reference to Section 204 [72-5-614] is unnecessary. The general jurisdiction granted under Section 203 [72-5-613] includes within it all of the special circumstances specified in this section.

When an emergency arises, action must often be taken on the spot in the place where the respondent happens to be physically located at the time. This place may not necessarily be located in the respondent's home state or even a significant-connection state. Subsection (a)(1) [(1)(a)] assures that the court where the respondent happens to be physically located at the time has jurisdiction to appoint a guardian in an emergency but only for a limited period of 90 days. The time limit is placed in brackets to signal that enacting states may substitute the time period under their existing emergency guardianship procedures. As provided in subsection (b) [(2)], the emergency jurisdiction is also subject to the authority of the court in the respondent's home state to request that the emergency proceeding be dismissed. The theory here is that the emergency appointment in the temporary location should not be converted into a de facto permanent appointment through repeated temporary appointments.

"Emergency" is specifically defined in Section 201(a)(1) [72-5-611(1)(a)]. Because of the great variation among the states on how an emergency is defined and its important role in conferring jurisdiction, the drafters of this Act concluded that adding a uniform definition of emergency was essential. The definition does not preclude an enacting jurisdiction from appointing a guardian under an emergency guardianship statute with a different or broader test of emergency if the court otherwise has jurisdiction to make an appointment under Section 203 [72-5-613].

Subsection (a)(2) [(1)((b)] grants a court jurisdiction to issue a protective order with respect to real and tangible personal property located in the state even though the court does not otherwise have jurisdiction. Such orders are most commonly issued when a conservator has been appointed but the protected person owns real property located in another state. The drafters specifically rejected using a general reference to any property located in the state because of the tendency of some courts to issue protective orders with respect to intangible personal property such as a bank account where the technical situs of the asset may have little relationship to the protected person.

Subsection (a)(3) [(1)(c)] is closely related to and is necessary for the effectiveness of Article 3 [72-5-624 and 72-5-625], which addresses transfer of a guardianship or conservatorship to another state. A "Catch-22" arises frequently in such cases. The court in the transferring state will not allow the incapacitated or protected person to move and will not terminate the case until the court in the transferee state has accepted the matter. But the court in the transferee state will not accept the case until the incapacitated or protected person has physically moved and presumably become a resident of the transferee state. Subsection (a)(3) [(1)(c)], which grants the court in the transferee state limited jurisdiction to consider a petition requesting transfer of a proceeding form another state, is intended to unlock the stalemate.

Not included in this section but a provision also conferring special jurisdiction on the court is Section 105(b) [72-5-605(2)], which grants the court jurisdiction to respond to a request for assistance from a court of another state.

72-5-615. Exclusive and continuing jurisdiction.

Official Comments

While this Act relies heavily on the Uniform Child [Custody] Jurisdiction and Enforcement Act (1997) [see Title 40, ch. 7] for many basic concepts, the identity is not absolute. Section 202 of the UCCJEA specifies a variety of circumstances whereby a court can lose jurisdiction based on loss of physical presence by the child and others, loss of a significant connection, or unavailability of substantial evidence. Section 203 of the UCCJEA addresses the jurisdiction of the court to modify a custody determination made in another state. Nothing comparable to either UCCJEA section is found in this Act. Under this Act, a guardianship or protective order may be modified only upon request to the court that made the appointment or issued the order, which retains exclusive and continuing jurisdiction over the proceeding. Unlike child custody matters, guardianships and protective proceedings are ordinarily subject to continuing court supervision. Allowing the court's jurisdiction to terminate other than by its own order would open the possibility of competing guardianship or conservatorship appointments in different states for the same person at the same time, the problem under current law that enactment of this Act is designed to avoid. Should the incapacitated or protected person and others with an interest in the proceeding relocate to a different state, the appropriate remedy is to seek transfer of the proceeding to the other state as provided in Article 3 [72-5-624 and 72-5-625].

The exclusive and continuing jurisdiction conferred by this section only applies to guardianship orders made and protective orders issued under Section 203 [72-5-613]. Orders made under the special jurisdiction conferred by Section 204 [72-5-614] are not exclusive. And as provided in Section 204(b) [72-5-614(2)], the jurisdiction of a court in a state other than the home state to appoint a guardian in an emergency is subject to the right of a court in the home state to request that the proceeding be dismissed and any appointment terminated.

Article 3 [72-5-624 and 72-5-625] authorizes a guardian or conservator to petition to transfer the proceeding to another state. Upon the conclusion of the transfer, the court in the accepting state will appoint the guardian or conservator as guardian or conservator in the accepting state and the court in the transferring estate will terminate the local proceeding, whereupon the jurisdiction of the transferring court terminates and the court in the accepting state acquires exclusive and continuing jurisdiction as provided in Section 205 [72-5-615].

72-5-616. Appropriate forum.

Official Comments

This section authorizes a court otherwise having jurisdiction to decline jurisdiction on the basis that a court in another state is in a better position to make a guardianship or protective order determination. The effect of a declination of jurisdiction under this section is to rearrange the priorities specified in Section 203 [72-5-613]. A court of the home state may decline in favor of a court of a significant-connection or other state and a court in a significant-connection state may decline in favor of a court in another significant-connection or other state. The court declining jurisdiction may either dismiss or stay the proceeding. The court may also impose any condition the court considers just and proper, including the condition that a petition for the appointment of a guardian or issuance of a protective order be filed promptly in another state.

This section is similar to Section 207 of the Uniform Child Custody Jurisdiction and Enforcement Act (1997) [see Title 40, ch. 7] except that the factors in Section 206(c) [72-5-616(c)] of this Act have been adapted to address issues most commonly encountered in adult guardianship and protective proceedings as opposed to child custody determinations.

Under Section 203(2)(B) [72-5-613(2)(b)], the factors specified in subsection (c) [(3)] of this section are to be employed in determining whether a court of a significant-connection state may assume jurisdiction when a petition has not been filed in the respondent's home state or in another significant-connection state. Under Section 207(a)(3)(B) [72-5-617(1)(c)(ii)], the court is to consider these factors in deciding whether it will retain jurisdiction when unjustifiable conduct has occurred.

72-5-617. Jurisdiction declined by reason of conduct.

Official Comments

This section is similar to the Section 208 of the Uniform Child Custody Jurisdiction and Enforcement Act (1997) [see Title 40, ch. 7]. Like the UCCJEA, this Act does not attempt to define "unjustifiable conduct," concluding that this issue is best left to the courts. However, a common example could include the unauthorized removal of an adult to another state, with that state acquiring emergency jurisdiction under Section 204 [72-5-614] immediately upon the move and home state jurisdiction under Section 203 [72-5-613] six months following the move if a petition for a guardianship or protective order is not filed during the interim in the soon-to-be former home state. Although child custody cases frequently raise different issues than do adult guardianship matters, the element of unauthorized removal is encountered in both types of proceedings. For the caselaw on unjustifiable conduct under the predecessor Uniform Child Custody Jurisdiction Act (1968), see David Carl Minneman, Parties' Misconduct as Grounds for Declining Jurisdiction Under §8 of the Uniform Child Custody Jurisdiction Act (UCCJA), 16 A.L.R. 5th 650 (1993).

Subsection (a) [(1)] gives the court authority to fashion an appropriate remedy when it has acquired jurisdiction because of unjustifiable conduct. The court may decline to exercise jurisdiction; exercise jurisdiction for the limited purpose of fashioning an appropriate remedy to ensure the health, safety, and welfare of the respondent or the protection of the respondent's property or prevent a repetition of the unjustifiable conduct; or continue to exercise jurisdiction after considering several specified factors. Under subsection (a) [(1)], the unjustifiable conduct need not have been committed by a party.

Subsection (b) [(2)] authorizes a court to assess costs and expenses, including attorney's fees, against a party whose unjustifiable conduct caused the court to acquire jurisdiction. Subsection

(b) [(2)] applies only if the unjustifiable conduct was committed by a party and allows for costs and expenses to be assessed only against that party. Similar to Section 208 of the UCCJEA, the court may not assess fees, costs, or expenses of any kind against this state or a governmental subdivision, agency, or instrumentality of the state unless authorized by other law.

72-5-618. Notice of proceeding.

Official Comments

While this Act tries not to interfere with a state's underlying substantive law on guardianship and protective proceedings, the issue of notice is fundamental. Under this section, when a proceeding is brought other than in the respondent's home state, the petitioner must give notice in the method provided under local law not only to those entitled to notice under local law but also to the persons required to be notified were the proceeding brought in the respondent's home state. Frequently, the respective lists of persons to be notified will be the same. But where the lists are different, notice under this section will assure that someone with a right to assert that the home state has a primary right to jurisdiction will have the opportunity to make that assertion.

72-5-619. Proceedings in more than one state.

Official Comments

Similar to Section 206 of the Uniform Child Custody Jurisdiction and Enforcement Act (1997) [see Title 40, ch. 7], this section addresses the issue of which court has the right to proceed when proceedings for the same respondent are brought in more than one state. The provisions of this section, however, have been tailored to the needs of adult guardianship and protective proceedings and the particular jurisdictional provisions of this Act. Emergency guardianship appointments and protective proceedings with respect to property in other states (Sections 204(a)(1) and (a)(2) [72-5-614(1)(a) and (1)(b)]) are excluded from this section because the need for dual appointments is frequent in these cases; for example, a petition will be brought in the respondent's home state but emergency action will be necessary in the place where the respondent is temporarily located, or a petition for the appointment of a conservator will be brought in the respondent's home state but real estate located in some other state needs to be brought under management.

Under the Act only one court in which a petition is pending will have jurisdiction under Section 203 [72-5-613]. If a petition is brought in the respondent's home state, that court has jurisdiction over that of any significant-connection or other state. If the petition is first brought in a significant-connection state, that jurisdiction will be lost if a petition is later brought in the home state prior to an appointment or issuance of an order in the significant-connection state. Jurisdiction will also be lost in the significant-connection state if the respondent has a home state and an objection is filed in the significant-connection state that jurisdiction is properly in the home state. If petitions are brought in two significant-connection states, the first state has a right to proceed over that of the second state, and if a petition is brought in any other state, any claim to jurisdiction of that state is subordinate to that of the home state and all significant-connection states.

Under this section, if the court has jurisdiction under Section 203 [72-5-613], it has the right to proceed unless a court of another state acquires jurisdiction prior to the first court making an appointment or issuing a protective order. If the court does not have jurisdiction under Section 203 [72-5-613], it must defer to the court with jurisdiction unless that court determines that the court in this state is the more appropriate forum and it thereby acquires jurisdiction. While the rules are straightforward, factual issues can arise as to which state is the home state or significant-connection state. Consequently, while under Section 203 [72-5-613] there will almost always be a court having jurisdiction to proceed, reliance on the communication, court cooperation, and evidence gathering provisions of Sections 104-106 [72-5-104 through 72-5-106] will sometimes be necessary to determine which court that might be.

72-5-638. Transitional provision.

Official Comments

This Act applies retroactively to guardianships and conservatorships in existence on the effective date. The guardian or conservator appointed prior to the effective date of the Act may petition to transfer the proceeding to another state under Article 3 [72-5-624 and 72-5-625] and register and enforce the order in other states pursuant to Article 4 [72-5-629 through 72-5-631]. The jurisdictional provisions of Article 2 [72-5-611 through 72-5-619] also apply to proceedings begun on or after the effective date. What the Act does not do is change the jurisdictional rules midstream for petitions filed prior to the effective date for which an appointment has not been made or order issued as of the effective date. Jurisdiction in such cases is governed by prior law. Nor does the Act affect the validity of already existing appointments even though the court might not have had jurisdiction had this Act been in effect at the time the appointment was made.

NONPROBATE TRANSFERS ON DEATH

Chapter Official Comments

PREFATORY NOTE

This amendment of Uniform Probate Code Article VI (nonprobate transfers) replaces former Article VI with a revised article. Part 1 (provisions relating to effect of death) of the revised article is amended and relocated from former Part 2. Part 2 (multiple-person accounts) of the revised article is amended and relocated from former Part 1. Part 3 (Uniform TOD Security Registration Act) of the revised article is new. This reorganization allows for general provisions at the beginning of the article, and permits parts to be divided into subparts that group related provisions together.

Multiple-Person Accounts

The amendment of Part 2 (multiple-person accounts) of the revised article simplifies drafting and terminology. It consolidates treatment of POD accounts and trust accounts so that the same rules apply to both, since both types of account operate identically and serve the same function of passing property to a beneficiary at the death of the account owner. The amendment likewise eliminates references to "joint" accounts, since the statute treats joint tenancy accounts and tenancy in common accounts the same for all purposes other than survivorship. Other terminological and drafting simplifications and standardizations are made throughout the statute. Treatment of existing accounts is included.

The amendment makes a few substantive changes in rules previously established in the multiple-person account statute. The changes include recognition of checks issued by an account owner before death and presented for payment after death, revision of the creditor rights procedure to enable a survivor or beneficiary to spread the burden among survivors and beneficiaries of other accounts of the decedent and to provide a uniform one-year limitation period for creditors, and a provision that a financial institution must have received notice at the appropriate office and have had a reasonable time to act before it is charged with knowledge that any change in account circumstances has occurred. A provision is also added that on the death of a married person, beneficial ownership of the decedent's share in a survivorship account passes to the surviving spouse who is an account party in preference to other surviving account parties.

The amendment includes a number of important improvements designed to make multiple-person accounts more useful. An agency designation is authorized to enable an account owner to add another person to the account as a convenience in making withdrawals without creating any ownership or survivorship interest in the person identified as an agent. Optional statutory forms for multiple-person accounts are provided for the convenience and protection of financial institutions. Payment to a minor who is an account beneficiary is authorized pursuant to the Uniform Transfers to Minors Act. A provision is added to make clear that marital funds deposited in an account retain any community property incidents, and the law governing tenancy by the entireties is preserved where applicable.

The drafting committee believes that this amendment of the multiple-person account statute is a substantial improvement in an already successful law. This part of the Uniform Probate Code is one of the most broadly accepted, having been adopted either as part of the code or independently by over half the states. This amendment draws on useful improvements made by various states that have enacted the statute, and should make the statute even more attractive.

Uniform TOD Security Registration Act

The purpose of Part 3 (Uniform TOD Security Registration Act) of the revised article is to allow the owner of securities to register the title in transfer-on-death (TOD) form. Mutual fund shares and accounts maintained by brokers and others to reflect a customer's holdings of securities (so-called "street accounts") are also covered. The legislation enables an issuer, transfer agent, broker, or other such intermediary to transfer the securities directly to the designated transferee on the owner's death. Thus, TOD registration achieves for securities a certain parity with existing TOD and pay-on-death (POD) facilities for bank deposits and other assets passing at death outside the probate process.

The TOD registration under this part is designed to give the owner of securities who wishes to arrange for a nonprobate transfer at death an alternative to the frequently troublesome joint tenancy form of title. Because joint tenancy registration of securities normally entails a sharing of lifetime entitlement and control, it works satisfactorily only so long as the co-owners cooperate. Difficulties arise when co-owners fall into disagreement, or when one becomes afflicted or insolvent.

Use of the TOD registration form encouraged by this legislation has no effect on the registered owner's full control of the affected security during his or her lifetime. A TOD designation and any beneficiary interest arising under the designation ends whenever the registered asset is transferred, or whenever the owner otherwise complies with the issuer's conditions for changing the title form of the investment. The part recognizes, in Section 6-302 [72-6-302], that co-owners with right of survivorship may be registered as owners together with a TOD beneficiary designated to take if the registration remains unchanged until the beneficiary survives the joint owners. In such a case, the survivor of the joint owners has full control of the asset and may change the registration form as he or she sees fit after the other's death.

Implementation of the part is wholly optional with issuers. The drafting committee received the benefit of considerable advice and assistance from representatives of the mutual fund and stock transfer industries during the course of its three years of preparatory work. Accordingly, it is believed that this part takes full account of the practical requirements for efficient transfer within the securities industry.

Section 6-303 [72-6-303] invites application of the legislation to locally owned securities though the statute may not have been locally enacted, so long as the part or similar legislation is in force in a jurisdiction of the issuer or transfer agent. Thus, if the principal jurisdictions in which securities issuers and transfer agents are sited enact the measure, its benefits will become generally available to persons domiciled in states that do not at once enact the statute.

The legislation has been drafted as a separate part, hence not interpolated as an expansion of the former UPC Article VI, Part 1, treating bank accounts ("multiple-party accounts"). Securities merit a distinct statutory regime, because a different principle has governed concurrent ownership of securities. By virtue either of statute or of account terms (contract), multiple-party bank accounts allow any one cotenant to consume or transfer account balances. See R. Brown, The Law of Personal Property § 65, at 217 (2d ed. 1955); Langbein, The Nonprobate Revolution and the Future of the Law of Succession, 97 Harv. L. Rev. 1108, 1112 (1984). The rule for securities, however, has been the rule that applies to real property: all cotenants must act together in transferring the securities. This difference in the legal regime reflects differences in function among the types of assets. Multiple-party bank accounts typically arise as convenience accounts, to facilitate frequent small transactions, often on an agency basis (as when spouses or relatives share an account). Securities resemble real estate in that the values are typically large and the transactions relatively infrequent, which is why the legal regime requires the concurrence of all concurrent owners for transfers affecting such assets.

Recently, of course, this distinction between bank accounts and securities has begun to crumble. Banks are offering certificates of deposit of large value under the same account forms that were devised for low-value convenience accounts. Meanwhile, brokerage houses with their so-called cash management accounts and mutual funds with their money market accounts have rendered securities subject to small recurrent transactions. In the latest developments, even the line between real estate and bank accounts is becoming indistinct, as the "home equity line of credit" creates a check-writing conduit to real estate values.

Nevertheless, even though new forms of contract have rendered the boundaries between securities and bank accounts less firm, the distinction seems intuitively correct for statutory default rules. True co-owners of securities, like owners of realty, should act together in transferring the asset.

The joint bank account and the Totten trust originated in ambiguous lifetime ownership forms, which required former UPC § 6-103 [72-6-211] or comparable state legislation to clarify that an inter vivos transfer was not intended. In the securities field, by contrast, we start with unambiguous lifetime ownership rules. The sole purpose of the present statute is to facilitate a nonprobate TOD mechanism as an option for those owners.

For a comprehensive discussion of the issues entailed in this legislation, see Wellman, Transfer-on-Death Securities Registration: A New Title Form, 21 Ga. L. Rev. 789 (1987).

Provisions Relating to Effect of Death

72-6-111. Nonprobate transfers on death.

Official Comments

This section is a revised version of former Section 6-201 [72-1-110, repealed 1993] of the original Uniform Probate Code, which authorized a variety of contractual arrangements that had sometimes been treated as testamentary in prior law. For example, most courts treated as testamentary a provision in a promissory note that if the payee died before making payment, the note should be paid to another named person; or a provision in a land contract that if the seller died before completing payment, the balance should be canceled and the property should belong to the vendee. These provisions often occurred in family arrangements. The result of holding such provisions testamentary was usually to invalidate them because not executed in accordance with the statute of wills. On the other hand, the same courts for years upheld beneficiary designations in life insurance contracts. The drafters of the original Uniform Probate Code declared in the Comment that they were unable to identify policy reasons for continuing to treat these varied arrangements as testamentary. The drafters said that the benign experience with such familiar will substitutes as the revocable inter vivos trust, the multiple-party bank account, and United States government bonds payable on death to named beneficiaries all demonstrated that the evils envisioned if the statute of wills were not rigidly enforced simply do not materialize. The Comment also observed that because these provisions often are part of a business transaction and are evidenced by a writing, the danger of fraud is largely eliminated.

Because the modes of transfer authorized by an instrument under this section are declared to be nontestamentary, the instrument does not have to be executed in compliance with the formalities for wills prescribed under Section 2-502 [72-2-522]; nor does the instrument have to be probated, nor does the personal representative have any power or duty with respect to the assets.

The sole purpose of this section is to prevent the transfers authorized here from being treated as testamentary. This section does not invalidate other arrangements by negative implication. Thus, this section does not speak to the phenomenon of the oral trust to hold property at death for named persons, an arrangement already generally enforceable under trust law.

The reference to a "marital property agreement" in the introductory portion of subsection (a) of Section 6-101 [72-6-111(1)] includes an agreement made during marriage as well as a premarital contract.

The term "or other written instrument of a similar nature" in the introductory portion of subsection (a) [72-6-111(1)] replaces the former language "or any other written instrument effective as a contract, gift, conveyance or trust" in the original Section 6-201 [72-1-110, repealed 1993]. The Supreme Court of Washington read that language to relieve against the delivery requirement of the law of deeds, a result that was not intended. Estate of O'Brien v. Woodhouse, 109 Wash. 2d 913, 749 P.2d 154 (1988). The point was correctly decided in First National Bank in Minot v. Bloom, 264 N.W.2d 208, 212 (N.D. 1978), in which the Supreme Court of North Dakota held that "nothing in [former Section 6-201] [72-1-110, repealed 1993] of the Uniform Probate Code . . . eliminates the necessity of delivery of a deed to effectuate a conveyance from one living person to another."

Compiler's Comments

2007 Amendment: Chapter 258 in (1) near end after "gift" inserted "beneficiary deed, as defined in 72-6-121"; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective October 1, 2007.

Applicability: Section 5, Ch. 258, L. 2007, provided: "[This act] applies to a beneficiary deed filed by an owner, as both are defined in [section 1] [72-6-121], who dies after October 1, 2007."

Saving Clause: Section 136, Ch. 494, L. 1993, was a saving clause.

UPC Section: The corresponding section in the Uniform Probate Code as adopted by the National Conference of Commissioners on Uniform State Laws is section 6-101.

Case Notes

"Payable on Death" Designation Negates Joint Tenancy Language on CD Form: The deceased's personal representative was his granddaughter, who was also the person named as the payable on death (POD) beneficiary of the deceased on several certificates of deposit (CDs). The granddaughter obtained a ruling from the District Court that she was a joint tenant with the right of survivorship with respect to the CDs, based upon the language on the CD forms specifically stating that the persons named on the CD were joint tenants. The Supreme Court held that a joint tenancy must be created by specific unambiguous language and that the POD designation on the CDs created an ambiguity negating the joint tenancy language. The Supreme Court further held that the POD language meant that the granddaughter could not have a present interest in the CDs at the time that the CDs were obtained by the deceased and that they could not pass to her under the principles of joint tenancy. The Supreme Court ruled that the POD designation acted to transfer the CDs to the granddaughter outside of the probate estate as a nontestamentary transfer. 72-6-121. Beneficiary deed — form — definitions.

Compiler's Comments

2011 Amendment: Chapter 76 in (4) inserted last two sentences regarding execution and recording of written statement of death; in (12) after "be proved by" substituted language regarding execution and recording of written statement of death for "affidavit or certificate of death". Amendment effective October 1, 2011.

Effective Date: This section is effective October 1, 2007.

Applicability: Section 5, Ch. 258, L. 2007, provided: "[This act] applies to a beneficiary deed filed by an owner, as both are defined in [section 1] [72-6-121], who dies after October 1, 2007."

72-6-123. Liability for creditor claims and statutory allowances.

Compiler's Comments

Severability: Section 161, Ch. 264, L. 2013, was a severability clause.

Effective Date: Section 163, Ch. 264, L. 2013, provided: "[This act] is effective October 1, 2013."

Application to Existing Relationships: Section 164, Ch. 264, L. 2013, provided: "(1) Except as otherwise provided in [this act], on [the effective date of this act]:

(a) [this act] applies to all trusts created before, on, or after [the effective date of this act];

(b) [this act] applies to all judicial proceedings concerning trusts commenced on or after [the effective date of this act];

(c) [this act] applies to judicial proceedings concerning trusts commenced before [the effective date of this act] unless the court finds that application of a particular provision of [this act] would substantially interfere with the effective conduct of the judicial proceedings or prejudice the rights of the parties, in which case the particular provision of [this act] does not apply and the superseded law applies;

(d) any rule of construction or presumption provided in [this act] applies to trust instruments executed before [the effective date of this act] unless there is a clear indication of a contrary intent in the terms of the trust; and

(e) an act done before [the effective date of this act] is not affected by [this act].

(2) If a right is acquired, extinguished, or barred upon the expiration of a prescribed period that has commenced to run under any other statute before [the effective date of this act], that statute continues to apply to the right even if it has been repealed or superseded." Effective October 1, 2013.

Multiple-Party Accounts

72-6-201. Definitions.

Official Comments

This and the sections that follow are designed to reduce certain questions concerning many forms of multiple-person accounts (including the so-called Totten trust account). A "payable on death" designation and an "agency" designation are also authorized for both single-party and multiple-party accounts. The POD designation is a more direct means of achieving the same purpose as a Totten trust account; this part therefore discourages creation of a Totten trust account and treats existing Totten trust accounts as POD designations.

An agent (paragraph (2)) [72-6-201(2)] may not be a party. The agency designation must be signed by all parties, and the agent is the agent of all parties. See Section 6-205 [72-6-205] (designation of agent).

A "beneficiary" of a party (paragraph (3)) [72-6-201(3)] may be either a POD beneficiary or the beneficiary of a Totten trust; the two types of designations in an account serve the same function and are treated the same under this part. See paragraph (8) ("POD designation" defined) [72-6-201(8)]. The definition of "beneficiary" refers to a "person," who may be an individual, corporation, organization, or other legal entity. Section 1-201(29) [(35) in 1990 version]

[72-1-103(36)]. Thus a church, trust company, family corporation, or other entity, as well as any individual, may be designated as a beneficiary.

The term "multiple-party account" (paragraph (5)) [72-6-201(5)] is used in this part in a broad sense to include any account having more than one owner with a present interest in the account. Thus an account may be a "multiple-party account" within the meaning of this part regardless of whether the terms of the account refer to it as "joint tenancy" or as "tenancy in common," regardless of whether the parties named are coupled by "or" or "and," and regardless of whether any reference is made to survivorship rights, whether expressly or by abbreviation such as JTWROS or JT TEN. Survivorship rights in a multiple-party account are determined by the terms of the account and by statute, and survivorship is not a necessary incident of a multiple-party account. See Section 6-212 (rights at death) [72-6-212].

Under paragraph (6) [72-6-201(6)], a "party" is a person with a present right to payment from an account. Therefore, present owners of a multiple-party account are parties, as is the present owner of an account with a POD designation. The beneficiary of an account with a POD designation is not a party, but is entitled to payment only on the death of all parties. The trustee of a Totten trust is a party but the beneficiary is not. An agent with the right of withdrawal on behalf of a party is not itself a party. A person claiming on behalf of a party such as a guardian or conservator, or claiming the interest of a party such as a creditor, is not itself a party, and the right of such a person to payment is governed by general law other than this part.

Various signature requirements may be involved in order to meet the payment requirements of the account. A "request" (paragraph (10)) [72-6-201(10)] involves compliance with these requirements. A party is one to whom an account is presently payable without regard to whose signature may be required for a "request."

Compiler's Comments

1995 Amendment: Chapter 592 in definition of terms of account, after "conditions", inserted "of the contract of deposit", after "including" inserted "the type of account, the parties to the account, and", and at end deleted "of deposit".

Saving Clause: Section 136, Ch. 494, L. 1993, was a saving clause.

UPC Section: The corresponding section in the Uniform Probate Code as adopted by the National Conference of Commissioners on Uniform State Laws is section 6-201.

72-6-202. Limitation on scope of part.

Official Comments

This part [Title 72, chapter 6, part 2] applies to accounts in this State. Section 1-301(4) [72-1-201, subsection (4) not adopted in Montana].

The reference to a fiduciary or trust account in item (iii) [72-6-202(3)] includes a regular trust account under a testamentary trust or a trust agreement that has significance apart from the account, and a fiduciary account arising from a fiduciary relation such as attorney-client.

Saving Clause: Section 136, Ch. 494, L. 1993, was a saving clause.

UPC Section: The corresponding section in the Uniform Probate Code as adopted by the National Conference of Commissioners on Uniform State Laws is section 6-202.

72-6-203. Types of account — existing accounts.

Official Comments

In the case of an account established before (or after) the effective date of this part that is not in substantially the form provided in Section 6-204 [72-6-204], the account is governed by the provisions of this part applicable to the type of account that most nearly conforms to the depositor's intent. See Section 6-204 (forms) [72-6-204].

Thus, a tenancy in common account established before or after the effective date of this part would be classified as a "multiple-party account" for purposes of this part. See Section 6-201(5) ("multiple-party account" defined) [72-6-201(5)]. On death of a party there would not be a right of survivorship since the tenancy in common title would be treated as a multiple-party account without right of survivorship. See Section 6-212(c) [72-6-212(3)]. It should be noted that a POD designation may not be made in a multiple-party account without right of survivorship. See Sections 6-201(8) ("POD designation" defined) [72-6-201(8)], 6-204 (forms) [72-6-204], and 6-212 (rights at death) [72-6-212].

Under this section, a Totten trust account established before, on, or after the effective date of this part is governed by the provisions of this part applicable to an account with a POD designation. See Section 6-201(8) ("POD designation" defined) [72-6-201(8)] and the Comment to Section 6-201 [72-6-201].

Compiler's Comments

Saving Clause: Section 136, Ch. 494, L. 1993, was a saving clause.

UPC Section: The corresponding section in the Uniform Probate Code as adopted by the National Conference of Commissioners on Uniform State Laws is section 6-203.

72-6-204. Forms.

Official Comments

This section provides short forms for single- and multiple-party accounts which, if used, bring the accounts within the terms of this part. A financial institution that uses the statutory form language in its accounts is protected in acting in reliance on the form of the account. See also Section 6-226 (discharge) [72-6-226].

The forms provided in this section enable a person establishing a multiple-party account to state expressly in the account whether there are to be survivorship rights between the parties. The account forms permit greater flexibility than traditional account designations. It should be noted that no separate form is provided for a Totten trust account, since the POD designation serves the same function.

An account that is not substantially in the form provided in this section is nonetheless governed by this part. See Section 6-203 (types of account; existing accounts) [72-6-203].

Compiler's Comments

1997 Amendment: Chapter 279 in middle of form in (1) substituted language authorizing a change in the terms in a multiple-party account by a single party or by agreement of all parties for language that read: "Further, any one party may change the type of account."

72-6-205. Designation of agent.

Official Comments

An agent has no beneficial interest in the account. See Section 6-211 (ownership during lifetime) [72-6-211]. The agency relationship is governed by the general law of agency of the state, except to the extent this part provides express rules, including the rule that the agency survives the disability or incapacity of a party.

A financial institution may make payments at the direction of an agent notwithstanding disability, incapacity, or death of the party, subject to receipt of a stop notice. Section 6-226 (discharge) [72-6-226]; see also Section 6-224 (payment to designated agent) [72-6-224].

The rule of subsection (b) [72-6-205(2)] applies to agency designations on all types of accounts, including nonsurvivorship as well as survivorship forms of multiple-party accounts.

Case Notes

No Theft Prosecution for Removal of Funds From Joint Account: Kane was charged with theft for purposely or knowingly obtaining or exerting unauthorized control over funds and other items belonging to Hilger. Kane filed a motion to dismiss, which the District Court granted on grounds that as a joint tenant on a checking account with Hilger, Kane could not, as a matter of law, be prosecuted for theft of funds taken from the joint account. The state contended that 72-6-211 governed the joint account and permitted prosecution for theft in such cases. The Supreme Court affirmed, holding that the statute did not apply to controversies between cotenants. Absent evidence that Kane had threatened or deceived Hilger into establishing the joint tenant arrangement, Kane's actions did not make out the elements of criminal theft. St. v. Kane, 1999 MT 337, 297 M 421, 992 P2d 1283, 56 St. Rep. 1343 (1999), following St. v. Haack, 220 M 141, 713 P2d 1001 (1986), and distinguishing St. v. Curtis, 241 M 288, 787 P2d 306, 47 St. Rep. 277 (1990).

72-6-211. Ownership during lifetime.

Official Comments

This section reflects the assumption that a person who deposits funds in an account normally does not intend to make an irrevocable gift of all or any part of the funds represented by the deposit. Rather, the person usually intends no present change of beneficial ownership. The section permits parties to accounts to be as definite, or as indefinite, as they wish in respect to the matter of how beneficial ownership should be apportioned between them.

The assumption that no present change of beneficial ownership is intended may be disproved by showing that a gift was intended. For example, under subsection (c) [72-6-211(3)] it is presumed that the beneficiary of a POD designation has no present ownership interest during lifetime. However, it is possible that in the case of a POD designation in trust form an irrevocable gift was intended.

It is important to note that the section is limited to ownership of an account while parties are alive. Section 6-212 [72-6-212] prescribes what happens to beneficial ownership on the death of a party.

The section does not undertake to describe the situation between parties if one party withdraws more than that party is then entitled to as against the other party. Sections 6-221 [72-6-221] and 6-226 [72-6-226] protect a financial institution in that circumstance without reference to whether a withdrawing party may be entitled to less than that party withdraws as against another party. Rights between parties in this situation are governed by general law other than this part.

"Net contribution" as defined by subsection (a) [72-6-211(1)] has no application to the financial institution-depositor relationship. Rather, it is relevant only to controversies that may arise between parties to a multiple-party account.

The last sentence of subsection (b) [72-6-211(2)] provides a clear rule concerning the amount of "net contribution" in a case where the actual amount cannot be established as between spouses. This part otherwise contains no provision dealing with a failure of proof. The omission is deliberate. The theory of these sections is that the basic relationship of the parties is that of individual ownership of values attributable to their respective deposits and withdrawals, and not equal and undivided ownership that would be an incident of joint tenancy.

In a state that recognizes tenancy by the entireties for personal property, this section would not change the rule that parties who are married to each other own their combined net contributions to an account as tenants by the entireties. See Section 6-216 (community property and tenancy by the entireties) [72-6-216].

72-6-212. Rights at death.

Official Comments

The effect of subsection (a) [72-6-212(1)] is to make an account payable to one or more of two or more parties a survivorship arrangement unless a nonsurvivorship arrangement is specified in the terms of the account. This rule applies to community property as well as other forms of marital property. See Section 6-216 (community property and tenancy by the entireties)

[72-6-216]. The section also applies to various forms of multiple-party accounts that may be in use at the effective date of the legislation. See Sections 6-203 (type of account; existing accounts) [72-6-203] and 6-204 (forms) [72-6-204].

By technical amendment effective August 5, 1991, the word "part" was substituted for "section" in the first sentence of subsection (a) [72-6-212(1)]. [Montana adopted the version that incorporated the 1991 technical amendment.] The amendment clarified the original purpose of the drafters and Commissioners to permit a court to implement the intentions of parties to a joint account governed by Section 6-204(b) [72-6-204(2)] if it finds that the account was opened solely for the convenience of a party who supplied all funds reflected by the account and intended no present gift or death benefit for the other party. In short, the account characteristics described in this section must be determined by reference to the form of the account and the impact of Sections 6-203[72-6-203] and 6-204 [72-6-204] on the admissibility of extrinsic evidence tending to confirm or contradict intention as signalled by the form.

Subsection (b) [72-6-212(2)] applies to both POD and Totten trust beneficiaries. See Section 6-201(8) ("POD designation" defined) [72-6-201(8)]. It accepts the New York view that an account opened by "A" in A's name as "trustee for B" usually is intended by A to be an informal will of any balance remaining on deposit at A's death.

72-6-213. Alteration of rights.

Official Comments

Under this section, rights of parties and beneficiaries are determined by the type of account at the time of death. It is to be noted that only a "party" may give notice blocking the provisions of Section 6-212 (rights at death) [72-6-212]. "Party" is defined by Section 6-201(6) [72-6-201(6)]. Thus if there is an account with a POD designation in the name of A and B with C as beneficiary, C cannot change the right of survivorship because C has no present right to payment and hence is not a party.

72-6-214. Accounts and transfers nontestamentary.

Official Comments

The purpose of classifying the transactions contemplated by this part as nontestamentary is to bolster the explicit statement that their validity as effective modes of transfers on death is not to be determined by the requirements for wills. The section is consistent with Part 1 of Article VI (provisions relating to effect of death) [72-6-111].

72-6-216. Community property and tenancy by entireties.

Official Comments

Section 6-216 [72-6-216] does not affect or limit the right of the financial institution to make payments pursuant to Subpart 3 (protection of financial institutions) [72-6-221 through 72-6-227] and the deposit agreement. See Section 6-206 (applicability of part) [72-6-206]. For this reason, Section 6-216 [72-6-216] does not affect the definiteness and certainty that the financial institution must have in order to be induced to make payments from the account and, at the same time, the section preserves the rights of the parties, creditors, and successors that arise out of the nature of the funds in the account — community or separate, or tenancy by the entireties.

Paragraph (2) [72-6-222(2)] is limited to a multiple-party account with right of survivorship; payment to the personal representative or heirs or devisees of a deceased party to an account without right of survivorship is governed by the general law of the state relating to the authority of such persons to collect assets alleged to belong to a decedent.

This section is intended to protect a financial institution that makes a payment pursuant to an account with an agency designation even though the agency may have terminated at the time of the payment due to disability, incapacity, or death of the principal. The protection does not apply if the financial institution has received notice under Section 6-226 [72-6-226] not to make payment or that the agency has terminated. 72-6-226. Discharge.

Official Comments

The provision of subsection (a) [72-6-226(1)] protecting a financial institution for payments made after the death, disability, or incapacity of a party is a specific elaboration of the general protective provisions of this section and is drawn from Uniform Commercial Code Section 4-405 [30-4-405].

Knowledge of disability, incapacity, or death of a party does not affect payment on request of an agent, whether or not the agent's authority survives disability or incapacity. See Section 6-224 (payment to designated agent) [72-6-224]. But under subsection (b) [72-6-226(2)], the financial institution may not make payments on request of an agent after it has received written notice not to, whether because the agency has terminated or otherwise.

Uniform TOD Security Registration Act

72-6-301. Definitions.

Official Comments

"Security" is defined as provided in UCC § 8-102 [30-8-102, now repealed] and includes shares of mutual funds and other investment companies. The defined term "security account" is not intended to include securities held in the name of a bank or similar institution as nominee for the benefit of a trust.

"Survive" is not defined. No effort is made in this part to define survival as it is for purposes of intestate succession in UPC § 2-104 [72-1-114] which requires survival by an heir of the ancestor for 120 hours. For purposes of this part, survive is used in its common law sense of outliving another for any time interval no matter how brief. The drafting committee sought to avoid imposition of a new and unfamiliar meaning of the term on intermediaries familiar with the meaning of "survive" in joint tenancy registrations.

Compiler's Comments

2005 Amendment: Chapter 76 in definition of security account in (a) near middle after "cash" inserted "cash equivalents" and inserted (c) concerning investment management or custody account with a trust company or trust division; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective March 24, 2005.

UPC Section: The corresponding section in the Uniform Probate Code as adopted by the National Conference of Commissioners on Uniform State Laws is section 6-301.

72-6-302. Registration in beneficiary form — sole or joint tenancy ownership.

Official Comments

This section is designed to prevent co-owners from designating any death beneficiary other than one who is to take only upon survival of all co-owners. It coerces co-owning registrants to signal whether they hold as joint tenants with right of survivorship (JT TEN), as tenants by the entireties (T ENT), or as owners of community property. Also, it imposes survivorship on co-owners holding in a beneficiary form that fails to specify a survivorship form of holding. Tenancy in common and community property otherwise than in a survivorship setting is negated for registration in beneficiary form because persons desiring to signal independent death beneficiaries for each individual's fractional interest in a co-owned security normally will split their holding into separate registrations of the number of units previously constituting their fractional share. Once divided, each can name his or her own choice of death beneficiary.

The term "individuals," as used in this section, limits those who may register as owner or co-owner of a security in beneficiary form to natural persons. However, the section does not restrict individuals using this ownership form as to their choice of death beneficiary. The definition of "beneficiary form" in Section 6-301 [72-6-301] indicates that any "person" may be designated beneficiary in a registration in beneficiary form. "Person" is defined so that a church, trust company, family corporation, or other entity, as well as any individual, may be designated as a beneficiary. Section 1-201(29) [(35) in 1990 version] [72-1-103(36)].

72-6-303. Registration in beneficiary form — applicable law.

Official Comments

This section encourages registrations in beneficiary form to be made whenever a state with which either of the parties to a registration has contact has enacted this or a similar statute. Thus, a registration in beneficiary form of X Company shares might rely on an enactment of this Act in X Company's state of incorporation, or in the state of incorporation of X Company's transfer agent. Or, an enactment by the state of the issuer's principal office, the transfer agent's principal office, or of the issuer's office making the registration also would validate the registration. An enactment of the state of the registering owner's address at time of registration also might be used for validation purposes.

The last sentence of this section is designed, as is UPC § 6-101 [72-6-111], to establish a statutory presumption that a general principle of law is available to achieve a result like that made possible by this part.

72-6-305. Form of registration in beneficiary form.

Official Comments

The abbreviation POD is included for use without regard for whether the subject is a money claim against an issuer, such as its own note or bond for money loaned, or is a claim to securities evidenced by conventional title documentation. The use of POD in a registration in beneficiary form of shares in an investment company should not be taken as a signal that the investment is to be sold or redeemed on the owner's death so that the sums realized may be "paid" to the death beneficiary. Rather, only a transfer on death, not a liquidation on death, is indicated. The committee would have used only the abbreviation TOD except for the familiarity, rooted in experience with certificates of deposit and other deposit accounts in banks, with the abbreviation POD as signalling a valid nonprobate death benefit or transfer on death.

72-6-306. Effect of registration in beneficiary form.

Official Comments

This section simply affirms the right of a sole owner, or the right of all multiple owners, to end a TOD beneficiary registration without the assent of the beneficiary. The section says nothing about how a TOD beneficiary designation may be canceled, meaning that the registering entity's terms and conditions, if any, may be relevant. See Section 6-310 [72-6-310]. If the terms and conditions have nothing on the point, cancellation of a beneficiary designation presumably would be effected by a reregistration showing a different beneficiary or omitting reference to a TOD beneficiary.

72-6-307. Ownership on death of owner.

Official Comments

Even though multiple owners holding in the beneficiary form here authorized hold with right of survivorship, no survivorship rights attend the positions of multiple beneficiaries who become entitled to securities by reason of having survived the sole owner or the last to die of multiple owners. Issuers (and registering entities) who decide to accept registrations in beneficiary form involving more than one primary beneficiary also should provide by rule whether fractional shares will be registered in the names of surviving beneficiaries where the number of shares held by the deceased owner does not divide without remnant among the survivors. If fractional shares are not desired, the issuer may wish to provide for sale of odd shares and division of proceeds, for an uneven distribution with the first or last named to receive the odd share, or for other resolution. Section 6-308 [72-6-308] deals with whether intermediaries have any obligation to offer beneficiary registrations of any sort; Section 6-310 [72-6-310] enables issuers to adopt terms and conditions controlling the details of applications for registrations they decide to accept and procedures for implementing such registrations after an owner's death.

The reference to surviving, multiple TOD beneficiaries as tenants in common is not intended to suggest that a registration form specifying unequal shares, such as "TOD A (20%), B (30%), C (50%)," would be improper. Though not included in the beneficiary forms described for illustrative purposes in Section 6-310 [72-6-310], the part enables a registering entity to accept and implement a TOD beneficiary designation like the one just suggested. If offered, such a registration form should be implemented by registering entity terms and conditions providing for disposition of the share of a beneficiary who predeceases the owner when two or more of a group of multiple beneficiaries survive the owner. For example, the terms might direct the share of the predeceased beneficiary to the survivors in the proportion that their original shares bore to each other. Unless unequal shares are specified in a registration in beneficiary form designating multiple beneficiaries, the shares of the beneficiaries would, of course, be equal.

The statement that a security registered in beneficiary form is in the deceased owner's estate when no beneficiary survives the owner is not intended to prevent application of any anti-lapse statute that might direct a nonprobate transfer on death to the surviving issue of a beneficiary who failed to survive the owner. Rather, the statement is intended only to indicate that the registering entity involved should transfer or reregister the security as directed by the decedent's personal representative.

72-6-308. Protection of registering entity.

Official Comments

It is to be noted that the "request" for a registration in beneficiary form may be in any form chosen by a registering entity. This part does not prescribe a particular form and does not impose record-keeping requirements. Registering entities' business practices, including any industry standards or rules of transfer agent associations, will control.

The written notice referred to in subsection (c) [72-6-308(3)] would qualify as a notice under UCC § 8-403 [30-8-403, now repealed].

"Good faith" as used in this section is intended to mean "honesty in fact and the observance of reasonable commercial standards of fair dealing in the trade," as specified in UCC §2-103(1)(b) [30-2-103(1)(b)].

The protections described in this section are designed to meet any questions regarding registering entity protection that may not be foreclosed by issuer protections provided in the Uniform Commercial Code [Title 30, chapters 1 through 8 and 9A]. Because persons interested in this part may wish to be reminded of relevant UCC provisions, a brief summary follows.

"U.C.C. § 8-403 [30-8-403, now repealed], 'Issuer's Duty as to Adverse Claims' contains detailed provisions regarding duties of inquiry by an issuer of a certificated or uncertificated security who is requested to effect a transfer, and the availability and use of 30 day notices to force adverse claimants to start litigation if further delay in transfer is desired. U.C.C. § 8-201's [30-8-201, now repealed] definition of 'issuer' for purposes of 'registration of transfer...' is simply 'a person on whose behalf transfer books are maintained'. U.C.C. § 8-403 [30-8-403, now repealed] is among the sections dealing with registration of transfers.

"U.C.C. sections 8-308 [30-8-308, now repealed] and 8-404(1) [30-8-404(1), now repealed] appear to exonerate an issuer who acts in response to transfer directions signalled by the 'necessary indorsement' on or with a certificated security or in response to 'an instruction originated by an appropriate person' in the case of an uncertificated security. Section 8-308 [30-8-308, now repealed] describes the meaning of 'appropriate person' in the case of a certificated security as 'the person specified by the certificated security . . . to be entitled to the security.' U.C.C. § 8-308(6) (1978) [30-8-308(6), now repealed]. In the case of an uncertificated security, 'appropriate person' means the 'registered owner.' Id. § 8-308(7) [30-8-308(7), now repealed]. The survivor of owners listed as joint tenants with right of survivorship is specifically defined as an authorized person. Id. § 8-308(8)(d) [30-8-308(8)(d), now repealed]. The U.C.C. aspect of the problem could be met by an additional sub-paragraph to section 8-308(8) [30-8-308(8), now repealed] that would include a TOD beneficiary as an 'appropriate person' when the beneficiary has survived the owner.

"No U.C.C. addition would be necessary if a TOD beneficiary designation were viewed as a contingent order for transfer at the owner's death that may be safely implemented as a direction from the owner as an 'authorized person.' The owner's death before completion of the transfer would not pose U.C.C. problems because section 8-308(10) [30-8-308(10), now repealed] provides: 'Whether the person signing is appropriate is determined as of the date of signing and an indorsement made by or an instruction originated by him does not become unauthorized for the purposes of this Article by virtue of any subsequent change of circumstances.'

"It might be questioned whether a TOD direction, which may be revoked before it is carried into effect and is also contingent on the beneficiary's survival of the registrant, is within the transfer directions contemplated by the U.C.C. framers for purposes of issuer protection. However, since section 8-202 [30-8-202, now repealed] explicitly protects issuers against problems arising because of restrictions or conditions on transfers, only the novelty of revocable directions for transfer on death gives pause.

"In general, article 8 of the U.C.C. [Title 30, chapter 8] reflects a careful attempt to protect implementation of a wide range of transfer instructions so long as the signatures are genuine and are those of owners acting in conformity with duly imposed rules of the issuer organization. . . . Hence, existing U.C.C. protections should be adequate, . . ."

Official Comments

Use of "and" or "or" between the names of persons registered as co-owners is unnecessary under this part [Title 72, chapter 6, part 3] and should be discouraged. If used, the two words should have the same meaning insofar as concerns a title form; i.e., that of "and" to indicate that both named persons own the asset.

Descendants of a named beneficiary who take by virtue of a "LDPS" designation appended to a beneficiary's name take as TOD beneficiaries rather than as intestate successors. If no descendant of a predeceased primary beneficiary survives the owner, the security passes as a part of the owner's estate as provided in Section 6-307 [72-6-307].

Section 6-311 [72-6-311] is an optional provision that may be particularly useful in a state that has previously enacted the Uniform Probate Code, since the general effective date and transitional provisions of UPC § 8-101 [not adopted in Montana] are not expressly adapted for the addition of this part. A state newly enacting the Uniform Probate Code, including this part [Title 72, chapter 6, part 3], may find that general Section 8-101 [not adopted in Montana] is adequate for this purpose and addition of optional Section 6-311 [72-6-311] unnecessary.

DISPOSITION OF COMMUNITY PROPERTY RIGHTS AT DEATH

Uniform Disposition of Community Property Rights at Death

72-9-102. Application.

This section [72-9-102] defines property subject to the Act.

Subsection (1): Personal Property

Subsection (1) is designed to cover all personal property which was acquired while the spouses were domiciled in a community property state, to the extent that it would have been treated as community property by that state at the time of acquisition and that no further action terminated the community character of the property. It also includes any property which was not originally community property but became such by agreement and, further, brings within the Act any personal property which can be traced back to a community source. Again, the Act only applies if there was no severance of the community interests [Section 8] [72-9-115]. [While Section 3 [72-9-107] applies to the dispositive rights of persons domiciled in the enacting state, the Act, as a practical matter, may be effective as to property located outside the state only to the extent that the state of the situs of the property is willing to recognize the policy of the domiciliary state.]

Example 1. H and W, while domiciled in California, purchased 100 shares each of A Co., B Co. and C Co. stock with community property (earnings of H). H and W were transferred to a common law state which had not enacted this Act; while domiciled there H sold the 100 shares of A stock and with the proceeds purchased 100 shares of D stock. Subsequently H and W became domiciled in Michigan which had enacted this Act; H sold the B stock and 50 shares of D Co. stock and purchased 150 shares of E stock. H died domiciled in Michigan with 100 shares of C Co., 50 shares of D Co. and 150 shares of E Co. stock; all of the stock had always been registered in H's name. All of the shares, traceable to community property or the proceeds therefrom, constitute property subject to this Act.

Subsection (2): Real Property

Subsection (2) deals with real property and is confined to real property located within the enacting state (since presumably the law of the situs of the property will govern dispositive rights). The policy and operation of this subsection are intended to be the same as those set forth in subsection (1).

Example 2. H and W, while domiciled in California, purchased a residence in California. They retained the residence in California when they were transferred to Wisconsin. After becoming domiciled in Wisconsin they used community funds, drawn from a bank account in California, to purchase a Wisconsin cottage. H and W subsequently became domiciled in Michigan; they then purchased a condominium in Michigan for $20,000 using $15,000 of community property funds drawn from their bank account in California and $5,000 earned by H after the move to Michigan. H died domiciled in Michigan; title to all of the real property was in H's name. Assuming Michigan had enacted this Act, three-fourths of the Michigan condominium would be property subject to this Act; the Michigan statute would not, however, apply to either the Wisconsin or California real estate. If Wisconsin had enacted this Act, the Wisconsin statute would apply to the Wisconsin cottage.

Apportionment

In both subsections (1) and (2) an apportionment is required by the phrase "all or the proportionate part" where personal property, or real property situated in the enacting state, has been acquired partly with property described as subject to the Act and partly with other (separate) property. To put it succinctly, the phrase represents a condensation of an area covered by many pages in a prior draft and is simply a statement of policy; it leaves to the courts the difficult task of working out the precise interest which will be treated as the "proportionate part" of the property subject to the dispositive formula of Section 3 [72-9-107]. Simply by way of illustration, assume that a single man (domiciled in a community property state) purchased a life insurance policy with a face amount of $100,000 and an annual premium of $1,000. Assume further that he paid three premiums and then entered into marriage. Further assume that the next seven premiums were paid with his earnings while domiciled in the community property state and that he and his wife then moved to a common law state where the next ten premiums were paid from his earnings in that common law state; he then died after the payment of the twenty premiums. Under one interpretation of the law of Texas the contract would remain the separate property of the insured; the community would have a claim for community funds advanced to pay premiums and, ignoring interest, it would appear that $7,000 of the proceeds would be treated as community property and the remaining $93,000 would be treated as the separate property of the deceased spouse. On the other hand, a state like California would probably treat the proceeds as being 65% separate and 35% community (basing the allocation of proceeds upon the percentage of separate and community funds contributed). Further variations could be mentioned. The illustration is one of the simpler problems. Much more difficult problems are encountered where benefits under a qualified pension and profit-sharing plan are involved and the employee has been domiciled in both community property and common law jurisdictions during the period in which benefits have accrued. Attempts at defining the various types of situations which could arise and the varying approaches which could be taken, depending upon the state, suggest that the matter simply be left to court decision as to what portion would, under applicable choice of law rules, be treated as community property. The principle suggested is that at least a portion should be treated as community, if the appropriate law so treated it. Ordinarily, such questions should not arise if the problem is foreseen and effective planning takes place prior to death of a spouse.

72-9-103. Rebuttable presumptions.

Official Comments

The purposes of the rebuttable presumptions are simply to assist a court in applying the definitions in Section 1 [72-9-102], through a process of tracing the property to a community property origin.

Subsection (1)

Subsection (1) of Section 2 [72-9-103] deals with property acquired by the spouses while domiciled in a community property state. It thus provides that if one of the spouses acquired property while so domiciled, such property is "presumed" (a rebuttable presumption) to have been and remained community. It may be shown, of course, that such property was the separate property of the spouse and the law of the state of domicile may furnish the rule. For example the law of community domicile may provide the rule that property acquired in the name of the wife shall be deemed to be her separate property or that a particular subsequent act effectively severed the community property interests.

Example 1. H, married to W and domiciled in California, acquired stock; later H and W became domiciled in Michigan. Such property, if retained, is presumed to be property subject to this Act. By operation of Section 1 [72-9-102] the proceeds of sale or exchange of such stock, and property acquired with the proceeds or income of such stock, would be deemed subject to the Act. If, however, upon the death of H, H's personal representative rebutted the presumption by evidence that the stock was acquired by H with his separate property (or by inheritance) neither the stock nor property acquired with that property or the income therefrom (unless the income itself would be subject to the Act because, under the applicable law, income from separate property is deemed to be community property) would be subject to this Act. Similarly the presumption may be rebutted by showing that such property, though originally community property, was effectively severed by an act of the spouses. It should be emphasized that the presumption is simply one of procedural convenience and neither changes the nature of the property interests nor prevents an interested person from showing the separate nature of the property.

Subsection (2) sets up a rebuttable presumption that where a domiciliary of a common law state acquired property in such form as to indicate that title was in joint tenancy, tenancy by the entireties, or some other form of joint ownership with right of survivorship, it will be presumed that the property is not subject to the Act. This presumption was deemed appropriate as expressing the normal expectations of the spouses and to facilitate ascertainment of title to real property located in the enacting state, as well as personal property wherever located.

Example 2. John and Mary Jones, formerly domiciled in California, became domiciled in Illinois and purchased a residence, taking title in the names of "John and Mary Jones as joint tenants, and not as tenants in common, with right of survivorship." Regardless of the source of the funds, the Illinois residence would be presumed to be held in joint tenancy and not subject to this Act.

72-9-107. Disposition upon death.

Official Comments

This section [72-9-107] deals with the dispositive rights, at death, of (l) a married person domiciled in the enacting state as to personal property and (2) of any married person, including a nondomiciliary of the enacting state, as to real property located in the enacting state; it also sets forth rules for intestate succession to property subject to this Act.

Testate Disposition

The dispositive pattern is the usual one encountered in the community property states; the deceased spouse may dispose of his one-half of the community property, subject to the provisions of Section 9 [72-9-116].

Example. H and W were formerly domiciled in California and are now domiciled in Michigan. All of their property was community property prior to the move from California to Michigan. At H's death he held title to a home in Michigan which had been purchased with the proceeds of the sale of a home in California which had been community property. Stock acquired as community property in California was held in his name in safety deposit boxes located in Illinois and Michigan. H and W had acquired a cottage in California as community property, held in H's name, and it was so held at the time of his death. H and W acquired a Michigan resort condominium, taking title as tenants by the entireties. H acquired bonds issued by his employer with earnings in Michigan and held title in his own name.

The Michigan residence and the stock would be deemed property subject to this Act and H would have the right under Section 3 [72-9-107] to dispose of half of that property by his will. The remaining property would not be deemed subject to this Act.

Intestate Succession

If the property subject to this Act passes by intestate succession, the law of the enacting state applies to the decedent's one-half, again subject to Section 9 [72-9-116]. If under the law of the enacting state, a surviving spouse is entitled to one-third of the decedent's property by intestate succession, the result of the Act is to give to her two-thirds of the property subject to the Act. For example, if the spouses had recently moved to a common law state and owned $300,000 of property (all being personal property held in the husband's name and acquired as community property), the wife would be entitled to one-half of the property ($150,000) and would receive a 1/3 share of the husband's half ($50,000) for a total of $200,000. It is clearly within the power of the enacting state to prescribe any pattern of intestate succession deemed appropriate, and views may differ. In some community property states, the surviving spouse receives all of the decedent's community property upon intestate succession; in another, she would receive none. Similarly, the common law state may alter the pattern to fit its own policy determination.

Dower, Curtesy, Elective Share

Dower and curtesy do not exist in community property and have been abolished in many common law states; policy considerations suggest that no such interest should exist in property subject to this Act, since the surviving spouse already has a one-half interest in such property. Similar reasons suggest a denial of any right in the surviving spouse to elect a statutory share in the one-half of the property over which the decedent had a power of disposition.

72-9-108. Perfection of title of surviving spouse.

Official Comments

This section [72-9-108] simply provides for perfection of title interests of the surviving spouse (e.g. where title was in the name of the deceased spouse) by orders of the court of appropriate jurisdiction (e.g. the probate court) in the enacting state. This section [72-9-108] is designed to eliminate any liability of the personal representative for a breach of his fiduciary duty by failing to search for or to discover whether property held by the decedent is property defined in Section 1 [72-9-102], unless a written demand is made by the surviving spouse or the spouse's successor in interest. In several states the Court administering a decedent's estate has a duty or undertakes to advise parties in interest of their legal and equitable rights, and this section [72-9-108] is similarly designed to eliminate such Court's liability for failing to discover the community rights and to advise the interested party of his rights. Nothing contained in this section [72-9-108] is to be construed to interfere with the Court's jurisdiction in a proper proceeding to perfect the title of the surviving spouse in and to property to which this Act applies.

72-9-109. Perfection of title of personal representative, heir, or devisee.

Official Comments

This section [72-9-109] is a corollary to Section 4 [72-9-108]. Since title is apparently in the surviving spouse, the section simply provides for an action by the personal representative, heirs, or devisees and is again designed to eliminate any liability of the personal representative for a breach of his fiduciary duty by failing to discover or to attempt to discover whether property held by the surviving spouse is property subject to this Act, absent a written demand by an heir, devisee or creditor of the decedent.

Changes From Uniform Act: Montana enactment inserted the statutory reference to the definition section.

72-9-110. Purchaser for value or lender.

Official Comments

This section [72-9-110] is designed to protect purchasers and lenders taking a security interest, who acquire such interest for value, after the death of the decedent, from a person who appears to have title to property to which this Act applies. The only requirement is that the purchaser or lender have acquired his interest for value; there is no requirement of good faith absence of notice. The purpose of the section is to permit reliance upon apparent title and facilitate both ascertainment of title and disposition of assets where adequate consideration is paid. Since, during the joint lives of the spouses, the spouse with apparent title would have been able to convey title (at least as to community property) though being held accountable to the other spouse for an appropriate allocation of the proceeds or any breach of fiduciary obligation, the Act simply extends this treatment to disposition of the assets after the death of a spouse.

Official Comments

The rights, and procedures, with respect to severance of community property vary markedly among the community property states. CHAPTER 11
INTESTATE SUCCESSION

Chapter Case Notes

Living Trust — Definitions — Classification of Property Subject to Trust: Clifford and his wife Mary established a living trust for the benefit of their family. The trust classified property as either "marital" or "separate". Marital property transferred to the trust would become part of the marital trust estate and would go to the surviving spouse on the death of either Clifford or Mary. Separate property of either Clifford or Mary would become part of the separate trust estate and would be distributed according to the trust, with the residue going to the family bypass trust. The trust required the trustee to distribute $10,000 from Clifford's separate trust to each of his children. In order to determine whether joint bank account and certain certificates of deposit were available for distribution by the separate trust, the Supreme Court examined the terms of the trust and definitions used in the trust. Because the trust was silent as to the treatment of jointly held personal property and the definitions in the trust were ambiguous as to the terms "marital property" and "separate property", the Supreme Court relied upon external evidence to determine the intent of Clifford and Mary. The Supreme Court found that the circumstances concerning the creation and use of the accounts and certificates during their lifetime indicated an intent that the accounts and certificates were joint and not separate property, in that Clifford and Mary placed money generated by their mutual efforts into the accounts and certificates and, for at least one of the accounts, the bank had issued the passbook and statements of account in both their names. The Supreme Court held that the District Court had properly characterized Clifford and Mary's joint bank account and certificates of deposit as part of the marital trust estate and therefore not available for distribution from Clifford's separate trust estate. Saving Clause: Section 136, Ch. 494, L. 1993, was a saving clause.

Attorneys' Fees:

Following the resolution of a will contest, the personal representatives claimed attorney fees and costs pursuant to this section. The will contestants argued that under 25-10-501 and pursuant to Craver v. Waste Management Partners of Bozeman, 265 M 37, 874 P2d 1, 51 St. Rep. 268 (1994), a party claiming attorney fees and costs must file a bill of costs within 5 days of the verdict or notice of the court's decision, which the personal representatives did not do. The District Court concluded that 25-10-501 did not apply and that attorney fees and costs were not waived by the failure to file a timely memorandum. The Supreme Court disagreed in part, overruling Craver, and held that under the plain language of 25-10-501 and pursuant to Cook v. Harrington, 203 M 479, 661 P2d 1287, 40 St. Rep. 580 (1983), and Schillinger v. Brewer, 215 M 333, 697 P2d 919, 42 St. Rep. 408 (1985), the 5-day filing requirement for filing a memorandum of costs does not apply to attorney fees to which a party is entitled by statute. However, the filing requirement does apply to the personal representatives' claim for costs. As a result, the case was remanded for modification of judgment to delete costs awarded in error. In re Estate of Lande, 1999 MT 179, 295 M 277, 983 P2d 316, 56 St. Rep. 701 (1999).

It was not error for the District Court to award attorney fees to the personal representatives in a will contest pursuant to this section, despite the fact that the issue of attorney fees was not included in the pretrial order. The purposes of pretrial orders are to prevent surprise, simplify the issues, and permit the parties to prepare for trial. However, in the case of a stand-alone, statutorily mandated award of fees to the prevailing party, as contained in this section, requiring inclusion in the pretrial order would accomplish none of these purposes and thus is not required. In re Estate of Lande, 1999 MT 179, 295 M 277, 983 P2d 316, 56 St. Rep. 701 (1999), distinguishing Naftco Leasing Ltd. Partnership 301 v. Finalco, Inc., 254 M 89, 835 P2d 729, 49 St. Rep. 644 (1992), and Simmons Oil Corp. v. Wells Fargo Bank, 1998 MT 129, 289 M 119, 960 P2d 291 (1998).

In a probate contest, the validity of the will in probate was confirmed. The respondent was therefore statutorily entitled to her fees and expenses. The Supreme Court held that "expenses" as used in 72-12-206 encompasses attorney fees as part of the expense of the proceeding to confirm the probate of a will. In re the Estate of Weidner, 192 M 421, 628 P2d 285, 38 St. Rep. 747 (1981).

If contest of a will previously admitted to probate is successful, costs may be chargeable against the executor who resisted revocation or, in the discretion of the court, may be taken from the assets of the estate, but attorneys' fees for services in defense of a will contest are not included within the term "costs", and hence such fees cannot be recovered from the estate. In re Kesl's Estate, 117 M 377, 161 P2d 641 (1945).

Attorneys' fees incurred by a devisee under a will to defend a contest thereof are not allowable as costs and disbursements within the purview of this section and 72-10-111 (now repealed), out of the assets of the estate. In re Baxter's Estate, 94 M 257, 22 P2d 182 (1933), explained in In re Mickich's Estate, 114 M 258, 136 P2d 223 (1943).

Award of Attorney Fees for Unsuccessful Defense of Will Contest: As a significant part of a will contest, Seright unsuccessfully defended the will for which he was a personal representative. The District Court granted Seright attorney fees and costs. Hauck asserted error in the award and contended that under this section, attorney fees are not included within the term "costs". However, under 72-3-632, Seright was entitled to reasonable fees for defending the will contest, whether or not the defense was successful. Hauck v. Seright, 1998 MT 198, 290 M 309, 964 P2d 749, 55 St. Rep. 838 (1998).

Living Trust — Costs and Attorney Fees Awarded to Trustee From Trust — Judicial Construction of Trust Documents: Clifford Dern and his wife Mary established a living trust for the benefit of their family. Derril Dern, a cotrustee, refused to sign a quitclaim deed conveying various properties left to the trust beneficiaries, and Mary brought an action to determine the beneficiaries' rights. The District Court relied upon 25-10-103 for its determination that payment of costs was discretionary with the court. The Supreme Court held that 25-10-103 applies only in those situations in which costs are not otherwise provided for. In this case, article 3 of the trust documents states that the trustee may pay "expenses of administration" from the trust. In reliance on that language and on 72-33-631 (now repealed), the Supreme Court held that the fees were a necessary expense of the trust, given Derril's refusal to sign the deed. The Supreme Court also noted that 72-33-631 (now repealed) allows repayment of expenditures incurred by the trustee in administration of the trust, that that provision was patterned after a section of the California probate code, and that California decisions interpreting that section of the California probate code hold that reasonable attorney fees are considered necessary expenses of trust administration. The Supreme Court also pointed out that its decision to allow fees is further buttressed by decisions interpreting this section. Finally, because the trust documents provided that only expenses of the trust were to be paid from the "trust estate", without further delineation of what constitutes the "trust estate", the Supreme Court interpreted those words to mean the entire trust estate, and because the marital trust estate was the only remaining source of funding for the entire estate, the fees were to be paid from the marital trust estate. In re Estate of Dern, 279 M 138, 928 P2d 123, 53 St. Rep. 1087 (1996).

New Trial Granted Regarding Validity of Will — Award of Attorney Fees Reversed: In light of the Supreme Court's decision to grant a new trial on the issue of the validity of a will and an instrument of revocation, the award of attorney fees to the prevailing party in the first trial was reversed. In re Estate of DeCock, 278 M 437, 925 P2d 488, 53 St. Rep. 992 (1996).

Section Inapplicable When Validity or Probate Not at Issue: Attorney fees are not payable under this section when the validity or probate of a will is not involved. In re Estate of Morris, 254 M 368, 838 P2d 402, 49 St. Rep. 739 (1992).

Persons or Property Liable for Costs:

When probate is revoked on the ground of undue influence by the person who resisted revocation, the costs must be paid by that party even though he was administrator under the will and would not, under section 91-1105, R.C.M. 1947 (since repealed), be liable for good faith acts during his administration. In re Hardy's Estate, 133 M 443, 325 P2d 694 (1958).

Under this section, the Trial Court may in its discretion order that the costs incident to the revocation of the probate of a will be paid out of the property of the decedent if the revocation was resisted in good faith and upon substantial grounds, or, in case of bad faith and without justification, tax them against the party who resisted revocation. In re Carroll's Estate, 59 M 403, 196 P 996 (1921).

Former Law — This Statute as Controlling General Statute: In matters relating to a will contest after probate this section controls over the general statute, section 91-3405, R.C.M. 1947 (since repealed), with respect to expenses and costs. In re Kesl's Estate, 117 M 377, 161 P2d 641 (1945).

Will Revocation — Liability Only for Costs: Under this section the Legislature intended that, when the will is revoked, no liability should attach other than the costs, as judicially determined and defined by the Supreme Court. In re Kesl's Estate, 117 M 377, 161 P2d 641 (1945).

Persons or Property Liable for Costs — Executors: When executors would have been remiss in the performance of their duty had they not made defense against the attack upon the will sought to be set aside and there was ample justification for the defense, the District Court abused its discretion in taxing the costs against executors individually. In re Carroll's Estate, 59 M 403, 196 P 996 (1921).

Case Notes

Father's Priority Over Public Administrator — Fourteen-Month Delay in Opening Estate: Fourteen months after the death of his son in a traffic accident, the father applied to be personal representative of his son's estate in response to a proceeding to appoint a public administrator so that the estate could be sued for insurance money on behalf of another who had died in the accident. No prior application for personal representative was required because the son left no estate to be administered. The father has priority to be personal representative under 72-3-502, notwithstanding speculation that in the accident trial he might be accorded more sympathy as father of the deceased than a public administrator would be accorded. The requirement of 72-15-102 that a public administrator may not file a petition for letters until after 30 days has elapsed does not raise a burden of justifying the delay on some other person applying for letters later than 30 days after a death. Official Bond — Liability of Sureties: The sureties on the official bond of a Public Administrator for his second term of office are not liable for a conversion of funds of an estate where his letters were issued during his first term of office, although it appears that the conversion occurred during his second term. O'Rourke v. Harper, 35 M 346, 89 P 65 (1907).

CHAPTER 16
ESTATE AND GENERATION-SKIPPING TAXES

DECISIONS UNDER FORMER LAW

Annuity Contract Considered Investment, Not Life Insurance: Miles invested $30,000 in a tax-deferred variable annuity contract. After Mile's death, the plaintiffs demanded one-half of the annuity investment on grounds that the annuity was life insurance that they were entitled to under Miles' will. The District Court denied their demand, holding that the annuity contract did not constitute insurance under Montana law. On appeal, the heirs cited In re Fligman's Estate, 113 M 505, 129 P2d 627 (1942), for the proposition that because annuity contracts were considered insurance for inheritance tax purposes in that case, it followed that annuity contracts have to be considered insurance for all purposes. The Supreme Court held that because the annuity contract in Miles' case did not involve indemnification, loss, damage, liability, or contingent events, it was an investment, not insurance, and the District Court did not err in so holding. In re Estate of Miles v. Miles, 2000 MT 41, 298 M 312, 994 P2d 1139, 57 St. Rep. 191 (2000).

Definition of Farm for Purposes of Eminent Domain — Use of Otherwise Inapplicable Definition — Use of Ordinary Meaning of Undefined Term: The Richters brought an action in District Court to condemn an easement across the land of a neighbor that surrounded their property on three sides. The District Court held that the definition of farm in 72-16-331(7) (now repealed) applied to the use of that term in 70-30-102(6), reasoning that because the term "farm" was undefined in Title 70, ch. 30, the definition in 72-16-331(7) (now repealed) should be applied because 1-2-107 provides that a definition contained in one section of law should be used for the purposes of other sections of law unless "a contrary intention plainly appears". The District Court then entered a preliminary condemnation order in favor of the Richters. The Supreme Court held that a contrary intention did in fact appear because the Legislature had, by use of the phrase "as used in 72-16-331 through 72-16-349" (all now repealed), limited the application of the terms defined in 72-16-331 (now repealed) to only 72-16-331 through 72-16-349 (all now repealed). Because farm was then left undefined for the purposes of Title 70, ch. 30, the Supreme Court applied the definition found in the American Heritage Dictionary and held that the Richters' property did not qualify as a farm, as defined in that dictionary, because the Richters had not prepared, fertilized, or tilled the soil on their property nor had they cited any authority for the Supreme Court to hold that naturally occurring timber on the property was a crop. The Supreme Court therefore reversed the condemnation order of the District Court. Richter v. Rose, 1998 MT 165, 289 M 379, 962 P2d 583, 55 St. Rep. 663 (1998), followed in Myers v. Dee, 2011 MT 244, 362 Mont. 178, 261 P.3d 1054.

Taxation of Joint Tenancies to Be Based on Full Value of Tenancies — Law to Be Determined at Time of Death — Finding of Ownership of Tenancies Clearly Erroneous: More than 3 years before his death in 1991, Emelio created 18 joint tenancies in his personal property with members of his extended family. As a joint tenant, Emelio retained a joint interest in the items of personal property until his death. Upon Emelio's death, all of the property was transferred to the other joint tenants. Emelio's estate paid taxes on the full value of the joint tenancies but challenged the Department of Revenue's calculation, claiming that the tax should be based on only 50% of each joint tenancy. The District Court agreed, finding that some of the joint tenants had contributed to the tenancies. Citing Burr v. Dept. of Revenue, 175 M 473, 575 P2d 45 (1978), the Supreme Court held that the law must be applied as of the date of Emelio's death and that it was therefore erroneous for the District Court to apply both the 1987 version of 72-16-303 (now repealed) and the rationale in Dept. of Revenue v. Dwyer, 236 M 405, 771 P2d 93 (1989), rather than the 1989 version of the statute. The later version of the statute requires the tax to be paid on the full value of the tenancy unless the surviving joint tenant can prove that the surviving tenant provided consideration or that the surviving tenant previously owned the property. The Supreme Court held that the District Court erroneously treated all Emelio's joint tenancy estates created more than 3 years before 1991 as a gift and that treatment is not contemplated by the statute nor were the tenancies intended as a gift because Emelio retained a joint interest for himself in all the property. The Supreme Court also held that the findings of the District Court that several of the other joint tenants contributed to the tenancies were not supported by the evidence and were therefore clearly erroneous and that the full value of the joint tenancy was therefore to be taxed. In re Estate of Parini, 279 M 85, 926 P2d 741, 53 St. Rep. 1062 (1996).

Gift Made in Contemplation of Death Held Taxable — Decedent Required to File Federal Gift Tax Return: Langendorf gifted real property worth $128,000 to Dean and Teresa Hayden 2 years before his death. The personal representative subtracted $20,000 ($10,000 per donee) from the value of the property as an "annual gift exclusion" on a Department of Revenue form. The Department disallowed the exclusion and determined inheritance taxes on a value of $128,000. The District Court upheld the exclusion. The Supreme Court noted that 72-16-301 (now repealed) provides that transfers in contemplation of death are generally taxable and noted that the gift is also taxable because the Internal Revenue Code provision cited in 72-16-301 (now repealed) requires the filing of a federal gift tax return. The Supreme Court also analyzed the 1989 editorial comment to 72-16-301 (now repealed) and found that the Legislature did intend to conform 72-16-301 (now repealed) to federal estate tax statutes rather than gift tax statutes. The Supreme Court noted that nothing in the comment indicates that the Legislature intended to incorporate federal gift tax exemptions into the state statute. The reference to the gift tax provisions merely provides a trigger to determine whether a transfer is taxable under Montana inheritance tax law. Estate of Langendorf, 262 M 123, 863 P2d 434, 50 St. Rep. 1474 (1993).

Department of Revenue — Rule Conflicting With Statutory Law Invalid: More than 3 years prior to his death, decedent created a joint tenancy with an individual not his spouse or issue, using property solely his. The Department's regulations relating to statutory law require a tax levy on the full value of the joint tenancy property when the survivor made no contribution. The Supreme Court held that the Department's interpretation of statutory law was incorrect and that only one-half of the property value was subject to taxation. The Department regulations conflicting with statutory law are of no effect. Dept. of Revenue v. Estate of Dwyer, 236 M 405, 771 P2d 93, 46 St. Rep. 463 (1989).

Joint Tenancy Created Three Years Prior to Death — No Contribution by Survivor: More than 3 years prior to his death, decedent created a joint tenancy with an individual not his spouse or issue, using only his property. Upon his death, the Department of Revenue argued that the total value of the property transferred to the survivor was taxable. The Supreme Court affirmed the lower court's ruling that only one-half of the value was taxable because, pursuant to 72-16-301(3)

(now repealed), no transfer made more than 3 years prior to death "shall be treated as having been made in contemplation of death". The court also held that 72-2-303(2) (now repealed) did not apply to subject transfers to nonspouses or nonissue for full value taxation if the transfer was made 3 years prior to transferor's death. Dept. of Revenue v. Estate of Dwyer, 236 M 405, 771 P2d 93, 46 St. Rep. 463 (1989), distinguished in In re Estate of Parini, 279 M 85, 926 P2d 741, 53 St. Rep. 1062 (1996).

Withdrawal From Joint Bank Account Within Three Years of Death: All of the funds in a joint tenancy bank account were withdrawn by one tenant within 3 years of the death of the other tenant. Regardless of the first tenant's intentions, she did not become the alter ego or agent of the deceased tenant. A transfer in contemplation of death did not occur. In re Sinclair, 197 M 29, 640 P2d 918, 39 St. Rep. 331 (1982).

Dower Subject to Inheritance Tax: A widow who takes property under statutory dower allowance takes under the intestate laws, and the property will be subject to inheritance tax. Stovall v. Dept. of Revenue, 165 M 180, 527 P2d 62 (1974).

Tenants in Common: When husband died after he and his wife had conveyed land owned as tenants in common to sons, reserving a life estate with right of survivorship, the wife, who obtained deceased husband's one-half interest in land, was subject to inheritance tax on husband's interest under 72-16-303 (now repealed) but sons' interests were not taxable until termination of the mother's life estate. In re Hess' Estate, 145 M 552, 403 P2d 748 (1965).

Possession Postponed: When husband and wife held real property as tenants in common, but transferred one half of the property to one son, and the other half to the other son, reserving a life estate in each piece of property with right of survivorship, on father's death sons were not subject to inheritance tax until termination of the mother's intervening life estate. In re Hess' Estate, 145 M 552, 403 P2d 748 (1965).

Intangible Personal Property: Intangible personal property situated in Pennsylvania, but which was owned by a resident decedent in Montana, is subject to inheritance tax in Montana. In re Maher's Estate, 140 M 476, 373 P2d 520 (1962).

Life Insurance Proceeds: Section 72-16-304 (now repealed) was adopted in order that insurance proceeds above $50,000 might be brought within the general provisions of 72-16-301 (now repealed). In re Holland's Estate, 136 M 324, 347 P2d 473 (1959).

Burden of Proof — Contemplation of Death: Burden of proof is upon the transferee to overcome the presumption that the gift was made in contemplation of death if the transfer was made within 3 years prior to the death of the donor. But, if the gift were made more than 3 years prior to the death of the grantor, the burden of proof is upon the state to show that in fact the gift was made in contemplation of death. In re Ludington's Estate, 134 M 384, 333 P2d 873 (1958).

Gift to Daughter: Sometime prior to May 3, 1949, deceased made a gift of $10,000 to his daughter, who was seeking a loan rather than a gift, but was informed by her father that he preferred to make a gift outright, which was explained in his will. Decedent died on May 4, 1954, at the age of 72 years. This amount was properly excluded from his estate for the purpose of inheritance tax. In re Ludington's Estate, 134 M 384, 333 P2d 873 (1958).

Satisfaction of Mortgage: Forgiveness of debt, which was not made by will, but made by a duly executed and recorded satisfaction of mortgage made and recorded more than 3 years prior to the death of the decedent, was properly excluded from his estate for the purpose of inheritance tax. In re Ludington's Estate, 134 M 384, 333 P2d 873 (1958).

Gifts Not Subject to Tax: Gifts by decedent to his son and daughter were not subject to inheritance tax where the only effect of the mention of these gifts in the will was to explain why the decedent did not give them more and to show that they were not overlooked. The transferees took nothing by virtue of the will. The gifts had been made before the will was made and had been completed and the transfer vested title to the property in the donees without reference to the will. In re Ludington's Estate, 134 M 384, 333 P2d 873 (1958).

Family Partnership: Decedent, who died intestate on November 12, 1952, at age 78, on December 10, 1951, gave undivided one-seventh interest in his ranch, livestock, and equipment used in its operation to each of his five children and his wife, retaining an undivided one-seventh interest for himself, and the family then organized a partnership to continue operations. Donor paid federal gift tax thereon. At the time of the transfers donor was in good health and making preparations for a trip to Africa. District Court properly held that the transfers were not made in contemplation of death and were not taxable. In re Keating's Estate, 134 M 372, 332 P2d 906 (1958).

Correction of Deed: In a proceeding by wife to terminate joint tenancy and determine inheritance tax, decedent having died on December 11, 1954, at age 74 from injuries sustained in an automobile accident, the Court properly excluded one-half the value of the farm land from the inheritance tax, where transfer of title was made by decedent to himself and his wife to correct error in deed to him alone in 1938, on December 9, 1952, while decedent was in good health and was not contemplating death. St. v. Rice, 134 M 265, 329 P2d 451 (1958).

Presumption of Gift in Contemplation of Death: The transfer of one-half interest in farm land to wife, having been made within 3 years prior to the death of the grantor, is presumed to have been made in contemplation of death, unless shown to the contrary. St. v. Rice, 134 M 265, 329 P2d 451 (1958).

Intangible Property: The interest of a vendor in a contract to sell real estate is intangible property. In re Briebach's Estate, 132 M 437, 318 P2d 223 (1957).

Test to Determine Whether or Not Gift Is in Contemplation of Death: Generally, the test to be applied is to ascertain the dominant motive of the donor in the light of his bodily and mental condition, and "the best evidence of the decedent's state of mind at the time and the reasons for making the transfers are the statements and expressions of the decedent himself". In re Warren's Estate, 128 M 395, 275 P2d 843 (1954).

Transfer of Farm Corporate Stock Not in Contemplation of Death: When decedent after forming a corporation for the operation of his farm transferred some of the stock to members of his family who had been working on the farm and evidence disclosed that it was because he had offered them a share in the business if they worked in it, the gifts were not in contemplation of death and were made for purposes associated with life rather than with death. In re Warren's Estate, 128 M 395, 275 P2d 843 (1954).

Effect of Owner of Real Property Being a Resident of a Community Property State: When the decedent was a resident of California and had used community property funds to purchase land in Montana, there was still an inheritance tax due on the whole of the land value in Montana when it was devised to his wife. She did not have an undivided one-half interest in the Montana land by virtue of the California community property laws, since the effect of the community property laws does not vest title in her automatically but it does enlarge her "bundle of right". In re Hunter's Estate, 125 M 315, 236 P2d 94 (1951).

At or After Death:

For there to be an absolute inter vivos gift and not taxable as a transfer in contemplation of death, there must be the expiration of the presumptive period and an absence of proof to the contrary. If there is no delivery to the cotenant, the transfer is one to take effect at or after death and is taxable as such. In re Marsh's Estate, 125 M 239, 234 P2d 459 (1951).

When person with her own funds purchased Series G United States savings bonds payable to her or in the alternative to another person named on the bonds, and she retained control of the bonds, they were not "held in the joint names of two or more persons" within the meaning of 72-16-303 (now repealed), and they amounted to a transfer to take effect at or after death taxable at their full market value under 72-16-301 (now repealed). St. Bd. of Equalization v. Cole, 122 M 9, 195 P2d 989 (1948), distinguished in In re Kuhr's Estate, 123 M 593, 220 P2d 83 (1950) and Petition of Hanson, 125 M 174, 232 P2d 342 (1951).

Deed in Escrow: When deed to hotel property was deposited in escrow and the agreement required the grantee, a stranger, to pay certain specified amounts monthly for a period of 3 years after which he was to pay a certain amount monthly for the remainder of the lifetime of the grantor which amount was not disproportionately less than the value of the property, and the grantee was to have immediate possession, make repairs, and carry insurance on the property, there was not a taxable transfer of property in contemplation of death. In re Sebree's Estate, 122 M 509, 206 P2d 553 (1949).

Joint Bank Account: When money, solely the property of one person, was deposited in a joint bank account payable either to her or the other person without consideration, and such deposit was made within 3 years of the death of the person, half of the account was a gift in contemplation of death and taxable under 72-16-301 (now repealed) and after the death of the person the half then received by right of survivorship is taxable under 72-16-303 (now repealed). St. Bd. of Equalization v. Cole, 122 M 9, 195 P2d 989 (1948), distinguished in In re Kuhr's Estate, 123 M 593, 220 P2d 83 (1950), and Petition of Hanson, 125 M 174, 232 P2d 342 (1951).

Property Held in Trust Not Subject to Tax: When the owner of property placed it in the name of his wife in trust with the understanding that she would reconvey to him at his request and she about 5 months before her death did so, the deed being properly recorded, the husband was at all times the owner and therefore did not acquire the property by inheritance, thus rendering the retransfer from wife to husband nontaxable. The husband would not acquire it by inheritance upon termination of the trusteeship by death, since the decedent merely held the record title to the property in trust for another. In re Mayer's Estate, 110 M 66, 99 P2d 209 (1940).

Insufficiency of Evidence to Show Transfer in Contemplation of Death: Evidence that ranch lands were deeded by husband to wife and the deeds placed of record and the two used their lands together and had a joint bank account in which all proceeds of the ranching operations were placed, each being free to draw checks against the account, was insufficient to show that the transfers were intended to take effect at or after the grantor's death, even though it also appeared that the lands were assessed to grantor and he alone made an income tax return, including income from the deeded lands. State ex rel. Blankenbaker v. District Court, 109 M 331, 96 P2d 936 (1939), overruled on another point, State ex rel. Reid v. District Court, 126 M 489, 255 P2d 693 (1953).

Statute Not Retroactive: There is nothing in the amendment of subsection 3 of sec. 1, Ch. 105, L. 1927, by subsection 3 of sec. 1, Ch. 186, L. 1935, which changed the word "two" to "three" preceding the word "years" to indicate that the act was intended to operate retroactively, and it has no application to transfers made in 1934 before its enactment. It is a general rule that statutes are intended to operate prospectively only, unless otherwise expressly stated or clearly and necessarily implied; the presumption is against retroactive operation. (See 1-2-109.) State ex rel. Blankenbaker v. District Court, 109 M 331, 96 P2d 936 (1939), overruled on another point, State ex rel. Reid v. District Court, 126 M 489, 255 P2d 693 (1953).

Transfers or Gifts Taxable:

A voluntary transfer of property made "in contemplation of death" and as such taxable under the inheritance tax law, as amended (Ch. 105, L. 1927), is one the making of which is induced by the same consideration which leads to a testamentary disposition thereof and as a substitute therefor, i.e., the thought of death, irrespective of whether or not death is believed to be near or imminent. In re Wadsworth's Estate, 92 M 135, 11 P2d 788 (1932).

When a transfer or gift is not to take effect in possession or enjoyment until after the death of the transferor or donor, whether made in contemplation of death or not, it is subject to inheritance tax. In re Oppenheimer's Estate, 75 M 186, 243 P 589, 44 ALR 1470 (1926).

For a gift or transfer to escape the imposition of an inheritance tax, it must have been made for a valuable consideration in praesenti. In re Oppenheimer's Estate, 75 M 186, 243 P 589, 44 ALR 1470 (1926).

Mortgages Subject to Tax: By enacting Ch. 150, L. 1925, amending 72-16-301 (now repealed), the Legislature intended to impose an inheritance tax on the succession or devolution of all real and personal property of every kind and description within the jurisdiction of the state and upon any interest therein (inter alia, upon mortgages), whether owned by a resident or nonresident at the time of his death. State ex rel. Walker v. Jones, 80 M 574, 261 P 356, 60 ALR 551 (1927).

Antenuptial Agreement: When under an antenuptial agreement certain sums of money were to be paid to the wife after the death of the husband in certain annual installments by his executors, in consideration of her relinquishment of her right of dower and any other claims she might be entitled to assert against his estate as his widow or next of kin, the total amount of such gifts was subject to inheritance tax. In re Oppenheimer's Estate, 75 M 186, 243 P 589, 44 ALR 1470 (1926).

Nature of Tax — Power of the State:

The beneficiary of an estate has no claim by right of blood or otherwise to the estate of a decedent, except as the law gives it to him, and the state may impose such taxes or conditions on distributive shares as it considers proper. In re Oppenheimer's Estate, 75 M 186, 243 P 589, 44 ALR 1470 (1926).

The inheritance tax is imposed upon the right to transfer, not upon the estate. In re Oppenheimer's Estate, 75 M 186, 243 P 589, 44 ALR 1470 (1926).

An inheritance tax is not one on property and there is no natural right to receive property by will or inheritance, it being within power of the state to impose such conditions to succession to property within its jurisdiction as it may consider appropriate, the term "jurisdiction" in this connection meaning power over the particular res or subject. State ex rel. Bankers' Trust Co. v. Walker, 70 M 484, 226 P 894 (1924).

Stock of Foreign Corporation:

Under 72-16-301 (now repealed), providing for a tax on direct and collateral inheritances, the state may not lawfully collect an inheritance tax upon the right of a nonresident legatee to succeed to shares of the capital stock of a foreign corporation doing business in the state, bequeathed to him by a nonresident, where the certificates representing the stock are kept at the place of domicile of the testator. State ex rel. Bankers' Trust Co. v. Walker, 70 M 484, 226 P 894 (1924).

For the purpose of imposing a succession tax, jurisdiction exists only when the exercise of some essential privilege in relation to the transfer of title (to stock in a foreign corporation in this instance) depends for its legality upon the law of the state levying the tax. State ex rel. Bankers' Trust Co. v. Walker, 70 M 484, 226 P 894 (1924).

Shares of stock of a corporation chartered under the laws of another state and belonging to a nonresident are not subject to an inheritance tax in this state. State ex rel. Bankers' Trust Co. v. Walker, 70 M 484, 226 P 894 (1924).

Constitutionality: Article XII, sec. 11, 1889 Mont. Const., which provided that taxes shall be levied and collected by general laws and for public purposes only and shall be uniform upon the same class of subjects within the territorial limits of the authority levying the tax, related to property taxes only and not to such as are imposed on inheritance. State ex rel. Rankin v. District Court, 70 M 322, 225 P 804 (1924), explained in In re Clark's Estate, 105 M 401, 74 P2d 401 (1937).

OPINIONS UNDER FORMER LAW

Restoration and Repair of Daly Mansion: There is no indication in 72-16-445 (now repealed) and the following sections (part now repealed) that the Legislature intended to except property so transferred from the requirements of law regarding public construction contracts. Restoration and repair of the state-owned Daly Mansion are subject to 18-2-102 and 18-2-103. 42 A.G. Op. 66 (1988).

When Private Corporation Subject to Open Meeting Law: The Daly Mansion Preservation Trust, Incorporated, a private nonprofit corporation contracting with a state agency to restore and preserve state-owned property obtained under 72-16-445 through 72-16-450 (all now repealed), is a public body within the meaning of the open meeting law since it is performing a public function and is receiving funds generated by public property. 42 A.G. Op. 42 (1987).

Determination of Tax — Termination

Part Case Notes

DECISIONS UNDER FORMER LAW

Law Governing Personal Property Decided by Situs of Property and Domicile of Owner — Tenancy by the Entirety Impermissible Mode of Personal Property Ownership in Montana: A Montana District Court determined that personal property jointly owned by Lurie and her husband as tenancy by the entirety in Missouri was owned by them either as joint tenancy property or as tenancy in common property after the couple moved to Montana. The property was subject to execution to satisfy a judgment against the husband on a validly issued writ. Lurie contended that as tenancy by the entirety property, it was not subject to execution to satisfy a judgment against the husband only, because Missouri law followed the personal property and should be applied in Montana. The Supreme Court concluded that the District Court was correct in determining that the law governing personal property is decided by the situs of the property and the domicile of the owner, so Montana law applied. Further, under Clark v. Clark, 143 M 183, 387 P2d 907 (1963), tenancy by the entirety is not a permissible mode of real property ownership in Montana, and the District Court properly extended the reasoning in Clark with equal force to personal property in Lurie's case. Lurie v. Sheriff, 2000 MT 103, 299 M 283, 999 P2d 342, 57 St. Rep. 414 (2000), distinguishing Dorwart v. Caraway, 1998 MT 191, 290 M 196, 966 P2d 1121 (1998).

Taxation of Joint Tenancies to Be Based on Full Value of Tenancies — Law to Be Determined at Time of Death — Finding of Ownership of Tenancies Clearly Erroneous: More than 3 years before his death in 1991, Emelio created 18 joint tenancies in his personal property with members of his extended family. As a joint tenant, Emelio retained a joint interest in the items of personal property until his death. Upon Emelio's death, all of the property was transferred to the other joint tenants. Emelio's estate paid taxes on the full value of the joint tenancies but challenged the Department of Revenue's calculation, claiming that the tax should be based on only 50% of each joint tenancy. The District Court agreed, finding that some of the joint tenants had contributed to the tenancies. Citing Burr v. Dept. of Revenue, 175 M 473, 575 P2d 45 (1978), the Supreme Court held that the law must be applied as of the date of Emelio's death and that it was therefore erroneous for the District Court to apply both the 1987 version of 72-16-303 (now repealed) and the rationale in Dept. of Revenue v. Dwyer, 236 M 405, 771 P2d 93 (1989), rather than the 1989 version of the statute. The later version of the statute requires the tax to be paid on the full value of the tenancy unless the surviving joint tenant can prove that the surviving tenant provided consideration or that the surviving tenant previously owned the property. The Supreme Court held that the District Court erroneously treated all Emelio's joint tenancy estates created more than 3 years before 1991 as a gift and that treatment is not contemplated by the statute nor were the tenancies intended as a gift because Emelio retained a joint interest for himself in all the property. The Supreme Court also held that the findings of the District Court that several of the other joint tenants contributed to the tenancies were not supported by the evidence and were therefore clearly erroneous and that the full value of the joint tenancy was therefore to be taxed. In re Estate of Parini, 279 M 85, 926 P2d 741, 53 St. Rep. 1062 (1996).

Department of Revenue — Rule Conflicting With Statutory Law Invalid: More than 3 years prior to his death, decedent created a joint tenancy with an individual not his spouse or issue, using property solely his. The Department's regulations relating to statutory law require a tax levy on the full value of the joint tenancy property when the survivor made no contribution. The Supreme Court held that the Department's interpretation of statutory law was incorrect and that only one-half of the property value was subject to taxation. The Department regulations conflicting with statutory law are of no effect. Dept. of Revenue v. Estate of Dwyer, 236 M 405, 771 P2d 93, 46 St. Rep. 463 (1989).

Joint Tenancy Created Three Years Prior to Death — No Contribution by Survivor: More than 3 years prior to his death, decedent created a joint tenancy with an individual not his spouse or issue, using only his property. Upon his death, the Department of Revenue argued that the total value of the property transferred to the survivor was taxable. The Supreme Court affirmed the lower court's ruling that only one-half of the value was taxable because, pursuant to 72-16-301(3) (now repealed), no transfer made more than 3 years prior to death "shall be treated as having been made in contemplation of death". The court also held that 72-16-303(2) (now repealed) does not apply to subject transfers to nonspouses or nonissue for full value taxation if the transfer was made 3 years prior to transferor's death. Dept. of Revenue v. Estate of Dwyer, 236 M 405, 771 P2d 93, 46 St. Rep. 463 (1989), distinguished in In re Estate of Parini, 279 M 85, 926 P2d 741, 53 St. Rep. 1062 (1996).

Estate by the Entireties: Estate by the entireties is not a permissible mode of ownership of property in Montana. Clark v. Clark, 143 M 183, 387 P2d 907 (1963), followed in Lurie v. Sheriff, 2000 MT 103, 299 M 283, 999 P2d 342, 57 St. Rep. 414 (2000), in which tenancy by the entirety as applied to personal property was held an impermissible mode of ownership in Montana in the same way that tenancy by the entirety as applied to real property was held impermissible in Clark.

United States Savings Bonds:

United States bonds issued in the names of the husband and wife were not subject to inheritance taxes where the bonds were purchased by the surviving husband from his own funds. In re Powell's Estate, 142 M 133, 381 P2d 957 (1963).

United States bonds issued in names of mother and son were not subject to inheritance taxes on death of mother where the surviving son, while in the service, sent money home out of his army pay to have the bonds purchased for him. In re Powell's Estate, 142 M 133, 381 P2d 957 (1963).

In estates where the death occurred before March 1, 1951, the effective date of 72-16-303 (now repealed), the tax on government series E and G bonds is generally imposed by 72-16-301 (now repealed). In re Marsh's Estate, 125 M 239, 234 P2d 459 (1951).

Government bonds can never be held in tenancy by the entirety, because either cotenant may sell the bonds upon surrender of the bonds and receive the full accrued value; while the very characteristic that distinguishes the tenancy by the entirety from other cotenancies is that neither of the cotenants alone can terminate the tenancy or sever the estate. In re Marsh's Estate, 125 M 239, 234 P2d 459 (1951).

United States savings bonds registered jointly in the name of the decedent and one of her three children and kept in a safe deposit box in the name of the decedent and one of her children to which such daughter had access did not constitute a gift to any of the children. The possession remained joint, and the bonds were taxable. In re Brown's Estate, 122 M 451, 206 P2d 816 (1949).

When person with her own funds purchased Series G United States savings bonds payable to her or in the alternative to another person named on the bonds, and she retained control of the bonds, they were not "held in the joint names of two or more persons" within the meaning of 72-16-303 (now repealed) and they amounted to a transfer to take effect at or after death taxable at their full market value under 72-16-301 (now repealed). St. Bd. of Equalization v. Cole, 122 M 9, 195 P2d 989 (1948), distinguished in In re Kuhr's Estate, 123 M 593, 220 P2d 83 (1950) and Petition of Hanson, 125 M 174, 232 P2d 342 (1951).

Character of Insurance Proceeds: If the insurance proceeds or the right thereto vest in the beneficiary, they then lose their life insurance characteristic and become ordinary assets, and this is true even though the proceeds may actually be paid to the beneficiary's estate. In re Holland's Estate, 136 M 324, 347 P2d 473 (1959).

Purpose of Section: Section 72-16-304 (now repealed) was adopted in order that insurance proceeds above $50,000 (see 1997 amendment) might be brought within the general provisions of 72-16-301 (now repealed). In re Holland's Estate, 136 M 324, 347 P2d 473 (1959).

Insurance Defined to Include Annuity:

Annuity policies are "insurance" within the meaning of 72-16-304 (now repealed). In re Hammerstrom's Estate, 133 M 469, 326 P2d 699 (1958); In re O'Grady's Estate, 133 M 594, 326 P2d 705 (1958).

Annuity contracts issued by life insurance companies constitute "insurance" and as such are immune from taxation under 72-16-304 (now repealed) unless in excess of $50,000 (see 1997 amendment), because of the provisions contained in sections 40-1001, 40-1301, 40-1302, and 66-2003, R.C.M. 1947 (now repealed), and there being nothing in the general statutes relating to life insurance companies repudiating the propriety of classifying annuities as insurance. In re Fligman's Estate, 113 M 505, 129 P2d 627 (1942), distinguished in In re Harper's Estate, 124 M 52, 218 P2d 927 (1950), In re Coleman's Estate, 132 M 339, 317 P2d 880 (1957), and In re Estate of Miles v. Miles, 2000 MT 41, 298 M 312, 994 P2d 1139, 57 St. Rep. 191 (2000).

Amount of Exclusion From Gross Estate: Decedent's gross estate aggregated $378,916.29, and $64,761.33 thereof represented proceeds from life insurance policies. Of this, $16,536.29 was payable to named beneficiaries. The balance of the life insurance proceeds, $48,225.04, was made payable to the executor of the estate. District Court was not in error in determining that $50,000 was exempt from inheritance tax (see 1997 amendment). In re Cline's Estate, 132 M 328, 317 P2d 874 (1957).

Annuity Proceeds: When total amount of annuity proceeds and insurance was $53,276.26, and the amount of proceeds from the annuity was $2,813.61, the $50,000 exemption (see 1997 amendment) did not extend to these annuity proceeds. In re Coleman's Estate, 132 M 339, 317 P2d 880 (1957).

Application of Statute:

Section 72-16-304 (now repealed) was a specific statute exempting all insurance proceeds up to $50,000 (see 1997 amendment) and taxing insurance proceeds over and above that amount. It makes no difference to whom the proceeds are payable, whether named beneficiaries, trustees, or personal representatives of the decedent. In re Cline's Estate, 132 M 328, 317 P2d 874 (1957); In re Coleman's Estate, 132 M 339, 317 P2d 880 (1957).

Naming ultimate beneficiaries of life insurance policies in trust agreement and not in insurance policies did not make proceeds subject to tax to the extent that they did not exceed $50,000 (see 1997 amendment). In re Coleman's Estate, 132 M 339, 317 P2d 880 (1957).

Joint Bank Account:

In the case of joint bank accounts where it can be shown that the money was originally furnished by the survivor and none by the decedent, the account is not taxable, for it comes within the exception in 72-16-303 (now repealed). Petition of Hanson, 125 M 174, 232 P2d 342 (1951).

When money, solely the property of one person, was deposited in a joint bank account payable either to her or the other person without consideration, and such deposit was made within 3 years of the death of the person, half of the account was a gift in contemplation of death and taxable under 72-16-301 (now repealed), and after the death of the person the half then received by right of survivorship is taxable under 72-16-303 (now repealed). St. Bd. of Equalization v. Cole, 122 M 9, 195 P2d 989 (1948), distinguished in In re Kuhr's Estate, 123 M 593, 220 P2d 83 (1950) and Petition of Hanson, 125 M 174, 232 P2d 342 (1951).

Joint Promissory Note: When the husband and wife hold a promissory note jointly it is taxable under 72-16-303 (now repealed). The property so taxed is the credits or choses in action, the various promissory notes, and that property never had belonged to the survivor prior to its acquisition by the husband and wife. Petition of Hanson, 125 M 174, 232 P2d 342 (1951).

Joint Purchase of Land: When a husband and wife purchase land jointly and the funds come from a joint bank account to which it can be shown that the husband originally contributed all the money, one-half of the realty is considered the wife's share upon her death, and it is subject to the tax imposed by 72-16-303 (now repealed). The fact that the consideration at some previous time came as a gift from one spouse to another is unimportant. In order for the exception in the statute to apply, it must be shown that the immediate joint tenancy originally belonged to the survivor prior to the creation of the immediate joint tenancy. Petition of Hanson, 125 M 174, 232 P2d 342 (1951).

Entire Estate Property of Surviving Spouse — No Tax Due: When property held in joint tenancy by husband and wife was purchased with the funds of the surviving husband, no inheritance tax was due on such property. In re Kuhr's Estate, 123 M 593, 220 P2d 83 (1950).

Matured Endowments Left With Insurer: Proceeds of life insurance policies which have matured as endowments and which are left with the insurance company at a fixed rate of interest, the principal sum payable at death, in accordance with one of the optional modes of settlement, are not exempt under the insurance exemption of 72-16-304 (now repealed). In re Harper's Estate, 124 M 52, 218 P2d 927 (1950), distinguished in In re Hammerstrom's Estate, 133 M 469, 326 P2d 699 (1958).

What Legal Rate Applicable: When trust was created in the year 1915 under which certain persons were to receive portions of the trust funds on the death of settlor of the trust who died in 1945, the transfer for inheritance tax purposes was to be taxed at the rate in existence in 1945 and not at the rate in existence in 1915. In re Kohrs' Estate, 122 M 145, 199 P2d 856, 5 ALR 2d 1046 (1948).

Constitutionality: Section 72-16-307 (now repealed) imposing an inheritance tax upon all estates of persons who died since April 1, 1921, remaining undistributed on the date of its approval, March 5, 1923, is a valid enactment and not open to attack on the grounds that it violates the equal protection of the law clause of the Constitution, is class legislation, and authorizes the taking of property without due process of law. State ex rel. Rankin v. District Court, 70 M 322, 225 P 804 (1924), explained in In re Clark's Estate, 105 M 401, 74 P2d 401 (1937).

Part Attorney General's Opinions

County Clerk — Joint Tenancy Terminations: County Clerk and Recorders are not required to issue "transfers of title" to survivors of a joint tenancy interest. Rather, upon filing of the application and certificates (form INH-3), the Clerk should index the transfer in the grantor and grantee index, noting the time and place of filing. The proper filing fee is $3. 37 A.G. Op. 134 (1978).

DECISIONS UNDER CURRENT LAW

Death of Partner — Disposition of Property Partners Held Jointly: Robert and William, brothers, opened a joint checking account in 1947, paid all ranch expenses through the account, put all ranch income in the account, and equally split net profits. All cattle were branded with either of two brands, each of which was registered in the name of "William Palmer or Robert Palmer". The brothers were also joint tenants in a commodity brokerage account. The Supreme Court held that the cattle and both accounts were partnership property not held in joint tenancy and remained so upon Robert's death. Thus, they did not pass to William as the surviving joint tenant; rather, they remained in the partnership for the purpose of winding up the partnership and paying its liabilities, after which William must account to Robert's survivor, his widow, for Robert's share of the partnership. By its very nature, partnership property must be treated differently than property of individuals, including property held by individuals as joint tenants but who are not in partnership. This rule applies regardless of the formal legal manner in which the property is held. This is a rule of equity developed over hundreds of years and codified in the Uniform Partnership Act. In re Estate of Palmer, 218 M 285, 708 P2d 242, 42 St. Rep. 1585 (1985), followed in Fiedler v. Fiedler, 266 M 133, 879 P2d 675, 51 St. Rep. 691 (1994).

DECISIONS UNDER FORMER LAW

Adopted Child — Rate of Tax: When death of decedent occurred prior to the approval of the documents for adoption of child, and decedent had taken him into his home and directed his education and remembered him in his will, the Court was correct in fixing the inheritance tax at 8% of the property so left as to a stranger of the blood, instead of at 2% as an adopted child, no contention being made that decedent had for not less than 10 years stood in the mutually acknowledged relation of a parent, but it being contended child was legally adopted. In re Clark's Estate, 105 M 401, 74 P2d 401, 114 ALR 496 (1937).

2000 Amendment by Referendum: Chapter 9 near beginning of introduction substituted "part" for "section"; at end deleted remainder of section that read: "(c) was the owner of any other interest in property requiring the determination of inheritance tax because of death.

(2) Except as provided in subsection (6), a remainderman, surviving joint tenant, or other interested party shall, upon the death of a decedent, file with the department of revenue:

(a) a copy of the death certificate;

(b) a verified application, in a form prescribed by the department, containing information that the department considers necessary; and

(c) evidence of the instruments that created the life estate, joint tenancy, or other interest requiring determination of inheritance tax, if required by the department.

(3) Upon receipt of the application, the department shall:

(a) stamp the filing date upon the application;

(b) issue a certificate showing the inheritance tax due, if any;

(c) affix the certificate to a certified copy of the application and return the certificate and copy to the applicant or the applicant's attorney; and

(d) affix a copy of the certificate to the original application and keep it on file with the department.

(4) The applicant shall pay the inheritance tax determined to the county treasurer for transmittal to the state treasurer. The county treasurer shall issue a receipt for the payment of the tax.

(5) If disputes arise as to tax computation, they must be resolved as provided under the laws applicable to the determination of inheritance taxes in estates.

(6) A surviving joint tenant described in 72-16-313(1) or (2) of a decedent whose aggregate value of the interest in the joint property is less than the federal estate tax filing requirement is not required to file under subsection (2)"; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective November 7, 2000.

Applicability: Section 38, Ch. 9, Sp. L. May 2000, provided: "This act applies to deaths occurring after December 31, 2000."

1999 Amendment: Chapter 113 in (6) substituted "described in 72-16-313(1) or (2)" for "who is the surviving spouse". Amendment effective March 19, 1999.

Retroactive Applicability: Section 4, Ch. 113, L. 1999, provided: "[This act] applies retroactively, within the meaning of 1-2-109, to estates of persons dying after December 31, 1998."

1995 Amendment: Chapter 391 in (2) inserted exception clause and after "shall" inserted "upon the death of a decedent"; inserted (6) concerning an exception to the filing requirement in subsection (2) for certain surviving joint tenants; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective April 12, 1995.

Retroactive Applicability: Section 5, Ch. 391, L. 1995, provided: "[This act] applies retroactively, within the meaning of 1-2-109, to deaths of holders of nonprobate interests occurring after July 1, 1979."

Apportionment of Taxes

Part Case Notes

DECISIONS UNDER FORMER LAW

Constitutionality of State Inheritance Tax on a Nonexercised Special Power of Appointment: Value of English intangible trust property is included in gross estate subject to state inheritance tax when domiciliary dies without exercising special power of appointment over trust as domicile is a constitutional basis for inheritance taxation without regard to whether succession was effected under the laws of the state of domicile. The power to control the disposition of property after death is the taxable event, and this control is as effectively maintained by the nonexercise of a special power of appointment as by its exercise. In either case decedent determines the ultimate disposition of the property and the course of succession. In re Estate of Ward, 168 M 396, 543 P2d 382 (1975).

Supervisory Control: The Supreme Court was without jurisdiction in State ex rel. Blankenbaker v. District Court, 109 M 331, 96 P2d 936 (1939), to review the record of the proceedings on its Writ of Supervisory Control since the relatrix had a clear and adequate remedy by appeal from the judgment and order fixing the tax which she was required to pay, all duly prescribed by written law, but she failed to avail herself of such remedy and the judgment and order became final and res judicata. Hence the opinion, decision, and holding of this Court in the case of State ex rel. Blankenbaker v. District Court, 109 M 331, 96 P2d 936 (1939), are expressly disapproved and overruled. State ex rel. Reid v. District Court, 126 M 489, 255 P2d 693 (1953).

Filing of Motion for Rehearing Not to Extend Time for Taking Appeal: The filing and pendency of a motion for a rehearing and new trial of an order determining an inheritance tax does not extend the time within which an appeal therefrom may be taken (60 days after its entry) and if not taken within that time, the appeal will be dismissed. In re Blankenbaker's Estate, 108 M 383, 91 P2d 401 (1939), explained in State ex rel. Reid v. District Court, 126 M 489, 255 P2d 693 (1953).

Order Denying Rehearing or Reappraisement Not Appealable: An appeal does not lie from an order denying a motion for a rehearing or reappraisement or a new trial of the issues in a proceeding for the determination of an inheritance tax, the statutes not authorizing it. In re Blankenbaker's Estate, 108 M 383, 91 P2d 401 (1939), explained in State ex rel. Reid v. District Court, 126 M 489, 255 P2d 693 (1953).

Case Notes

Public Policy in Favor of Statutory Apportionment Precluded by Specific Provisions in Will — Estate Taxes to Be Paid by Residual Estate: In In re Estate of Kuralt, 2000 MT 359, 303 M 335, 15 P3d 931 (2000), the Supreme Court found that a letter by the decedent was a valid holographic codicil to the decedent's will conveying real property in Montana to the decedent's companion, but a question remained whether the estate or the companion was responsible for the estate taxes on the Montana property. Under the law of New York, where the will was admitted to probate, and similar law in Montana, there is a strong public policy in favor of statutory apportionment unless the will provides otherwise. In this case, the decedent's will specifically provided that estate taxes be paid by the residual estate without apportionment, which included those generated by the bequest of the Montana property by codicil. Because the language of the will was clear and unambiguous, the District Court correctly concluded that estate taxes on the Montana property must be paid by the residual estate. In re Estate of Kuralt, 2003 MT 92, 315 M 177, 68 P3d 662 (2003).

Failure to Apportion Taxes Among All Persons Interested in Estate According to Proportionate Interest — Reversible Error: Two sisters, who were heirs to their mother's estate, contended that because their brother received a $70,300 gift from their mother, his share of the estate should be charged with the extra tax that resulted from the gift. The District Court agreed and charged the $26,999 gift tax liability against the brother's share of the inheritance. The brother appealed, contending that charging the estate's tax liability solely to his share of the estate violated this section. The Supreme Court concurred and reversed. This section requires that taxes be apportioned to each interested person in proportion to the person's interest in the estate, unless the will provides otherwise. The will in this case did not provide otherwise, so the District Court had no legal basis to charge the entire tax liability to the brother's share. On remand, the tax was ordered to be apportioned among the three heirs. In re Estate of Greenheck, 2001 MT 114, 305 M 308, 27 P3d 42 (2001).

Clear Language of Will Sufficient Alternative to Statutory Apportionment Method: Morris's will clearly indicated that the specific bequests, costs of administration, and all state and federal taxes were to be paid first and that the remainder of the residual estate was to be divided equally between her two families. This language was held to constitute an unambiguous method of apportionment that was a controlling alternative to the method provided in this section. In re Estate of Morris, 254 M 368, 838 P2d 402, 49 St. Rep. 739 (1992).

Tax Based on Will Distribution: An inheritance tax is computed according to a probated will, not according to the settlement agreement subsequently entered into among the beneficiaries. An inheritance tax is a tax on the right to receive property, rather than a tax on the property itself. In re Estate of Winter, 226 M 24, 734 P2d 178, 44 St. Rep. 430 (1987).

Does Not Apply to Foreign Countries: Section 72-16-317 (now repealed) limits tax credits to inheritance taxes paid to other states and territories of the United States and is not to be extended to death duty taxes paid to foreign countries. In re Estate of Ward, 168 M 396, 543 P2d 382 (1975).

Federal Estate Taxes: When a will does not otherwise provide for the payment of federal estate taxes, the payment must be equitably apportioned among residuary interests so that a residuary interest not generating any estate taxes does not bear any burden for their payment. Robinson v. U.S., 518 F2d 1105 (9th Cir. 1975), reversing 369 F. Supp. 925 (D.C. Mont. 1974).

DECISIONS UNDER FORMER LAW

Administrator Not Personally Liable for Tax on Insurance Paid Direct: When a decedent had entered into an annuity contract with an insurance company under which it was agreed that upon his death the payments should be made to his nieces, neither of whom was an heir at law or entitled to share in the estate remaining, and the payments were so made, the administrator could not be held personally liable for the tax on such amounts, since he never came into possession of them and could not deduct the amount of the tax from the distributive shares of the heirs at law. In re Powell's Estate, 110 M 213, 101 P2d 54, 128 ALR 116 (1940).

Each Legacy to Bear Own Proportionate Tax: Under 72-16-436 (now repealed) each specific share, interest, or legacy passing upon the death of a decedent must bear its proportionate part of the tax, and the share of one beneficiary cannot be used to pay the tax charged against that of another. In re Powell's Estate, 110 M 213, 101 P2d 54, 128 ALR 116 (1940).

Personal Liability Limited to Possibility to Enforce Payment: The provisions of 72-16-436 (now repealed) giving to executors and administrators power to sell property of estates to pay inheritance taxes, indicate strongly that the Legislature contemplated that such officers should be liable personally only in those cases where it was reasonably possible for them, as an incident of their duties in their official capacity, to enforce the payment of the tax from the beneficiaries upon whose right to succeed to the property the tax is based. In re Powell's Estate, 110 M 213, 101 P2d 54, 128 ALR 116 (1940).

Personal Liability of Executors and Administrators: Section 72-16-432 (now repealed) with reference to personal liability of administrators, executors, and trustees of estates for inheritance taxes until payment, is intended to mean personal liability only for the tax on property passing or which should pass through the hands of such officers or, at most, property impressed with a tax lien, which they might seize and sell in the same manner as they may do for the payment of estate debts under 72-16-436 (now repealed). In re Powell's Estate, 110 M 213, 101 P2d 54, 128 ALR 116 (1940).

Postponement of Payment Due to Litigation: Where litigation over the payment of an inheritance tax is conducted in good faith and plaintiff is even only partially successful, the interest payable on the amount due is only 6%, not 10%. (See In re Clark's Estate, 105 M 401, 74 P2d 401, 114 ALR 496 (1937).) State ex rel. Blankenbaker v. District Court, 109 M 331, 96 P2d 936 (1939), overruled on another point, State ex rel. Reid v. District Court, 126 M 489, 255 P2d 693 (1953).

Necessary Litigation: Provision to exact 10% interest if inheritance tax not paid within 18 months unless necessary litigation or other unavoidable delay intervene in which case it shall be 6% except that "litigation to defeat the payment of the tax is not necessary litigation", is not open to construction that 10% shall apply to all litigation, whether justified or successful or not, the purpose being to prevent unjustified delay by unnecessary litigation. In re Clark's Estate, 105 M 401, 74 P2d 401, 114 ALR 496 (1937).

Estate Tax

Part Case Notes

No Annual Gift Exclusion Allowed as Deduction in Valuation of Real Property Gifted in Contemplation of Death: Langendorf gifted real property worth $128,000 to Dean and Teresa Hayden 2 years before his death. The personal representative subtracted $20,000 ($10,000 per donee) from the value of the property as an "annual gift exclusion" on a Department of Revenue form. The Department disallowed the exclusion and determined inheritance taxes on a value of $128,000. The District Court upheld the exclusion. The Supreme Court applied the language of the statute and, citing GBN, Inc. v. Dept. of Revenue, 249 M 261, 815 P2d 595 (1991), the general rule of taxation that an item may constitute a deduction only when the Legislature specifically establishes the deduction. The Supreme Court held that under the plain meaning of the statute, a deduction is not allowed for the first $10,000 of value per donee of the gifted property. Estate of Langendorf, 262 M 123, 863 P2d 434, 50 St. Rep. 1474 (1993).

Total Value of Obligations Deductible: The total value of obligations outstanding against joint tenancy property is deductible in arriving at a determination of the value of the estate subject to tax when creditors have the right to enforce the entire obligation against the obligors personally or individually. In re Baier, 173 M 396, 567 P2d 943 (1977).

Clear Market Value:

Clear market value as used in 72-16-308 (now repealed) means net value in the open market as determined by price willing but not obligated buyer would pay and willing but not obligated seller would accept, with both parties knowing all pertinent facts affecting value. In re Estate of Power, 156 M 100, 476 P2d 506 (1970).

Valuation of United States Treasury bonds redeemable at par in discharge of federal estate tax liability must be based on clear market value on date of decedent's death for purposes of 72-16-308 (now repealed) rather than on par value. In re Estate of Power, 156 M 100, 476 P2d 506 (1970).

Construction: The words "actually allowed and paid" as used in the statute do not relate to the ordinary expenses of administration. In re Warren's Estate, 128 M 395, 275 P2d 843 (1954).

Ordinary Expenses: While ordinarily the appraisers are the ones who fix the value of the property of an estate, where the estate consists of stock in a closely held corporation, the services of an accountant may become necessary to determine the fair market value of the stock, and the cost of such services is an ordinary expense in the administration of the estate. In re Warren's Estate, 128 M 395, 275 P2d 843 (1954).

Deductions Allowed: Section 72-16-308 (now repealed) is clear and direct and declares no deduction shall be allowed except those specified therein. In re McAnelly's Estate, 127 M 158, 258 P2d 741 (1953).

Character of Property at Death: It is the character of the property at death that determines whether it is real or personal property and whether it is subject to a transfer tax. In re Briebach's Estate, 132 M 437, 318 P2d 223 (1957).

Contracts for Sale of Real Estate: Decedent had been a resident of Montana but had moved to California where he resided at the time of his death. During his lifetime he contracted to sell land in Montana. At the time of his death there remained due unpaid balances. Decedent left a will devising and bequeathing all of his property to his wife. Rights passing to widow under the contracts were properly excluded from the gross value of the estate subject to an inheritance tax under 72-16-801 (now repealed). In re Briebach's Estate, 132 M 437, 318 P2d 223 (1957).

Partnership Property:

When partnership is settled and the debts are paid, the real estate of the partnership retains its character as such and is not tax exempt as intangible property. In re Perry's Estate, 121 M 280, 192 P2d 532 (1948).

As to personal property of a partnership, only so much thereof as is necessary to discharge the duties imposed on the survivor passes to him, and the balance of the partnership property should be divided between the surviving partners and the heirs of the deceased partner, which property retains its character as tangible property and is not tax exempt. Withdrawal From Joint Bank Account: All of the funds in a husband and wife's joint tenancy bank account were withdrawn by the wife, who then created new joint accounts with herself and other persons. Shortly thereafter her husband died. The withdrawal by the wife was not a taxable transfer subject to inheritance tax because transfers to a spouse are not taxable. The steps taken in creating the new joint accounts were not transfers from the deceased husband to anyone and therefore were not subject to inheritance tax. In re Sinclair, 197 M 29, 640 P2d 918, 39 St. Rep. 331 (1982).

Erroneous Application: The Court erred by applying 72-16-313 (now repealed) as amended in 1973 and granting a refund of inheritance tax when it accrued prior to amendment with the death of the decedent amounting to a retrospective application in contravention of 1-2-109. Widow's Life Estate: Decedent left a will giving wife residue and remainder of his property during the term of her natural life, provided she should remain his widow, with right to dispose of the same or any part thereof for her use, support, and maintenance, at her discretion. A following paragraph gave to his two daughters, in equal shares, the property referred to in the preceding paragraph to come into possession thereof at the death or remarriage of the wife. The widow never remarried and died within 6 months after death of testator. Net estate of taxable value of $99,022.61 passed under the paragraphs mentioned; of that amount Court properly found that $18,784.19 passed to the widow where amount was calculated upon the basis of her life expectancy of 5.72 years. CHAPTER 17
ANATOMICAL GIFT ACT

Chapter Official Comments

The Uniform Anatomical Gift Act was promulgated in 1968. It has been adopted in all 50 states and the District of Columbia. In the prefatory note it was observed:

". . . if utilization of bodies and parts of bodies is to be effectuated, a number of competing interests in a dead body must be harmonized, and several troublesome legal questions must be answered. . . . Both the common law and the present statutory picture is [sic] one of confusion, diversity, and inadequacy. . . . The Uniform Anatomical Gift Act herewith presented by the National Conference of Commissioners on Uniform State Laws carefully weighs the numerous conflicting interests and legal problems. Wherever adopted it will encourage the making of anatomical gifts, thus facilitating therapy involving such procedures. . . . It will provide a useful and uniform legal environment throughout the country for this new frontier of modern medicine."

The contemporary significance of the Uniform Anatomical Gift Act has been recently assessed by the Hastings Center; in the Preface to its Report of the project on organ transplantation, "Ethical, Legal and Policy Issues Pertaining to Solid Organ Procurement" (October, 1985), it is stated:

"The issue of transplantation remained quiescent for many years. It was only with the successes occasioned by the introduction of powerful new immunosuppressive drugs such as Cyclosporine and improvements in surgical techniques for transplanting organs and tissues in the past few years that the issue of organ procurement was brought back into the center stage of public policy concern. Enhancements in the capacity to perform transplants increased the demand for solid organs. It has become apparent that the public policy instituted in 1969 [by promulgation of the Uniform Anatomical Gift Act in 1968] is not producing a sufficient supply of organs to meet the current or projected demand for them."

A 1985 Gallup Poll commissioned by the American Council on Transplantation reported that 93 percent of Americans surveyed knew about organ transplantation and, of these, 75 percent approved of the concept of organ donation. Although a large majority approves of organ donation, only 27 percent indicate that they would be very likely to donate their own organs, and only 17 percent have actually completed donor cards. Of those who were very likely to donate, nearly half have not told family members of their wish, even though family permission is usually requested before an organ is removed. (Report of the Task Force on Organ Transplantation pursuant to the 1984 National Organ Transplant Act—P.L. 98 507—"Organ Transplantation: Issues and Recommendations" (April 1986)).

The inadequacies in the present system of encouraging voluntary donation of organs were enumerated in the Hastings Center Report:

"The key problems that hinder organ donation include:

1. Failure of persons to sign written directives.
2. Failure of police and emergency personnel to locate written directives at accident sites.
3. Uncertainty on the part of the public about circumstances and timing of organ recovery.
4. Failure on the part of medical personnel to recover organs on the basis of written directives.
5. Failure to systemically approach family members concerning donation.
6. Inefficiency on the part of some organ procurement agencies in obtaining referrals of donors.
7. High wastage rates on the part of some organ procurement agencies in failing to place donated organs.
8. Failure to communicate the pronouncement of death to next of kin.

9. Failure to obtain adequate informed consent from family members."

State and federal legislation have addressed several of these problems. For example, a majority of states have enacted a variety of "required request" laws that require hospital administrators to discuss with next of kin the option of donating, or requesting the donation of, the organs of a decedent. Congress enacted the National Organ Transplant Act in 1984 prohibiting the purchase of organs in interstate commerce and providing grants to organ procurement agencies and a national organ-sharing system. The Act also provides for appointment of a Task Force on Organ Transplantation to conduct a comprehensive examination of organ donation and procurement, organ sharing within the United States, access by patients to donor organs and transplant procedures, diffusion and adoption of organ transplant technology, and future directions in research. The Task Force submitted a report in April 1986 entitled "Organ Transplantation: Issues and Recommendations." Among the findings:

"An overriding problem common to all organ transplantation programs as well as to the well-established programs in tissue banking (for corneal, skin and bone transplantation) is the serious gap between the need for the organs and tissues and the supply of donors. Despite substantial support for transplantation and a general willingness to donate organs and tissues after death, the demand far exceeds the supply. At any one time, there are an estimated 8,000 to 10,000 people waiting for a donor organ to become available."

Citing a recommendation of the Task Force, the bill for the reconciliation of the 1987 budget amended the Social Security Act to require that hospitals, as a condition to receiving Medicare or Medicaid after October 1, 1987, establish written protocols "for the identification of potential organ donors that [make families] . . . aware of the option of organ or tissue donation and their option to decline." (P.L. 99-509 §9318).

Several amendments to the Uniform Act have been made since it was promulgated in 1968. In 1980, the NCCUSL voted to make optional the language that previously required the donor card to be signed "in the presence of two witnesses who must sign the document in his presence." Amendments have been made by several states authorizing individuals other than doctors to remove eyes and to address specific emerging problems. As a result, the objective of the 1968 Uniform Act has been eroded, i.e., "When generally adopted, even if the place of death, or the residence of the donor, or the place of use of the gift occurs in a state other than that of the execution of the gift, uncertainty as to the applicable law will be eliminated and all parties will be protected."

In 1984, the Executive Committee of NCCUSL approved the appointment of a study committee, and then in 1985 of a drafting committee, to propose amendments to the Uniform Anatomical Gift Act. The Committee has consulted with individuals and national organizations involved in organ procurement about possible changes in the generic provisions of the Uniform Act and to solicit comments and suggestions. A first draft of proposed amendments to the Uniform Act was considered at the annual meeting of NCCUSL in 1986.

The sequence of sections in the original Act has been changed, to combine the concept of "persons who may make an anatomical gift" (original Section 2) [72-17-201, 72-17-203 (now repealed), and 72-17-207], "manner of making anatomical gifts" (original Section 4) [72-17-204 and 72-17-205 (now repealed)], and "amendment or revocation of the gift" (original Section 6) [72-17-209 (now repealed)]. The authorization of gifts by next of kin or a guardian of the person contained in Section 2 [72-17-201, 72-17-203 (now repealed), and 72-17-207] of the original Act is Section 3 [72-17-214] of the amended Act. Several subsections of the original Act have been shifted to accommodate change in title and sequential arrangement of sections of the Act as amended. These changes are noted in the Comments. The scope of the Act continues to be limited to procurement. It does not cover processing except for a provision requiring coordination of procurement and utilization between hospitals and procurement organizations (Section 9) [72-17-108]. It does not cover distribution except for a provision prohibiting sale or purchase (Section 10) [72-17-302].

The proposed amendments simplify the manner of making an anatomical gift and require that the intentions of a donor be followed. For example, no witnesses are required on the document of gift (Section 2(b)) [72-17-201(2)] and consent of next of kin after death is not required if the donor has made an anatomical gift (Section 2(h)) [72-17-201(8)]. The identification of actual donors is facilitated by a duty to search for a document of gift (Section 5(c)) [72-17-213(2)] and of potential donors by the provisions for routine inquiry (Section 5(a)) [omitted from Montana enactment] and required request (Section 5(b)) [72-17-213(1)]. A gift of one organ, e.g., eyes, is not a limitation on the gift of other organs after death, in the absence of contrary indication by the decedent (Section 2(j)) [72-17-201(10)]. The right to refuse to make an anatomical gift and the manner of expressing the refusal are specified (Section 2(i))

[72-17-201(9)]. Revocation by a donor of an anatomical gift that has been made is effective without communication of the revocation to a specified donee (Section 2(f)) [72-17-201(6)]. Hospitals have been substituted for attending physicians as donees of anatomical gifts (Section 6(b)) [72-17-202(2)], and they are required to establish agreements or affiliations with other hospitals and procurement organizations in the region to coordinate the procurement and utilization of anatomical gifts (Section 9) [72-17-108]. If a request for an anatomical gift has been made for transplant or therapy by a person specified in the Act and if there is no contrary indication by the decedent or known objection by the next of kin to an anatomical gift, the [coroner] [medical examiner] or [local public health official] may authorize release and removal of a part subject to specific requirements (Section 4(a) and (b)) [72-17-215(1) and (2)]. The categories of persons that may remove anatomical parts are expanded to include eye enucleators and certain technicians (Section 8(c)) [72-17-301(3)]. The sale or purchase of parts is prohibited (Section 10) [72-17-302]. Persons who act, or attempt to act, in good faith in accordance with the terms of the Act are not liable in any civil action or criminal proceeding. The categories of persons covered by this exemption are specified (Section 11(c)) [72-17-207(3)].

The growing promise of transplantation was described in the Hastings Center Report:

"It is now possible to transplant vital organs such as hearts, livers and kidneys. Efforts are currently underway to perfect the transplantation of the heart and lung together, the pancreas and the small bowel. Post-mortem donors of these vital organs must have sustained brain death under circumstances in which their respiration and circulation can be supported artificially.

"Other human tissue such as corneas, bone and inner ear parts and skin can be utilized to restore important biological functions. These tissues may be removed some time after circulation and respiration have ceased. The cornea, for example, remains suitable for removal for transplantation for approximately six hours after the donor's heart has stopped beating."

2007 Amendment: Chapter 345 inserted "Revised". Amendment effective October 1, 2007.

Retroactive Applicability: Section 20, Ch. 345, L. 2007, provided: "[This act] applies to an anatomical gift or amendment to, revocation of, or refusal to make an anatomical gift made before October 1, 2007."

72-17-102. Definitions.

Official Comments

[The definition of person] is taken verbatim from the Uniform Statutory Construction Act, section 26(4). In any state that has adopted the Uniform Act or its equivalent, this subsection will be unnecessary.

This is Section 1 [72-17-102] of the original Act. Definitions (1) "Anatomical Gift" and (3) [(4) of Montana enactment] "Document of Gift" have been added to reduce the length and complexity of operative provisions of the Act.

In subsection (2) the committee decided it was unnecessary to expand the definition of "decedent" to include the definition of death contained in the Uniform Determination of Death Act. That Act provides:

"An individual who has sustained either irreversible cessation of circulatory and respiratory functions or irreversible cessation of all functions of the entire brain, including the brain stem, is dead. A determination of death must be made in accordance with accepted medical standards."

Almost all states have similar definitions either by statute or appellate court decisions.

The Report to Congress of the Task Force appointed under the 1984 National Organ Transplant Act (P.L. 98-507) recommends:

". . . that the Uniform Determination of Death Act be enacted by the legislatures of states that have not adopted this or a similar act. . . . that each state medical association develop and adopt model hospital policies and protocols for the determination of death based upon irreversible cessation of brain function that will be available to guide hospitals in developing and implementing institutional policies and protocols concerning brain death."

In subsections (5) [(6) of Montana enactment] and (12) [(14) of Montana enactment], the individuals authorized to remove a part have been expanded to include enucleators for eyes and technicians. Satisfactory completion of a prescribed course of training and experience is a prerequisite to certification of these nonphysician specialists. The type of certification and the person making it are bracketed. It may be done by a professional peer group organization, an organ procurement organization, agency or association, or by a hospital or state agency.

In subsection (10) [(12) of Montana enactment], "procurement organization" has been substituted for "bank or storage facility" and the function has been expanded to include procurement and distribution to reflect the diffusion of function, i.e., procurement, distribution or storage, and of objective, i.e., organs, tissues, eyes, bones, skin, fluids, etc. In the case of solid or visceral organs, they must be removed while bodily functions of the decedent are sustained with life support systems. If solid or visceral organs are not involved, life support systems are not required, although there are time limits following death within which removal must be completed, e.g., six hours in the case of eyes.

2007 Amendment: Chapter 345 inserted definitions of adult, agent, disinterested witness, donor registry, driver's license, eye bank, guardian, identification card, know, minor, organ procurement organization, parent, prospective donor, reasonably available, recipient, record, refusal, sign, tissue, tissue bank, and transplant hospital; in definition of anatomical gift at end inserted "for the purposes of transplantation, therapy, research, or education"; in definition of decedent inserted "whose body or part is or may be the source of an anatomical gift"; in definition of document of gift in introductory clause after "means" inserted "any of the following methods used to make an anatomical gift", in (b) after "imprinted" substituted "on a driver's license, identification card, or donor registry" for "on a motor vehicle operator's license", and in (d) substituted "a witnessed oral statement" for "used to make an anatomical gift"; in definition of donor substituted "whose body or part is the subject of an anatomical gift" for "who makes a gift of all or part of the individual's body"; in definition of part inserted (b) providing that term does not include the whole body; in definition of person after "association" inserted "limited liability company, public corporation, instrumentality"; in definition of procurement organization substituted "an eye bank, organ procurement organization, or tissue bank" for "a person licensed, accredited, or approved under the laws of any state for procurement, distribution, or storage of human bodies or parts"; in definition of state after "Columbia" deleted "or the Commonwealth of" and inserted "the United States Virgin Islands, or any territory or insular possession subject to the jurisdiction of the United States"; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective October 1, 2007.

Retroactive Applicability: Section 20, Ch. 345, L. 2007, provided: "[This act] applies to an anatomical gift or amendment to, revocation of, or refusal to make an anatomical gift made before October 1, 2007."

1995 Amendments: Chapter 418 in definition of Department substituted "department of public health" for "department of health and environmental sciences". Amendment effective July 1, 1995.

Chapter 546 in definition of Department substituted "department of public health and human services provided for in 2-15-2201" for "department of health and environmental sciences provided for in Title 2, chapter 15, part 21". Amendment effective July 1, 1995.

Transition: Section 499, Ch. 418, L. 1995, provided: "The provisions of 2-15-131 through 2-15-137 apply to [this act]."

Section 571, Ch. 546, L. 1995, was a saving clause.

1989 Amendment: Inserted definitions of anatomical gift, document of gift, enucleator, and procurement organization; deleted definitions of bank or storage facility and eyebank association of America; substituted definition of hospital for former definition that read: "a hospital licensed, accredited, or approved under the laws of any state; includes a hospital operated by the United States government, a state, or a subdivision thereof, although not required to be licensed under state laws"; in definition of person inserted "joint venture" and "or commercial"; substituted definition of physician or surgeon for former definition that read: "a physician or surgeon licensed or authorized to practice under the laws of any state"; substituted definition of state for former definition that read: "any state, district, commonwealth, territory, insular possession, and any other area subject to the legislative authority of the United States of America"; substituted definition of technician for definition of technician trained in eye enucleation that read: "an individual who has satisfactorily completed a course in eye enucleation taught by an ophthalmologist"; and made minor changes in form and phraseology.

1983 Amendment: In (1), after "facility" deleted "licensed, accredited, or approved under the laws of any state" and inserted "operated by or under the supervision of a person who qualifies as a donee under subsection (1)(a) or (1)(b) of 72-17-202"; and inserted definitions of department, eyebank association of America, ophthalmologist, and technician trained in eye enucleation.

Uniform Act Section: The corresponding section of the Uniform Anatomical Gift Act (1987) as adopted by the National Conference of Commissioners on Uniform State Laws is section 1.

Changes From Uniform Act: Montana enactment added definitions of department and ophthalmologist; in definition of document of gift, after "motor vehicle operator's", omitted "or chauffeur's"; in definition of donor substituted "a gift" for "an anatomical gift"; in definition of enucleator substituted "certified pursuant to 72-17-311" for "certified by the [State Board of Medical Examiners]"; and in definition of hospital, after "approved", omitted "as a hospital".

Official Comments

Among the recommendations of the Task Force pursuant to the 1984 National Organ Transplant Act, was the following:

"The Joint Commission on the Accreditation of Hospitals develop [sic] a standard that requires all acute care hospitals to both have an affiliation with an organ procurement agency and have formal policies and procedures for identifying potential organ and tissue donors and providing next of kin with appropriate opportunities for donation."

The failure of a hospital to establish the agreements or affiliations specified in this section will not affect gifts made to the hospital or gifts by patients in the hospital.

2007 Amendment: Chapter 345 near beginning after "state" deleted "after consultation with other hospitals and procurement organizations", after "affiliations" inserted "with procurement organizations", and at end after "use" substituted "of anatomical gifts" for "of human bodies and parts"; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective October 1, 2007.

Execution and Operation of Anatomical Gift

72-17-201. Making, amending, revoking, and refusing to make anatomical gifts by individual.

Official Comments

The major structural changes from the original Act are found in Sections 2 and 3 [72-17-201 and 72-17-214]. The persons who may make an anatomical gift are divided into the individual donor (new Section 2) [72-17-201] and next of kin or guardians of the person (new Section 3) [72-17-214]. The manner of executing (old Section 4) [72-17-204 and 72-17-205 (now repealed)], and amending or revoking (old Section 6) [72-17-209 (now repealed)] anatomical gifts are incorporated in new Section 2 [72-17-201] as well as provisions of other sections that involve "making, amending, revoking, and refusing to make anatomical gifts by the individual." Provisions of old Section 2 [72-17-201, 72-17-203 (now repealed), and 72-17-207] that do not relate directly to this topic have been shifted to later sections. In the original Act there is the following Comment:

"To minimize confusion there is merit in having a uniform provision throughout the country. Also it is desirable to enlarge the class of possible donors as much as possible. Subsection (a) of Section 2 [former 72-17-201(1)], providing that any person of sound mind and 18 years or more of age may execute a gift, will afford both nationwide uniformity and a desirable enlargement of the class of donors. Persons 18 years of age or more are of sufficient maturity to make the required decisions and the Uniform Act takes advantage of this fact."

In subsection (a) [72-17-201(1)] the Act has been expanded by inserting the right to refuse to make an anatomical gift. The absence of a donor card or the lack of an entry authorizing a gift on a driver's license are ambiguous and are not "contrary indications" of a decedent preventing an anatomical gift by next of kin under Section 2(b) [former 72-17-201(2)] of the original Act. This amendment and a provision specifying the manner of making a refusal (subsection (i)) [72-17-201(9)] provide the option to individuals who are definitely opposed to the donation for any purpose or of any part of their body as an anatomical gift. If the donor wishes to limit the anatomical gift to a specific purpose, e.g., transplantation, or to a specified part, e.g., eyes, the limitation must be stated clearly, i.e., "transplantation only," "eyes only."

Subsection (b) [72-17-201(2)] incorporates the provisions of Section 4(b) [72-17-204(2) (now repealed)] of the original Act. Section 4(a) [72-17-204(1) (now repealed)] of the original Act has been relocated to subsection (e) [72-17-201(5)] to reflect the change from using wills to choosing other forms of documents of gift to make anatomical gifts.

The requirement of two witnesses signing a donor card or other document of gift has been deleted to simplify the making of anatomical gifts. Self authentication of a document of gift by a donor who cannot sign relieves the donee of the duty to search for the witnesses upon death of the donor.

In the original Act there were several forms included in the Comments with this admonition:

"As the Uniform Act becomes widely accepted it will prove helpful if the forms by which gifts are made are similar in each of the participating states. Such forms should be as simple and understandable as possible."

The forms in these Comments are suggested for the 1987 Act.

ANATOMICAL GIFT BY A LIVING DONOR

Pursuant to the Anatomical Gift Act, upon my death, I hereby give (check boxes applicable):

1. [ ] Any needed organs, tissues, or parts;
2. [ ] The following organs, tissues, or parts only

3. [ ] For the following purposes only

(transplant-therapy-research-education)

Date of Birth | Signature of Donor

Date Signed | Address of Donor

INSTRUCTIONS

Check box 1 if the gift is unrestricted, i.e., of any organ, tissue, or part for any purpose specified in the Act; do not check box 2 or box 3. If the gift is restricted to specific organ(s), tissue(s), or part(s) only, e.g., heart, cornea, etc., check box 2 and write in the organ or tissue to be given. If the gift is restricted to one or more of the purposes listed, e.g., transplant, therapy, etc., check box 3 and write in the purpose for which the gift is made.

A gift category included in some forms "of my body for anatomical study if needed" has not been included. Although a gift of the entire body is authorized by the Act, the exercise of this option usually requires an agreement with a medical school before a gift is made.

A simple form of refusal under the Act could provide:

Pursuant to the Anatomical Gift Act, I hereby refuse to make any anatomical gift.

Date of Birth | Signature of Declarant

Date of Signing | Address of Declarant

Subsection (c) [72-17-201(3)] incorporates an amendment to the original Act in many states providing that an anatomical gift may be made by an attachment to the driver's license. The cross reference to subsection (b) [72-17-201(2)] incorporates the concept that a signature is required. A signature on the driver's license or on the card attached to the driver's license is sufficient. The hospital or other donee may rely on the anatomical gift even though the license has expired or has been terminated by official act.

The following form is suggested for attachment to the driver's license:

Print or Type Name of Donor

Pursuant to the Anatomical Gift Act, upon my death, I hereby give (check boxes applicable):

1. [ ] Any needed organs, tissues, or parts;
2. [ ] The following organs, tissues, or parts only

3. [ ] For the following purposes only

(transplant-therapy-research-education)

Refusal:

4. [ ] I refuse to make any anatomical gift.

INSTRUCTIONS

See Section 2(b) [72-17-201(2)] Comments. If the applicant for a driver's license refuses to make any anatomical gift, check box 4 only.

Subsection (d) [72-17-201(4)] is Section 4(d) [72-17-206 (now repealed)] of the original Act.

Subsection (e) [72-17-201(5)] is a restatement of Section 4(a) [72-17-204(1) (now repealed)] of the original Act.

Subsection (f) [72-17-201(6)] is a restatement of Section 6(a) and (b) [72-17-209(1) and (2) (now repealed)] of the original Act.

Subsection (g) [72-17-201(7)] is Section 6(a) [72-17-209(1) (now repealed)] of the original Act.

Subsection (h) [72-17-201(8)] states expressly the intention of the original Act that an anatomical gift not revoked by the donor cannot be revoked after the donor's death by any other person. This was explicit in the Comments to the original Act: "Subsection (e) [of Section 2] [72-17-203 (now repealed)] recognizes and gives legal effect to the right of the individual to dispose of his own body without subsequent veto by others." The Hastings Center Report cited the results of a telephone survey of organ procurement agencies in the United States in 1983 as follows:

". . . the survey revealed that few transplant centers were willing to procure organs solely on the basis of a donor card or driver's license consent by the deceased. In situations in which family members could not be located, less than twenty-five percent of the respondents said they would proceed with organ procurement despite the presence of a written directive."

This subsection removes any uncertainty.

Subsection (i) [72-17-201(9)] expands the original Act by providing a method of refusing to make an anatomical gift. A potential donor has several options. The donor may make an anatomical gift (Section 2(a)) [72-17-201(1)], may express or imply a contrary indication that an anatomical gift shall not be made (Section 2(j)(k)) [72-17-201(10) and (11)], or may refuse to make an anatomical gift (Section 2(i)) [72-17-201(9)]. Contrary indications may include membership in organizations that do not approve of organ donation, statements or actions by the potential donor that are inconsistent with organ donations, etc. To be effective as a limitation on a gift by next of kin under Section 3 [72-17-214] or on a release of a part by other persons under Section 4 [72-17-215], after death, the contrary indications must be known to the persons authorized to act under Sections 3 and 4 [72-17-214 and 72-17-215]. The option of refusal to make an anatomical gift provided for by subsection (i) [72-17-201(9)] is a method of documenting contrary indications that might not be communicated otherwise and therefore not effective as a limitation on next of kin and other persons authorized to give or release a part under Sections 3 and 4 [72-17-214 and 72-17-215] of the Act. If the potential donor is unable to speak because of paralysis or other disability, any form of communicating a refusal is sufficient, e.g., responding to a direct inquiry by a nod of the head, squeeze of the hand, blink of eyes, etc.

Subsection (j) [72-17-201(10)] addresses the problem of donor cards that have been circulated by various organizations and that appear to limit the anatomical gift to only one organ, e.g., eyes, kidneys, etc. This type of card should not be construed as an expression of the intention of the donor to limit the anatomical gift to that organ only, in the absence of a refusal to give other organs or of other contrary indications.

Subsection (k) [72-17-201(11)] provides that a revocation of an anatomical gift made previously by a donor is neither a refusal to make any anatomical gift nor a contrary indication by the donor that no part shall be given or released for any purpose authorized by the Act. It merely restores the donor to the status of an individual who has neither made nor refused to make an anatomical gift. In the absence of any other action or contrary indication by that individual before death, the next of kin or guardian of the person may make an anatomical gift pursuant to Section 3 [72-17-214] or the appropriate person may authorize release and removal of a part pursuant to Section 4 [72-17-215].

An amendment of an anatomical gift made previously by the donor, whether the amendment relates to a part or a purpose, is not a refusal nor a limitation on a gift or release of other parts for any purpose specified in the Act. If the amendment is intended to be a refusal it must be expressed clearly as provided in subsection (i) [72-17-201(9)].

Revocation or amendment of a previous anatomical gift is ambiguous. It does not indicate an intention of the donor to refuse to make an anatomical gift. This subsection removes that ambiguity.

Compiler's Comments

2007 Amendment: Chapter 345 in (1) at beginning substituted language allowing anatomical gift of a donor's body or part to be made during life of donor for transplantation, therapy, research, or education for "individual who is at least 18 years of age may"; in (1)(a) and (1)(b) substituted language allowing gift by donor if donor is adult or by minor if minor is emancipated or authorized to apply for driver's license at age 15 and allowing gift by agent of donor unless prohibited by power of attorney for health care or other record for former (1)(a) and (1)(b) that read: "(1)(a) make an anatomical gift for any of the purposes stated in 72-17-202; or

(b) limit an anatomical gift to one or more of those purposes"; inserted (1)(c) allowing gift by parent of donor if donor is unemancipated minor; inserted (1)(d) allowing gift by donor's guardian; in (2) substituted language allowing anatomical gift by statement or symbol on driver's license or identification card, by statement in will, by communication to disinterested witness during terminal illness or injury, or by signing donor card for former (2) that read: "(2) An anatomical gift may be made only by a document of gift signed by the donor. If the donor cannot sign, the document of gift must be signed by another individual and by two witnesses, all of whom have signed at the direction and in the presence of the donor and of each other, and must state that it has been signed"; inserted (3) allowing donor or other authorized person to make anatomical gift by donor card or other signed record and allowing donor who is physically unable to sign record to allow another individual to sign for donor in presence of two witnesses; in (4) deleted former first sentence that read: "If a document of gift is attached to or imprinted on a donor's motor vehicle operator's license, the document of gift must comply with subsection (2)" and after "license" inserted "or identification card issued to a donor"; in (6) in two places substituted reference to donor for reference to testator; in (7) at beginning inserted exception clause, after "donor" inserted "or other person authorized to make an anatomical gift under subsection (1)", and near end after "gift" deleted "not made by will"; substituted language in (7)(a) allowing amendment or revocation of gift only by record signed by donor or other person or another individual acting at direction of donor if donor unable to sign for former (a)(i) and (a)(ii) that read: "(i) a signed statement;

(ii) an oral statement made in the presence of two individuals"; in (7)(b) after "addressed" substituted "to at least two adults, one of whom is a disinterested witness" for "to a physician or surgeon"; inserted (7)(d) concerning later-executed document of gift amending or revoking previous gift; inserted (7)(e) concerning destroying or canceling gift document or portion of gift document with intent to revoke anatomical gift; substituted (8) requiring signed record to be witnessed by at least two adults, one of whom is disinterested witness, who have signed at donor's request and requiring signed record to state it has been signed and witnessed for former (8) that read: "(8) An anatomical gift that is not revoked by the donor before death is irrevocable and does not require the consent or concurrence of any person after the donor's death. The donor's family or health care provider may not refuse to honor the gift or thwart the procurement of the donation"; in (11)(a)(ii) substituted "driver's license or identification card" for "motor vehicle operator's license"; inserted (11)(a)(iii) allowing individual to refuse making anatomical gift by will even if will is probated or invalidated after death; in (11)(b) after "communication" inserted "addressed to at least two adults, at least one of whom is a disinterested witness"; inserted (12) outlining criteria to amend or revoke refusal; inserted (13) barring person other than donor from making, amending, or revoking anatomical gift in absence of express indication of donor except in certain cases and prohibiting donor's family or health care provider from refusing to honor gift or thwarting donation procurement; inserted (14) barring other persons from making anatomical gift of person's body or body part; in (15) before "contrary" inserted "an express", after "donor" inserted "or other person authorized under this section to make an anatomical gift", and after "part" inserted "for one or more of the purposes set forth in subsection (1)"; in (16) in first sentence after first "gift" inserted "of the donor's body or part" and at end inserted "and does not bar another person specified in 72-17-214 or this section from making an anatomical gift of the donor's body or part"; inserted (17) allowing parent of unemancipated minor who dies to revoke or amend minor's anatomical gift; inserted (18) allowing parent of minor to revoke minor's refusal of anatomical gift if minor dies; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective October 1, 2007.

Retroactive Applicability: Section 20, Ch. 345, L. 2007, provided: "[This act] applies to an anatomical gift or amendment to, revocation of, or refusal to make an anatomical gift made before October 1, 2007."

2003 Amendment: Chapter 230 deleted former (1)(c) that read: "(c) refuse to make an anatomical gift"; in (5) inserted third sentence providing that gift made under section is sufficient legal authority for procurement without additional authority from donor or the donor's family or estate; inserted (6)(b) requiring donor to notify federally designated organ procurement organization of document destruction, cancellation, or mutilation in order to remove name from statutorily created donation registry; inserted second sentence in (8) prohibiting donor's family or health care provider from not honoring gift or from thwarting donation procurement; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective October 1, 2003.

Preamble: The preamble attached to Ch. 230, L. 2003, provided: "WHEREAS, more than 80,000 people are currently waiting for life-saving organ transplants on the national transplant waiting list, of which 1,200 persons live in our region, and 17 people die each day as a result of the shortage of donated organs."

1989 Amendment: Rewrote section by deleting language that stated priorities of persons other than decedent who may make gift (see 1987 MCA for text) and by inserting language providing method for individual to make, amend, revoke, and refuse to make gift (see 1989 Session Law for text).

Applicability: Section 16, Ch. 540, L. 1989, provided: "[This act] applies to a document of gift, revocation, or refusal to make an anatomical gift signed by the donor or a person authorized to make or object to making an anatomical gift before, on, or after October 1, 1989."

Changes From Uniform Act: Montana enactment in (3), after "motor vehicle operator's", omitted "or chauffeur's"; in (5), in second sentence, substituted "after the testator's death" for "after death"; and in (9), after "motor vehicle operator's", omitted "or chauffeur's".

72-17-202. Persons who may become donees — purposes for which anatomical gifts may be made.

Official Comments

Subsection (a) [72-17-202(1)] is Section 3 [former 72-17-202(1)] of the original Act changed to combine subsections (1) and (3) [former 72-17-202(1)(a) and (1)(c)] and to reverse the sequence of purposes for which anatomical gifts may be made, i.e., transplantation followed by therapy rather than education, research, therapy, or transplantation. This emphasizes transplantation as a primary purpose.

Subsection (b) [72-17-202(2)] is a restatement of Section 4(c) [72-17-205 (now repealed)] of the original Act which provided that the attending physician would be the donee under specified circumstances. Hospitals are substituted for the attending physician. This will facilitate coordination of procurement and utilization of the gift pursuant to Section 9 [72-17-108].

Subsection (c) [72-17-202(3)] is substantially Section 2(c) [72-17-201(4)] of the original Act. The last sentence has been deleted because it does not apply to donees or purposes.

2007 Amendment: Chapter 345 in (1) after "stated" inserted "if named in the document of gift"; in (1)(a) after "organization" substituted language pertaining to accredited medical or dental school, college, or university or another appropriate person for former language that read: "for medical or dental education, research, advancement of medical or dental science, therapy, or transplantation"; in (1)(b) substituted language providing that individual designated as donee by person making gift be recipient of part for former text that read: "an accredited medical or dental school, college, or university for education, research, advancement of medical or dental science"; substituted (1)(c) allowing donee to be eye bank or tissue bank for former text that read: "a designated individual for therapy or transplantation needed by that individual"; in (2) substituted language providing that gift of anatomical part passes at direction of another person acting for donor if gift cannot be transplanted for former (2) that read: "(2) An anatomical gift may be made to a designated donee or without designating a donee. If a donee is not designated or if the donee is not available or rejects the anatomical gift, the anatomical gift may be accepted by a hospital"; inserted (3) outlining rules if anatomical gift of one or more specific body parts or all parts is made in document that does not name person; inserted (4) requiring gift to be used for transplantation or therapy or research or education if purposes for gift are not prioritized; inserted (5) allowing gift to be used only for transplantation or therapy if gift is made in document that does not name person and does not identify purpose of gift; inserted (6) allowing gift to be used only for transplantation or therapy if document specifies only general intent; inserted (7) outlining rules if gift cannot be transplanted, if gift does not name person or identify purpose of gift, or if document specifies only general intent; inserted (8) providing that anatomical gift of organ for transplantation or therapy passes to organ procurement organization as custodian of organ; inserted (9) providing that gift not passed under section or not used for transplantation, therapy, research, or education passes to person under obligation to dispose of body or part; in (10) inserted second sentence providing that if person knows anatomical gift was made on document of gift, person is considered to know of any amendment, revocation, or refusal to make gift on same document; inserted (11) providing section does not affect allocation of organs for transplantation or therapy; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective October 1, 2007.

Retroactive Applicability: Section 20, Ch. 345, L. 2007, provided: "[This act] applies to an anatomical gift or amendment to, revocation of, or refusal to make an anatomical gift made before October 1, 2007."

1989 Amendment: Rewrote section revising list of persons who may be donees, clarifying purposes for which gifts may be made, and deleting language relating to liability (see 1987 MCA for former text and 1989 Session Law for new text).

Applicability: Section 16, Ch. 540, L. 1989, provided: "[This act] applies to a document of gift, revocation, or refusal to make an anatomical gift signed by the donor or a person authorized to make or object to making an anatomical gift before, on, or after October 1, 1989."

1983 Amendment: In (1)(c), after "facility" inserted "licensed, accredited, or approved under the laws of any state"; and inserted (2) relating to liability limitation.

Changes From Uniform Act: Montana enactment in (1)(a) substituted "hospital, surgeon, physician, or procurement organization for medical or dental education, research, advancement of medical or dental science, therapy, or transplantation" for "hospital, physician, surgeon, or procurement organization, for transplantation, therapy, medical or dental education, research, or advancement of medical or dental science"; and in (3) substituted "for therapy or transplantation" for "for transplantation or therapy".

72-17-207. Examination — autopsy — liability.

Official Comments

Subsection (a) [72-17-207(1)] is Section 2(d) [72-17-207] of the original Act.

The purpose of this subsection was explained in a Comment to the original Act:

"[It] is added at the suggestion of members of the medical profession who regard a post mortem examination, to the extent necessary to ascertain freedom from disease that might cause injury to the new host for transplanted parts, as essential to good medical practice."

Subsection (b) [72-17-207(2)] is a restatement of Section 7(d) [omitted in 1969 Montana enactment] of the original Act. The Comments to the original Act gave the reason for this subsection:

"[It] is necessary to preclude the frustration of the important medical examiners' duties in cases of death by suspected crime or violence. However, since such cases often can provide transplants of value to living persons, it may prove desirable in many if not most states to reexamine and amend, the medical examiner statutes to authorize and direct medical examiners to expedite their autopsy procedures in cases in which the public interest will not suffer."

In 1986 the Task Force on Organ Transplantation made a similar recommendation:

"To enact laws that would encourage coroners and medical examiners to give permission for organ and tissue procurement from cadavers under their jurisdiction."

Subsection (c) [72-17-207(3)] is a restatement of Section 7(c) [72-17-212 (now repealed)] of the original Act. It provided in part that "a person who acts in good faith . . . ." Concern was expressed that the term person was not sufficiently descriptive and may be construed to exclude hospitals and individuals. The present provision is more explicit. "Attempts to act in good faith" has also been added to the subsection.

Subsection (d) [72-17-207(4)] provides for limitation of liability for the benefit of the individual making a gift under the Act and that individual's estate. Some states have amended the uniform act by describing an anatomical gift as a service and not a sale or disclaiming any warranty of the part that is given. Similar provisions are found in statutes relating to blood banks.

2007 Amendment: Chapter 345 in (1) inserted second sentence allowing examination of all donor or prospective donor's medical and dental records unless prohibited by law; in (2) inserted exception clause; in (3) at end inserted "or administrative proceeding"; inserted (4) allowing person in determining whether gift has been made, amended, or revoked to rely upon representations of certain individuals unless person knows representation is untrue; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective October 1, 2007.

Retroactive Applicability: Section 20, Ch. 345, L. 2007, provided: "[This act] applies to an anatomical gift or amendment to, revocation of, or refusal to make an anatomical gift made before October 1, 2007."

1989 Amendment: At beginning of (1) substituted "An anatomical gift authorizes any reasonable examination necessary" for "A gift of all or part of a body authorizes any examination necessary"; inserted (2) providing chapter provisions are subject to state autopsy laws; and inserted (3) and (4) concerning liability relating to making of gift (see 1989 Session Law for text).

72-17-208. Document of gift — delivery — validity.

Official Comments

Subsection (a) [72-17-208(1)] is the last sentence of Section 4(b) [72-17-204(2) (now repealed)] of the original Act.

Subsection (b) [72-17-208(2)] is Section 5 [72-17-208] of the original Act. The Comments to that subsection include the following:

". . . in the great majority of the states, no provision is made for filing, recording, or delivery to the donee. The gift is by implication effective without such formality. . . . permissive filing provisions [are included] to expedite post mortem procedures."

Compiler's Comments

2007 Amendment: Chapter 345 in (2) in second sentence after "gift" inserted "or a refusal to make an anatomical gift" and in third sentence at end inserted "or the refusal to make an anatomical gift"; inserted (3) providing when gift document is valid; inserted (4) providing that laws of state govern interpretation of gift if document of gift valid; inserted (5) allowing person to presume validity of gift or amendment unless person knows gift was not validly executed or was revoked; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective October 1, 2007.

Retroactive Applicability: Section 20, Ch. 345, L. 2007, provided: "[This act] applies to an anatomical gift or amendment to, revocation of, or refusal to make an anatomical gift made before October 1, 2007."

1989 Amendment: Inserted (1) providing that delivery is not required for a valid gift; and substituted (2) that reads: "(2) If an anatomical gift is made to a designated donee, the document of gift, or a copy, may be delivered to the donee to expedite the appropriate procedures after death. The document of gift, or a copy, may be deposited in any hospital, procurement organization, or registry office that accepts it for safekeeping or for facilitation of procedures after death. On request of an interested person, upon or after the donor's death, the person in possession shall allow the interested person to examine or copy the document of gift" for former language that read: "(1) If the gift is made by the donor to a specified donee, the will, card, or other document or an executed copy thereof may be delivered to the donee to expedite the appropriate procedures immediately after death. Delivery is not necessary to the validity of the gift.

(2) The will, card, or other document or an executed copy thereof may be deposited in any hospital, bank or storage facility, or registry office that accepts it for safekeeping or for facilitation of procedures after death.

(3) On request of any interested party upon or after the donor's death, the person in possession shall produce the document for examination."

72-17-213. Routine inquiry and required request — search and notification.

Official Comments

Each individual upon admission to a hospital is asked a series of routine questions, such as "Do you have insurance?" and "Are you allergic to any drugs?" Subsection (a) [omitted in Montana enactment] adds to the list a routine inquiry about organ donation. It requires that a question be asked to identify organ donors and mandates discussion about organ donation, after the consent of the attending physician, with those who answer in the negative. If there is an affirmative response, a request is made for the organ donor card, driver's license, or other document of gift to determine if there are limitations, e.g., of a particular part (eyes) or of a particular purpose (transplant only) and to place a copy in the medical record as evidence of a valid gift to be effective at death. Although the amendment is limited to the admission process of hospitals, doctors are encouraged to include a similar routine inquiry of patients in their office procedures and hospitals are encouraged to extend the routine inquiry to outpatient, emergency, minor surgery, and similar procedures that do not require admission to the hospital.

Among the major findings of the Hastings Center Report was the following:

"While many Americans believe that signing a donor card or other written directive assures that their wishes will be respected and acted upon, it does not. . . . Few, if any, organs are donated solely on the basis of donor cards or written directives. Written directives are only effective if hospital protocols and practices are designed to discover and act upon the contents of such directives."

Subsection (b) [72-17-213(1)] is a variation of the required request concept. All but a few states have passed a variety of the required request statutes since 1985. Some specify that next of kin be informed of the option to give, others that a request to give be made. Federal law requires written protocols by hospitals participating in Medicare or Medicaid that "assure that families of potential organ donors are made aware of the option of organ or tissue donation and their option to decline." Subsection (b) [72-17-213(1)] requires a discussion of the option and, if there is no response, a request to make an anatomical gift. No discussion or request is necessary if the medical record discloses a prior gift or a refusal to make a gift or if the gift would not be suitable according to accepted medical standards.

The requirement is imposed on the institution. The title of the chief executive officer should be substituted for [administrator]. "Representative" is not limited to employees of the hospital. It may be a doctor, organ procurement specialist, etc.

Subsection (c) [72-17-213(2)] is based upon the Uniform Duties to Disabled Persons Act promulgated by NCCUSL in 1972. The purpose of that Act is to provide, insofar as practicable, for a minimum level of duty towards persons in an unconscious state and toward those who are conscious but otherwise unable to communicate the existence of a condition requiring special treatment.

Subsection (d) [72-17-213(3)] reflects a conclusion of The Hastings Center Report:

"Donor cards are often not found at accident sites, and even when they are, they are rarely located in hospital settings when needed."

This subsection requires that the hospital be notified as soon as a document of gift or refusal is located and that it be sent to the hospital with the individual or the body to which it relates, not taken to the hospital at some later time. Notification of the hospital of the existence and the contents of the document will enable the hospital to notify the organ procurement organization if there is a gift, that there is a potential donor, and the limitations, if any, of the gift.

Subsection (e) [72-17-213(4)] incorporates a recommendation of The Task Force Report pursuant to the National Organ Transplant Act of 1984 that "The Commission for Uniform State Laws develop model legislation that requires acute care hospitals to develop an affiliation with an organ procurement agency and to adopt routine inquiry policies and procedures." The present draft incorporates this recommendation in Sections 5 and 9 [72-17-213 and 72-17-108].

Subsection (f) [72-17-213(5)] encourages hospital accrediting agencies, law enforcement, and other state agencies that have existing disciplinary procedures to impose sanctions for failure to discharge the duties imposed by Section 5 [72-17-213].

2007 Amendment: Chapter 345 in (1) in first sentence before "patient" inserted "hospitalized", after "patient" deleted "there is no medical record that the patient has made or refused to make an anatomical gift", and after "administrator shall" substituted language requiring notification of the procurement organization and, if appropriate, the coroner to ensure that trained designated requester is available to discuss donation opportunities for former language that read: "discuss the option to make or refuse to make an anatomical gift and request the making of an anatomical gift pursuant to 72-17-214(1)", inserted third sentence requiring person designated to be a representative of procurement organization or person with training provided or approved by procurement organization, and deleted former second, third, fourth, and fifth sentences that read: "The request must be made with reasonable discretion and sensitivity to the circumstances of the family. A request is not required if the gift is not suitable, based upon accepted medical standards, for a purpose specified in 72-17-202 or if there are medical or emotional conditions under which the request would contribute to severe emotional distress. An entry must be made in the medical record of the patient, stating the name and affiliation of the individual making the request and the name, response, and relationship to the patient of the person to whom the request was made. The department shall adopt rules to implement this subsection"; in (2) substituted language regarding requirements of procurement organization when hospital refers individual at or near death for former (2) that read: "(2) The following persons shall make a reasonable search for a document of gift or other information identifying the bearer as a donor or as an individual who has refused to make an anatomical gift:

(a) a law enforcement officer, fireman, paramedic, or other emergency rescuer finding an individual whom the searcher believes is dead or near death; and

(b) a hospital, upon the admission of an individual at or near the time of death, if there is not immediately available any other source of that information"; inserted (3) requiring hospital to make reasonable search for document of gift or information identifying bearer as donor or individual who has refused anatomical gift as soon as practical after arrival of individual believed dead or near death; inserted (7) requiring procurement organization to conduct reasonable search for parents of minor and allow opportunity to revoke or amend anatomical gift or revoke refusal upon death of minor who was donor or had signed refusal; inserted (8) requiring procurement organization to make reasonable search for person listed in 72-17-214 having priority to make gift for prospective donor upon referral by hospital and requiring organization to advise other person of all relevant information if organization receives information that anatomical gift to any other person was made, amended, or revoked; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective October 1, 2007.

Retroactive Applicability: Section 20, Ch. 345, L. 2007, provided: "[This act] applies to an anatomical gift or amendment to, revocation of, or refusal to make an anatomical gift made before October 1, 2007."

1997 Amendment: Chapter 42 in (3) substituted "subsection (2)(a)" for "subsection (3)(a)". Amendment effective March 12, 1997.

Source: The corresponding section of the Uniform Anatomical Gift Act (1987) as adopted by the National Conference of Commissioners on Uniform State Laws is section 5.

Changes From Uniform Act: Montana enactment omitted subsection 5(a) of the Uniform Act requiring hospitals to ask each adult patient at admission if he is an organ or tissue donor; and in (1), after "72-17-202", inserted "or if there are medical or emotional conditions under which the request would contribute to severe emotional distress".

72-17-214. Making, revoking, and objecting to anatomical gifts by others.

Official Comments

Section 3 [72-17-214] combines Sections 2(b) and 4(e) [former 72-17-201(2) and 72-17-204(3) (now repealed)] of the original Act, clarifies the limited right of revocation by next of kin and provides for the effect of failure to make a gift by persons other than the donor. Subsection (a) [72-17-214(1)], as explained in Comments to the original Act:

". . . spells out the right of survivors to make the gift. Taking into account the very limited time available following death for the successful removal of such critical tissues as the kidney, the liver, and the heart, it seems desirable to eliminate all possible question by specifically stating the rights of and the priorities among the survivors."

The Act defines an anatomical gift as one "to take effect upon or after death." Survivors may execute the necessary documents of gift even prior to death. The following form is suggested:

Anatomical Gift by Next of Kin or Guardian of the Person

Pursuant to the Uniform Anatomical Gift Act, I hereby make this anatomical gift from the body of _____ who died on _____ at _____ (Name of Decedent) (Date) (Place) in _____ (City and State)

The marks in the appropriate squares and the words filled into the blanks below indicate my relationship to the decedent and my wishes respecting the gift.

I survive the decedent as [ ] spouse; [ ] adult son or daughter; [ ] parent; [ ] adult brother or sister; [ ] grandparent; [ ] guardian of the person. I hereby give (check boxes applicable):

[ ] Any needed organs, tissues, or parts;

_____ _____
Date Signature of Survivor

Address of Survivor

INSTRUCTIONS

See Section 2(b) [72-17-201(2)] Comments.

As described in the Comments to the original Act, subsection (b) [72-17-214(2)]:

". . . provides for the effect of indicated objections by the decedent, and differences of view among the survivors. . . . In view of the fact that persons under 18 years of age are excluded from Section 2 [former and current 72-17-201(1)], it is especially desirable to cover with care the status of survivors, so younger decedents may be included."

"Knows" is substituted for "actual notice" in subsection (b) [72-17-214(2)] and throughout the Act. Knowledge, i.e., what is known, is a more useful concept than actual notice, i.e., what should be known.

Subsection (c) [72-17-214(3)] is Section 4(e) [72-17-204(3) (now repealed)] of the original Act with the addition of "other form of communication."

Subsection (d) [72-17-214(4)] limits the right of revocation of a gift made by other survivors pursuant to subsection (a) [72-17-214(1)]. If there is no prior knowledge of the revocation by the individual removing the organ or tissue, the revocation is ineffective for any purpose and the anatomical gift may be procured and utilized as though no attempted revocation had occurred.

Subsection (e) [72-17-214(5)] is based on the concept that failure to act is ambiguous. This subsection removes that ambiguity. If a person of a prior class under subsection (a) [72-17-214(1)] is available but does not make a gift, subsection (e) [72-17-214(5)] authorizes a gift by a person of a lower class. If an anatomical gift is not made pursuant to Section 3 [72-17-214], the provisions of Section 4 [72-17-215] apply.

2007 Amendment: Chapter 345 in (1) at beginning inserted "Subject to subsections (2) and (3)", after "persons" inserted "who is reasonably available", after "body" substituted "for a purpose authorized in 72-17-201(1)" for "for an authorized purpose", and at end inserted "as provided for in 72-17-201"; inserted (1)(a) allowing agent of decedent who could have made anatomical gift immediately before death to make gift; inserted (1)(f) allowing adult grandchildren of decedent to make anatomical gift; inserted (1)(i) allowing any other person having authority to dispose of decedent's body to make anatomical gift; inserted (2) allowing anatomical gift by member of class under certain conditions; in (3)(a) before "available" inserted "reasonably" and after "make" inserted "or to object to the making of"; in (3)(b) after "refusal" deleted "or contrary indications"; deleted former (3)(c) that read: "(c) the person proposing to make an anatomical gift knows of an objection to making an anatomical gift by a member of the person's class or a prior class"; inserted (5) allowing an anatomical gift by authorized person to be amended or revoked orally or in record by member of prior class and allowing gift to be amended or revoked by majority of available members if more than one member of prior class is available; in (6) at beginning substituted "A revocation made under subsection (5) is effective only if, before an incision has been made" for "An anatomical gift made by a person authorized under subsection (1) may be revoked by any member of the same or a prior class if, before procedures have begun", after "decedent" inserted "or before invasive procedures have begun to prepare the recipient", and before "physician" inserted "procurement organization, transplant hospital"; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective October 1, 2007.

72-17-215. Authorization by coroner or local public health official.

Official Comments

Under Section 2(b) [former 72-17-201(2)] of the original Act, the last category of persons authorized to make an anatomical gift "in the absence of actual notice of contrary indications by the decedent or actual notice of opposition by a member of the same or a prior class" was:

"(6) any other person authorized or under obligation to dispose of the body." [Omitted in 1969 Montana enactment.]

This was a residuary authorization, to apply in situations in which an individual did not "give all or any part of his body for any purpose" and the next of kin or guardian of the person did not make a gift. This residuary authorization in the original Act has been deleted in the proposed amendments and replaced by the more limited provisions of new Section 4 [72-17-215].

It is a residuary authorization for transplant or therapeutic purposes only.

The Task Force on Organ Transplantation reported that the number of potential donors annually is much smaller than the estimated one million deaths that occur each year in hospitals in the United States. The Hastings Center Report explained the uncertainty:

"There is no generally accepted figure for the number of persons who die each year in the United States under circumstances that would allow them to serve as cadaver organ donors. Studies conducted by the Centers for Disease Control of the U.S. Public Health Service suggest that at least 12,000 [based upon an age range of brain-dead donors from five to fifty-five years] and perhaps as many as 27,000 [based upon an age range of brain-dead donors from birth to age sixty-five] deaths which would permit cadaver organ recovery occur each year in hospitals in the United States. . . . Given the available estimates of the size of the donor pool, the current system for procuring organs yields somewhere between nine and twenty percent of the possible pool of donors for various types of organs and tissues."

In several states, there are statutes authorizing the medical examiner to remove eyes or corneal tissue under specified circumstances. These statutes are constitutional, Georgia Lions Eye Bank Inc. v. Lavant, 255 Ga. 60, 335 S.E.2d 127, 129 (1985)—"The protection of the public health is one of the duties devolving upon the State as a sovereign power;" cert. denied [475] U.S. [1084], 106 S.Ct. 1464, 89 L.Ed. 721 (1986); Florida v. Powell, Fla., 497 So.2d 1188 (1986). There has been a significant increase in the number of corneal tissues available for transplant as a result of these statutes. For example, before passage of the statute in Georgia in 1978 approximately 25 corneal transplants were performed each year. In 1984, more than 1,000 persons regained their sight through transplants. In Florida, the increase was from 500 to more than 3,000.

Section 4 [72-17-215] applies this statutory concept to the removal of "any part from a body" for transplant or therapy only. Specific circumstances must exist and conditions for removal are prescribed. The title of the public official is bracketed to permit each state to designate the appropriate official. There is a variation among existing statutes in the requirement to inform or seek consent of next of kin before organs or tissues are removed. In several states, including Georgia and Florida, there is no requirement to inform or seek consent if the other conditions prescribed by statute are satisfied. In others, information and consent are required. Subsection (a)(2) [72-17-215(1)(b)] seeks to balance societal and family interests, that is, to increase the size of the donor pool and to give the family the opportunity to make or refuse to make an anatomical gift. The balance in this subsection is on the side of increasing the size of the donor pool. The duty to search the medical record or to inform next of kin is limited to "a reasonable effort taking into account the useful life of the part . . . ." This reflects a concern expressed in the Comments to the original Act: ". . . the very limited time available following death for the successful recovery of such critical tissues . . . ." The time will vary depending upon the part involved. In the case of corneal tissue, the time is within six hours after death. In the case of organs, the need, availability, and efficacy of life support systems must be considered. If removal must be immediate and there is no medical or other record and no person specified in Section 3(a) [72-17-214(1)] is present, the requirement of subsection (a)(2) [72-17-215(1)(b)] is satisfied.

Subsection (b) [72-17-215(2)] is a companion provision to subsection (a) [72-17-215(1)] to cover similar situations but in cases where the [coroner] [medical examiner] is not authorized to act. Under both subsections, the removal and release is limited to transplant or therapeutic purposes.

Part 3
Regulation — Qualifications

72-17-301. Rights and duties at death.

Official Comments to Revised Section

In subsection (a) [72-17-301(1)] the first sentence is a restatement of Section 2(e) [72-17-203 (now repealed)] of the original Act. The remainder of the subsection is Section 7(a) [former 72-17-301(1)] of the original Act.

The Comments to the original Act state:

"Subsection 2(e) [72-17-203 (now repealed)] recognizes and gives legal effect to the right of the individual to dispose of his own body without subsequent veto by others. . . . If the donee accepts the gift, absolute ownership vests in him. . . . The only restrictions are that the part must be removed without mutilation and the remainder of the body vests in the next of kin."

Subsection (b) [72-17-301(2)] is a restatement of Section 7(b) [former 72-17-301(2)] of the original Act.

The Comments to that original subsection include the following:

". . . because time is short following death for a transplant to be successful, the transplant team needs to remove the critical organ as soon as possible. Hence there is a possible conflict of interest between the attending physician and the transplant team, and accordingly subsection (b) [former 72-17-301(2)] excludes the attending physician from any part in the transplant procedures. . . . However, the language of the provision does not prevent the donor's attending physician from communicating with the transplant team or other relevant donees. This communication is essential to permit the transfer of important knowledge concerning the donor . . . ."

Official Comments to Original Section

[Sections 72-17-210 (renumbered 72-17-301) and 72-17-104 (now repealed) contain] several important provisions. The donee may of course, reject the gift if he deems it best to do so. If he accepts the gift, all possible provision is made for taking account of the interests of the survivors in dignified memorial ceremonies. Also if the donee accepts the gift, absolute ownership vests in him. He may, if he so desires, transfer his ownership to another person, whether the gift be of the whole body or merely a part. He may "cause the part to be removed" either by himself or by another person. The only restrictions are that the part must be removed without mutilation and the remainder of the body vests in the next of kin.

[Section 72-17-210(2) (renumbered 72-17-301(2))] leaves the determination of the time of death to the attending or certifying physician. No attempt is made to define the uncertain point in time when life terminates. This point is not subject to clear cut definition and medical authorities are currently working toward a consensus on the matter. Modern methods of cardiac pacing, artificial respiration, artificial blood circulation and cardiac stimulation can continue certain bodily systems and metabolism far beyond spontaneous limits. The real question is when have irreversible changes taken place that preclude return to normal brain activity and self sustaining bodily functions. No reasonable statutory definition is possible. The answer depends upon many variables, differing from case to case. Reliance must be placed upon the judgment of the physician in attendance. The Uniform Act so provides.

However, because time is short following death for a transplant to be successful, the transplant team needs to remove the critical organ as soon as possible. Hence there is a possible conflict of interest between the attending physician and the transplant team, and accordingly [72-17-210(2) (renumbered 72-17-301(2))] excludes the attending physician from any part in the transplant procedures. Such a provision isolates the conflict of interest and is eminently desirable. However, the language of the provision does not prevent the donor's attending physician from communicating with the transplant team or other relevant donees. This communication is essential to permit the transfer of important knowledge concerning the donor, for example, the nature of the disease processes affecting the donor or the results of studies carried out for tissue matching and other immunological data.

The entire section 7 [72-17-210 (renumbered 72-17-301) and 72-17-104 (now repealed)] merits genuinely liberal interpretation to effectuate the purpose and intent of the Uniform Act, that is, to encourage and facilitate the important and ever increasing need for human tissue and organs for medical research, education and therapy, including transplantation.

72-17-302. Sale or purchase of parts prohibited.

Official Comments

The report of the Task Force pursuant to the 1984 National Organ Transplant Act recommended that states pass laws prohibiting "the sale of organs from cadavers or living donors within their boundaries."

This section is not limited to donors. It applies to any person and to both purchases and sales for transplantation or therapy. It does not cover the sale by living donors if removal is intended to occur before death.

A major finding of the Hastings Center Report is:

"Altruism and a desire to benefit other members of the community are important moral reasons which motivate many to donate. Any perception on the part of the public that transplantation unfairly benefits those outside the community, those who are wealthy enough to afford transplantation, or that it is undertaken primarily with an eye toward profit rather than therapy will severely imperil the moral foundations, and thus the efficacy of the system."

UNIFORM TRANSFERS TO MINORS ACT

Chapter Official Comments

This Act revises and restates the Uniform Gifts to Minors Act (UGMA), one of the Conference's most successful products, some version of which has been enacted in every American jurisdiction.

The original version of UGMA was adopted by the Conference in 1956 and closely followed a model "Act concerning Gifts of Securities to Minors" which was sponsored by the New York Stock Exchange and the Association of Stock Exchange Firms and which had been adopted in 14 states. The 1956 version of UGMA broadened the model act to cover gifts of money as well as securities but made few other changes.

In 1965 and 1966 the Conference revised UGMA to expand the types of financial institutions which could serve as depositories of custodial funds, to facilitate the designation of successor custodians, and to add life insurance policies and annuity contracts to the types of property (cash and securities) that could be made the subject of a gift under the Act.

Not all states adopted the 1966 revisions; some 11 jurisdictions retained their versions of the 1956 Act. More importantly, however, many states since 1966 have substantially revised their versions of UGMA to expand the kinds of property that may he [sic] made the subject of a gift under the Act, and a few states permit transfers to custodians from other sources, such as trusts and estates, as well as lifetime gifts. As a result, a great deal of non-uniformity has arisen among the states. Uniformity in this area is important, for the Conference has cited UGMA as an example of an act designed to avoid conflicts of law when the laws of more than one state may apply to a transaction or a series of transactions.

This Act follows the expansive approach taken by several states and allows any kind of property, real or personal, tangible or intangible, to be made the subject of a transfer to a custodian for the benefit of a miner [sic] [72-26-502(6)]. In addition, it permits such transfers not only by lifetime outright gifts [72-26-604], but also from trusts, estates and guardianships, whether or not specifically authorized in the governing instrument [72-26-605 and 72-26-606], and from other third parties indebted to a minor who does not have a conservator, such as parties against whom a minor has a tort claim or judgment, and depository institutions holding deposits or insurance companies issuing policies payable on death to a minor [72-26-607]. For this reason, and to distinguish the enactment of this statute from the 1956 and 1966 versions of UGMA, the title of the Act has been changed to refer to "Transfers" rather than to "Gifts," a much narrower term.

As so expanded, the Act might be considered a statutory form of trust or guardianship that continues until the minor reaches 21 [18 in Montana]. Note, however, that unlike a trust, a custodianship is not a separate legal entity or taxpayer. Under [72-26-609(2)], the custodial property is indefeasibly vested in the minor, not the custodian, and thus any income received is attributable to and reportable by the minor, whether or not actually distributed to the minor.

The expansion of the Act to permit transfers of any kind of property to a custodian creates a significant problem of potential personal liability for the minor or the custodian arising from the ownership of property such as real estate, automobiles, general partnership interests, and business proprietorships. This problem did not exist under UGMA under which custodial property was limited to bank deposits, securities and insurance. In response, [72-26-706] generally limits the claims of third parties to recourse against the custodial property, with the minor insulated against personal liability unless he is personally at fault. The custodian is similarly insulated unless he is personally at fault or fails to disclose his custodial capacity in entering into a contract.

Nevertheless, the Act should be used with caution with respect to property such as real estate or general partnership interests from which liabilities as well as benefits may arise. Many of the possible risks can and should be insured against, and the custodian has the power under [72-26-701(1)] to purchase such insurance, at least when other custodial assets are sufficient to do so. If the assets are not sufficient, there is doubt that a custodian will act, or there are significant uninsurable risks, a transferor should consider a trust with spendthrift provisions, such as a minority trust under Section 2503(c), IRC, rather than a custodianship, to make a gift of such property to a minor.

The Act retains (or reverts to) 21 [18 in Montana] as the age of majority or, more accurately, the age at which the custodianship terminates and the property is distributed. Since tax law permits duration of Section 2503(c) trusts to 21, even though the statutory age of majority is 18 in most states, this age should be retained since most donors and other transferors wish to preserve a custodianship as long as possible.

Finally, the Act restates and rearranges, rather than amends, the 1966 Act. The addition of other forms of property and other forms of dispositions made adherence to the format and language of the prior act very unwieldy. In addition, the 1966 and 1956 Acts closely followed the language of the earlier model act, which had already been adopted in several states, even though it did not conform to Conference style. It is hoped that this rewriting and revision of UGMA will improve its clarity while also expanding its coverage.

72-26-502. Definitions.

Official Comments

To reflect the broader scope and the unlimited types of property to which the new Act will apply, a number of definitional changes have been made from the 1966 Act. In addition, several definitions specifically applicable to the limited types of property (cash, securities and insurance policies) subject to the 1966 Act have been eliminated as unnecessary. These include the definitions of "bank," "issuer," "life insurance policy or annuity contract," "security," and "transfer agent." No change in the meaning or construction of these terms as used in this Act is intended by such deletions.

The definitions of "domestic financial institution" and "insured financial institution" have been eliminated because few if any states limit deposits by custodians to local institutions, and the prudent person rule of [72-26-702(2)] may dictate the use of insured institutions as depositories, without having the Act so specify.

The principal changes or additions to the remaining definitions are discussed below.

[Subsection] (2). The definition of "benefit plan" is intentionally very broad and is meant to cover any contract, plan, system, account or trust such as a pension plan, retirement plan, death benefit plan, deferred compensation plan, employment agency arrangement or, stock bonus, option or profit sharing plan.

[Subsection] (4). The term "conservator" rather than "guardian of the estate" has been employed in the Act to conform to Uniform Probate Code terminology. The term includes a guardian of the minor's property, whether general, limited or temporary, and includes a committee, tutor, or curator of the minor's property.

[Subsection] (6). The definition of "custodial property" has been generalized and expanded to encompass every conceivable legal or equitable interest in property of any kind, including real estate and tangible or intangible personal property. The term is intended, for example, to include joint interests with right of survivorship, beneficial interests in land trusts, as well as all other intangible interests in property. Contingent or expectancy interests such as the designation as a beneficiary under insurance policies or benefit plans become "custodial property" only if the designation is irrevocable, or when it becomes so, but the Act specifically authorizes the "nomination" of a future custodian as beneficiary of such interests (see [72-26-601]). Proceeds of custodial property, both immediate and remote, are themselves custodial property, as is the case under UGMA.

Custodial property is defined without reference to the physical location of the property, even if it has one. No useful purpose would be served by restricting the application of the Act to, for example, real estate "located in this state," since a conveyance recorded in the state of the property's location, if done with proper formalities, should be effective even if that state has not enacted this Act. The rights, duties and powers of the custodian should be determined by reference to the law of the state under which the custodianship is created, assuming there is sufficient nexus under [72-26-503] between that state and the transferor, the minor or the custodian.

[Subsection] (11). [Not applicable in Montana.] This definition of "minor" retains the historical age of 21 as the age of majority, even though most states have lowered the age for most other purposes, as well as in their versions of the 1966 Act. Nevertheless, because the Internal Revenue Code continues to permit "minority trusts" under Section 2503(c), IRC, to continue in effect until age 21, and because it is believed that most donors creating minority trusts or custodianships prefer to retain the property under management for the benefit of the young person as long as possible, it is strongly suggested that the age of 21 be retained as the age of majority under the Act. For states that have reduced the age of majority in their versions of the 1966 Act, [72-26-505(3)] of this Act provides that a change back to 21 will not affect custodianships that have already terminated at an earlier age.

[Subsection] (13). The definition of the term "personal representative" is based upon that definition in Sec. 1-201(30) of the Uniform Probate Code [72-1-103(31)].

[Subsection] (15). The new definition of "transfer" is necessary to reflect the application of the Act not only to gifts, but also to distributions from trusts and estates, obligors of the minor, and transfers of the minor's own assets to a custodianship by the legal representative of a minor, all of which are now permitted by this Act.

[Subsection] (16). The new definition of "transferor" is required because the term includes not only the maker of a gift, i.e., a donor in the usual sense, but also fiduciaries and obligors who control or own property that is the subject of the transfer. Nothing in this Act requires that a transferor be an "adult." If permitted under other law of the enacting state relating to emancipation or competence to make a will, gift, or other transfer, a minor may make an effective transfer of property to a custodian for his benefit or for the benefit of another minor.

[Subsection] (17). Only entities authorized to exercise "general" trust powers qualify as "trust companies"; that is, the authority to exercise only limited fiduciary responsibilities, such as the authority to accept Individual Retirement Account deposits, is not sufficient.

Compiler's Comments

1989 Amendment: In definition of adult increased age of majority from 18 years to 21 years; and in definition of minor increased maximum age of minority from 18 years to 21 years.

Source — Explanation of Editorial Comments for 1989 Amendments: Chapter 582, L. 1989, generally revised the Uniform Probate Code and related law. The editorial comments that follow each section amended by Ch. 582 were prepared by Professor E. Edwin Eck of the University of Montana (now University of Montana-Missoula) School of Law.

1989 Editorial Comment: When the legislature adopted the Uniform Transfers to Minors Act in 1985, a minor was defined as "an individual who had not attained the age of 18 years". The term adult was correspondingly defined. Such a definition was contrary to the intention of the drafters of the Act. See 8 Uniform Laws Annotated 212 (pocket part) (1989). More importantly, such a definition was contrary to likely desires of donors who probably preferred that the transferred property be managed by the custodian for as long as possible.

Sections 72-26-604 and 72-26-605 authorize transfers to custodians "for the benefit of a minor". The Montana definition of a minor apparently prevented the creation of a custodianship for a person 18 years of age or older and under 21 years of age. Nevertheless, a custodianship could have been created for a person under 18 years of age and such a custodianship would not terminate until attainment of 21 years of age. See 72-26-803(1).

This change defines a minor as an individual who has not attained the age of 21 years. Thus, a custodianship can be created for any person who has not attained 21 years of age. This change places Montana in conformance with the national Uniform Transfers to Minors Act. See corresponding national Uniform Transfers to Minors Act section 1.

This change does not deprive any adult of his or her rights. The Act sets age 21 as the age at which the custodianship terminates and the property is distributed. For convenience of reference, the Act refers to 21 as the age of majority. However, if a donor does not make an irrevocable gift described in 72-26-604 or an irrevocable transfer described in 72-26-605, the custodianship will terminate upon the person's attaining the age of 18 years. See 72-26-803.

72-26-503. Scope and jurisdiction.

Official Comments

This section has no counterpart in the 1966 Act. It attempts to resolve uncertainties and conflicts-of-laws questions that have frequently arisen because of the present nonuniformity of UGMA in the various states and which may continue to arise during the transition from UGMA to this Act.

The creation of a custodianship must invoke the law of a particular state because of the form of the transfer required under [72-26-603(1)]. This section provides that a choice of the UTMA of the enacting state is appropriate and effective if any of the nexus factors specified in subsection [(1)] exists at the time of the transfer. This Act continues to govern, and subsection [(2)] makes the custodian accountable and subject to personal jurisdiction in the courts of the enacting state for the duration of the custodianship, despite subsequent relocation of the parties or the property.

Subsection [(3)] recognizes that residents of the enacting state may elect to have the law of another state apply to a transfer. That choice is valid if a nexus with the chosen state exists at the time of the transfer. If personal jurisdiction can be obtained in the enacting state under other law apart from this Act, the custodianship may be enforced in its courts, which are directed to apply the law of the state elected by the transferor.

If the choice of law under subsection [(1)] or [(3)] is ineffective because of the absence of the required nexus, the transfer may still be effective under the Act of another state with which a nexus does exist. See [72-26-504].

72-26-504. Applicability.

Official Comments

This section is new and has two purposes. First, it operates as a "savings clause" to validate transfers made after its effective date which mistakenly refer to the enacting state's UGMA rather than to this Act. Second, it validates transfers attempted under the UGMA of another state which would not permit transfers from that source or of property of that kind or under the UTMA of another state with no nexus to the transaction, provided in each case that the enacting state has a sufficient nexus to the transaction under [72-26-503].

72-26-505. Effect on existing custodianships.

Official Comments

Subsection [(1)] is new and is based on Section 45-109a of the Connecticut Act which validates gifts of real estate and partnership interests made prior to their inclusion as "custodial property" under that Act. However, this provision goes further and purports also to validate prior transfers of the kind now covered by the Act, i.e., transfers from estates, trusts, guardianships, and obligors.

All states have previously enacted some version of UGMA, and it will be more orderly to subject gifts or other transfers under the prior Act to the procedures of this Act, rather than to keep both Acts in force, presumably for 18 or 21 years until all custodianships created under prior law have terminated. Subsection [(2)] is intended to apply this Act to prior gifts and existing custodianships insofar as it is constitutionally permissible to do so. However, prior custodianships will continue to terminate at the age prescribed under the prior Act.

Optional subsection [(3)] is also new and is based upon Section 45-109b of the Connecticut Act. It is intended for adoption in those states that amended their Acts to reduce the age of majority to 18, but which adopt the recommended return to 21 as the ago [sic] at which custodianships terminate. Its purpose is to avoid resurrecting custodianships for persons not yet 21 which terminated during the period that the age of 18 governor [sic] termination.

Manner of Creating Custodial Property and Effecting Transfer

72-26-601. Nomination of custodian.

Official Comments

This section is new and permits a future custodian for a minor to be nominated to receive a distribution under a will or trust, or as a beneficiary of a power of appointment, or of contractual rights such as a life or endowment insurance policy, annuity contract, P.O.D. Account, benefit plan, or similar future payment right. Nomination of a future custodian does not constitute a "transfer" under this Act and does not create custodial property. If it did, the nomination and beneficiary designation would have to be permanent, since a "transfer" is irrevocable and indefeasibly vests ownership of the interest in the minor under [72-26-609(2)].

Instead, this section permits a revocable beneficiary designation that takes effect only when the donor dies, or when a lifetime transfer to the custodian for the minor beneficiary occurs, such as a distribution under an inter vivos trust. However, an unrevoked nomination under this section is binding on a personal representative or trustee [72-26-605(2)] and on insurance companies and other obligors who contract to pay in the future [72-26-607(2)].

The person making the nomination may name contingent or successive future custodians to serve, in the order named, in the event that the person first nominated dies, or is unable, declines, or is ineligible to serve. Such a substitute future custodian is a custodian "nominated . . . under [this section]" to whom the transfer must be made under [72-26-605(2) and 72-26-607(2)].

Any person nominated as future custodian may decline to serve before the transfer occurs and may resign at any time after the transfer. See [72-26-801].

72-26-602. Single custodianship.

Official Comments

The first sentence follows Section 2(b) of the 1966 Act [former 72-26-201]. The second sentence states what was implicit in the 1966 Act, that additional transfers at different times and from different sources may be made to an existing custodian for the minor and do not create multiple custodianships. This provision also permits an existing custodian to be named as successor custodian by another custodian for the same minor who resigns under [72-26-801] for the purpose of consolidating the assets in a single custodianship.

Note, however, that these results are limited to transfers made "under this Act." Gifts previously made under the enacting state's UGMA or under the UGMA or UTMA of another state must be treated as separate custodianships, even though the same custodian and minor are involved, because of possible differences in the age of distribution and custodian's powers under those other Acts.

Even when all transfers to a single custodian are made "under this Act" and a single custodianship results, custodial property transferred under [72-26-606 and 72-26-607] must be accounted for separately from property transferred under [72-26-604 and 72-26-605] because the custodianship will terminate sooner with respect to the former property if the enacting state has a statutory age of majority lower than 21. See [72-26-803] and the Comment thereto.

72-26-603. Manner of creating custodial property and effecting transfer — designation of initial custodian — control.

Official Comments

The 1966 Act contained optional bracketed language permitting an adopting state to limit the class of eligible initial custodians to an adult member of the minor's family or a guardian of the minor. This optional limitation has been deleted because it would preclude the use of an individual and uncompensated custodian if no qualified or willing family member is available.

Otherwise, with respect to transfers of securities, cash, and insurance or annuity contracts, this section tracks the cognate provisions of subsection 2(a) of the 1966 Act [former 72-26-201], with one exception. Under subsection [(1)(a)(ii)], a transfer of securities in registered form may be accomplished without registering the transfer in the name of the custodian so that transfers may be accomplished more expeditiously, and so that securities may be held by custodians in street name. In other words, subsection [(1)(a)(i)] is not the exclusive manner for making effective transfers of securities in registered form. [The amendment of subsection (1)(b) by Ch. 86, L. 1987, also provides for the transfer of securities held in the name of a broker, financial institution, or its nominee, i.e., unregistered securities, as custodial property.]

In addition, subsection [(1)] creates new procedures for handling the additional types of property now subject to the Act; specifically:

[Subsection (1)(c)] covers the irrevocable transfer of ownership of like and endowment insurance policies and annuity contracts.

[Subsection (1)(d)] covers the irrevocable exercise of a power of appointment and the irrevocable present assignment of future payment rights, such as royalties, interest and principal payments under a promissory note, or beneficial interests under life or endowment or annuity insurance contracts or benefit plans. The payor, issuer, or obligor may require additional formalities such as completion of a specific assignment form and an endorsement, but the transfer is effective upon delivery of the notification. See [72-26-601] and the Comment thereto for the procedure for revocably "nominating" a future custodian as a beneficiary of a power of appointment or such payment rights.

[Subsection (1)(e)] is the exclusive method for the transfer of real estate and includes a disposition effected by will. Under the law of those states in which a devise of real estate vests in the devisee without the need for a deed from the personal representative of the decedent, a document such as the will must still be "recorded" under this provision to make the transfer effective. For inter vivos transfers, of course, a conveyance in recordable form would be employed for dispositions of real estate to a custodian.

[Subsection (1)(f)] covers the transfer of personal property such as automobiles, aircraft, and other property subject to registration of ownership with a state or federal agency. Either registration of the transfer in the name of the custodian or delivery of the endorsed certificate in registerable form makes the transfer effective.

[Subsection (1)(g)] is a residual classification, covering all property not otherwise covered in the preceding paragraphs. Examples would include nonregistered securities, partnership interests, and tangible personal property not subject to title certificates.

The form of transfer document recommended and set forth in subsection [(2)] contains an acceptance that must be executed by the custodian to make the disposition effective. While such a form of written acceptance is not specifically required in the case of registered securities under subsection [(1)(a)], money under [(1)(b)], insurance contracts or interests under [(1)(c) or (1)(d)], real estate under [(1)(e)], or titled personal property under [(1)(f)], it is certainly the better and recommended practice to obtain the acknowledgment, consent, and acceptance of the designated custodian on the instrument of transfer, or otherwise.

A transferor may create a custodianship by naming himself as custodian, except for transfers of securities under subsection [(1)(a)(ii)], insurance and annuity contracts under [(1)(c)(ii)], and titled personalty under [(1)(f)(ii)], which are made without registering them in the name of the custodian, and transfers of the residual class of property covered by [(1)(g)]. In all of these cases a transfer of possession and control to a third party is necessary to establish donative intent and consummation of the transfer, and designation of the transferor as custodian renders the transfer invalid under [72-26-609(1)(b)].

Note, also, that the Internal Revenue Service takes the position that custodial property is includable in the gross estate of the donor if he appoints himself custodian and dies while serving in that capacity before the minor attains the age of 21. Rev.Rul. 57-366, C.B. 1957-2, 618; Rev.Rul. 59-357, C.B. 1959-2, 212; Rev.Rul. 70-348, C.B. 1970-2, 193; Estate of Prudowsky v. Comm'r, 55 T.C. 890 (1971), affd. per curiam, 465 F.2d 62 (7th Cir. 1972).

This Act has been drafted in an attempt to avoid income attribution to the parent or inclusion of custodial insurance policies on a custodian's life in the estate of the custodian through the changes made in the standards for expenditure of custodial property and the custodian's incidents of ownership in custodial property. See [72-26-701 and 72-26-703] and the Comments thereto. However, the much greater problem of inclusion of custodial property in the estate of the donor who serves as custodian remains. Therefore, despite the fact that this section of the Act permits it in the case of registered securities, money, life insurance, real estate, and personal property subject to titling laws, it is generally still inadvisable for a donor to appoint himself custodian or for a parent of the minor to serve as custodian. See, generally Sections 2036 and 2038 I.R.C. and Rulings and cases cited above; with respect to gifts of closely held stock when a donor retains voting rights by serving as custodian, see Section 2036(b), I.R.C., overruling U.S. v. Byrum, 408 U.S. 125 (1972), rehearing denied 409 U.S. 898.

Subsection [(3)] tracks in substance Section 2(c) of the 1966 Act [former 72-26-201]. However, it replaces the requirement that the transferor "promptly do all things within his power" to complete the transfer, with the requirement that such action must be taken "as soon as practicable." This change is intended only to reflect the fact that possession and control of property transferred from an estate can rarely by accomplished with the immediacy that the term "promptly" may have implied. In the case of inter vivos transfers, no relaxation of the former requirement is intended, since "prompt" transfer of dominion is usually practicable.

72-26-604. Transfer by gift or exercise of power of appointment.

Official Comments

To emphasize the different kinds of transfers that create presently effective custodianships under this Act, they are separately described in [72-26-604 through 72-26-607]. This section in part corresponds to Section 2(a) of the 1966 Act and covers the traditional lifetime gift that was the only kind of transfer authorized by the 1966 Act. It also covers an irrevocable exercise of a power of appointment in favor of a custodian, as distinguished from the exercise of a power in a revocable instrument that results only in the nomination of a future custodian under [72-26-601].

72-26-605. Transfer authorized by will or trust.

Official Comments

This section is new and has no counterpart in the 1966 Act. It is based on nonuniform provisions adopted by Connecticut, Illinois, Wisconsin and other states to validate distributions from trusts and estates to a custodian for a minor beneficiary, when the use of a custodian is expressly authorized by the governing instrument. It also covers the designation of the custodian whenever the settlor or testator fails to make a nomination, or the future custodian nominated under [72-26-601] (and any alternate named) fails to qualify.

72-26-606. Other transfer by fiduciary.

Official Comments

This section is new and has no counterpart in the 1966 Act. It covers a new concept, already authorized by the law of some states through nonuniform amendments to the 1966 Act, to permit custodianships to be used as guardianship or conservator substitutes, even though not specifically authorized by the person whose property is the subject of the transfer. It also permits the legal representative of the minor, such as a conservator or guardian, to transfer the minor's own property to a new or existing custodianship for the purposes of convenience or economies of administration.

A custodianship may be created under this section even though not specifically authorized by the transferor, the testator, or the settlor of the trust if three tests are satisfied. First, the fiduciary making the transfer must determine in good faith and in his fiduciary capacity that a custodianship will be in the best interests of the minor. Second, a custodianship may not be prohibited by, or inconsistent with, the terms of any governing instrument. Inconsistent terms would include, for example, a spendthrift clause in a governing trust, provisions terminating a governing trust for the minor's benefit at a time other than the time of the minor's age of majority, and provisions for mandatory distributions of income or principal at specific times or periodic intervals. Provisions for other outright distributions or bequests would not be inconsistent with the creation of a custodianship under this section. Third, the amount of property transferred, (as measured by its value) must be of such relatively small amount that the lack of court supervision and the typically stricter investment standards that would apply to the conservator otherwise required will not be important. However, if the property is of significant size, transfer to a custodian may still be made if the court approves and if the other two tests are met.

The custodianship created under this section without express authority in the governing instrument will terminate upon the minor's attainment of the statutory age of majority of the enacting state apart from this Act, i.e., at the same age a conservatorship of the minor would end. See [72-26-803(2)] and the Comment thereto.

72-26-607. Transfer by obligor.

This section is new and, like [72-26-606], permits a custodianship to be established as a substitute for a conservator to receive payments due a minor from sources other than estates, trusts, and existing guardianships covered by [72-26-605 and 72-26-606]. For example, a tort judgment debtor of a minor, a bank holding a joint or P.O.D. account of which a minor is the surviving payee, or an insurance company holding life insurance policy or benefit plan proceeds payable to a minor may create a custodianship under this section.

Use of this section is mandatory when a future custodian has been nominated under [72-26-601] as a named beneficiary of an insurance policy, benefit plan, deposit account, or the like, because the original owner of the property specified a custodianship (and a future custodian) to receive the property. If that custodian (or any alternate named) is not available, if none was nominated, or none could have been nominated (as in the case of a tort judgment payable to the minor), this section is permissive and does not preclude the obligor from requiring the appointment of a conservator to receive payment. It allows the obligor to transfer to a custodian unless the property exceeds the stated value, in which case a conservator must be appointed to receive it.

72-26-608. Receipt for custodial property.

Official Comments

This section discharges transferors from further responsibility for custodial property delivered to and receipted for by the custodian. See also [72-26-705] which protects transferors and other third parties dealing with custodians. Because a discharge or release for a donative transfer is not necessary, this section had no counterpart in the 1966 Act.

This section does not authorize an existing custodian, or a custodian to whom an obligor makes a transfer under [72-26-607], to settle or release a claim of the minor against a third party. Only a conservator, guardian ad litem or other person authorized under other law to act for the minor may release such a claim.

72-26-609. Validity and effect of transfer.

Official Comments

Subsection [(1)] generally tracks Section 2(c) of the 1966 Act [former 72-26-201], except that the transferor's designation of himself as custodian of property for which he is not eligible to serve under [72-26-603(1)] makes the transfer ineffective. See Comment to [72-26-603].

The balance of this section generally tracks Section 3 of the 1966 Act [former 72-26-202] with a number of necessary, and perhaps significant, changes required by the new kinds of property subject to custodianships. The 1966 Act provides that a transfer made in accordance with its terms "conveys to the minor indefeasibly vested legal title to the [custodial property]." Because equitable interests in property may be the subject of a transfer under this Act, the reference to "legal title" has been deleted, but no change concerning the effect or finality of the transfer is intended.

However, subsection [(2)] qualifies the rights of the minor in the property, by making them subject to "the rights, powers, duties and authority" of the custodian under this Act, a concept that may have been implicit and intended in the 1966 Act, but not expressed. the concept is important because of the kinds of property, particularly real estate, now subject to custodianship. If the minor is married, it would be possible for homestead, dower, or community property rights to attach to real estate (or other property) acquired after marriage by the minor through a transfer to a custodianship for his benefit. The quoted language qualifying the minor's interest in the property is intended to override these rights insofar as they may conflict with the custodian's ability and authority to manage, sell, or transfer such property while it is custodial property. Upon termination of the custodianship and transfer of the custodial property to the former minor, the custodial property would then become subject to such spousal rights for the first time.

For a list of the immunities enjoyed by third persons under subsection [(3)], see [72-26-705] and the Comment thereto.

Because a custodianship under this Act can extend beyond the age of majority in many states, or beyond emancipation of a minor through marriage or otherwise, the Drafting Committee considered the addition of a spendthrift clause to this section. The idea was rejected because neither the 1966 Act nor its predecessors had such a provision, because spendthrift protection would extend only until 21 in any event and judgments against the minor would then be enforceable, and because the spendthrift qualification on the interest of the minor in the property may be inconsistent with the theory of the Act to convey the property indefeasibly to the minor.

Administration by Custodian — Liability

72-26-701. Powers of custodian.

Official Comments

Subsection [(1)] replaces the specific list of custodian's powers in Section 4(f) of the 1966 Act [former 72-26-302] which related only to securities, money, and insurance, then the only permitted kinds of custodial property. It was determined not to expand the list to try to deal with all forms of property now covered by the Act and to specify all powers that might be appropriate for each kind of property, or to refer to an existing body of state law, such as the Trustee's Powers Act, since such powers would not be uniform. Instead, this provision grants the custodian the very broad and general powers of an unmarried adult owner of the property, subject to the prudent person rule and to the duties of segregation and record keeping specified in [72-26-702]. This approach permits the Act to be self-contained and more readily understandable by volunteer, nonprofessional fiduciaries, who most often serve as custodians. It is intended that the authority granted includes the powers most often suggested for custodians, such as the power to borrow, whether at interest or interest free, the power to invest in common trust funds, and the power to enter contracts that extend beyond the termination of the custodianship.

Subsection [(1)] further specifies that the custodian's powers or incidents of ownership in custodial property such as insurance policies may be exercised only in his capacity as custodian. This provision is intended to prevent the exercise of those powers for the direct or indirect benefit of the custodian, so as to avoid as nearly as possible the result that a custodian who dies while holding an insurance policy on his own life for the benefit of a minor will have the policy taxed in his estate. See, Section 2042, I.R.C.; but compare Terriberry v. U.S., 517 F.2d 286 (5th Cir. 1975), and Rose v. U.S., 511 F.2d 259 (5th Cir. 1975).

72-26-702. Care of custodial property.

Official Comments

Subsection [(1)] expands Section 4(a) of the 1966 Act [former 72-26-302] to include the duties to take control and appropriately register or record custodial property in the name of the custodian.

Subsection [(2)] restates and makes somewhat stricter the prudent man fiduciary standard for the custodian, since it is now cast in terms of a prudent person "dealing with property of another" rather than one "who is seeking a reasonable income and the preservation of his capital," as under the 1966 Act. The rule also adds a slightly higher standard for professional fiduciaries. The rule parallels section 7-302 of the Uniform Probate Code in order to refer to the existing and growing body of law interpreting that standard. The 1966 Act permitted a custodian to retain any security or bank account received, without the obligation to diversify investment. This subsection extends that rule to any property received.

In order to eliminate any uncertainty that existed under the 1966 Act, subsection [(3)] grants specific authority to invest custodial property in life insurance on the minor's life, provided the minor's estate is the sole beneficiary, or on the life of another person in whom the minor has an insurable interest, provided the minor, the minor's estate, or the custodian in his custodial capacity is made the beneficiary of such policies.

Subsection [(4)] generally tracks Section 4(g) of the 1966 Act but adds the provision requiring that custodial property consisting of an undivided interest be held as a tenant in common. This provision permits the custodian to invest custodial property in common trust funds, mutual funds, or in a proportional interest in a "jumbo" certificate of deposit. Investment in property held in joint tenancy with right of survivorship is not permitted, but the Act does not preclude a transfer of such an interest to a custodian, and the custodian is authorized under subsection [(2)] to retain a joint tenancy interest so received.

Subsection [(5)] follows Section 4(h) of the 1966 Act [former 72-26-302], but adds the requirement that income tax information be maintained and made available for preparation of the minor's tax returns. Because the custodianship is not a separate legal entity or taxpayer, the minor's tax identification number should be used to identify all custodial property accounts.

72-26-703. Use of custodial property.

Official Comments

Subsections [(1) and (2)] track subsections (b) and (c) of Section 4 of the 1966 Act [former 72-26-302], but with two significant changes. The standard for expenditure of custodial property has been amended to read "for the use and benefit of the minor," rather than "for the support, maintenance, education and benefit of the minor" as specified under the 1966 Act. This change is intended to avoid the implication that the custodial property can be used only for the required support of the minor.

The IRS has taken the position that the income from custodial property, to the extent it is used for the support of the minor-donee, is includable in the gross income of any person who is legally obligated to support the minor-donee, whether or not that person or parent is serving as the custodian. Rev.Rul. 56-484, C.B. 1956-2, 23; Rev.Rul. 59-357, C.B. 1959-2, 212. However, Reg. 1.662(a)-4 provides that the term "legal obligation" includes a legal obligation to support another person if, and only if, the obligation is not affected by the adequacy of the dependent's own resources. Thus, if under local law a parent may use the resources of a child for the child's support in lieu of supporting the child himself of herself, no obligation of support exists, whether or not income is actually used for support, at least if the child's resources are adequate. See, Bittker, Federal Taxation of Income Estates and Gifts ¶ 80.44 (1981).

For this reason, new subsection [(3)] has been added to specify that distributions or expenditures may be made for the minor without regard to the duty or ability of any other person to support the minor and that distributions or expenditures are not in substitution for, and shall not affect, the obligation of any person to support the minor. Other possible methods of avoiding the attribution of custodial property income to the person obligated to support the minor would be to prohibit the use of custodial property or its income for that purpose, or to provide that any such use gives rise to a cause of action by the minor against his parent to the extent that custodial property or income is so used. The first alternative was rejected as too restrictive, and the second as too cumbersome.

The "use and benefit" standard in subsections [(1) and (2)] is intended to include payment of the minor's legally enforceable obligations such as tax or child support obligations or tort claims. Custodial property could be reached by levy of a judgment creditor in any event, so there is no reason not to permit custodian or court-ordered expenditures for enforceable claims.

An "interested person" entitled to seek court ordered distributions under subsection [(2)] would include not only the parent or conservator or guardian of the minor and a transferor or a transferor's legal representative, but also a public agency or official with custody of the minor and a third party to whom the minor owes legally enforceable debts.

72-26-704. Custodian's expenses, compensation, and bond.

Official Comments

This section parallels and restates Section 5 of the 1966 Act [former 72-26-301, 72-26-304, and 72-26-305]. It deletes the statement that a custodian may act without compensation for services, since that concept is implied in the retained provision that a custodian has an "election" to be compensated. However, to prevent abuse, the latter provision for permissive compensation is denied to a custodian who is also the donor of the custodial property.

The custodian's election to charge compensation must be exercised (although the compensation need not be actually paid) at least annually or it lapses and may not be exercised later. This provision is intended to avoid imputed income to the custodian who waives compensation, and also to avoid the accumulation of a large unanticipated claim for compensation exercisable at termination of the custodianship.

This section deletes as surplusage the bracketed optional standards contained in the 1966 Act for determining "reasonable compensation" which included, "in the order stated," a direction by the donor, statutes governing compensation of custodians or guardians, or court order. While compensation of custodians becomes a more likely occurrence and a more important issue under this Act because property requiring increased management may now be subject to custodianship, compensation can still be determined by agreement, by reference to a statute or by court order, without the need to so state in this Act.

72-26-705. Exemption of third person from liability.

Official Comments

This section carries forward, but shortens and simplifies, Section 6 of the 1966 Act [former 72-26-303], with no substantive change intended. The 1966 revision permitted a 14-year old minor to appoint a successor custodian and specifically provided that third parties were entitled to rely on the appointment. Because this section refers to any custodian, and "custodian" is defined to include successor custodians [72-26-502(7)], a successor custodian appointed by the minor is included among those upon whom third parties may rely.

Similarly, because this section protects any third "persons," it is not necessary to specify here or in [72-26-609(3)] that it extends to any "issuer, transfer agent, bank, life insurance company, broker, or other person or financial institution," as did the 1966 Act. See the definition of "person" in [72-26-502(12)].

This section excludes from its protection persons with "knowledge" of the irregularity of a transaction, a concept not expressed but probably implied in Section 6 of the 1966 Act. See, e.g., State ex rel. Paden v. Currel, 597 S.W.2d 167 (Mo.App.1980) disapproving the pledge of custodial property to secure a personal loan to the custodian.

Similarly, this section does not alter the requirements for bona fide purchaser or holder in due course status under other law for persons who acquire from a custodian custodial property subject to recordation or registration.

72-26-706. Liability to third persons.

Official Comments

This section has no counterpart in the 1966 Act and is based upon Section 5-429 of the Uniform Probate Code [72-5-436], relating to limitations on the liability of conservators. Because some forms of custodial property now permitted under this Act can give rise to liabilities as well as benefits (e.g., general partnership interests, interests in real estate or business proprietorships, automobiles, etc.) the Committee believes it is necessary to protect the minor and other assets he might have or acquire from such liabilities, since the minor is unable to disclaim a transfer to a custodian for his benefit. Similar protection for the custodian is necessary so as not to discourage nonprofessional or uncompensated persons from accepting the office. Therefore this section generally limits the claims of third parties to recourse against the custodial property, as third parties dealing with a trust are generally limited to recourse against the trust corpus.

The custodian incurs personal liability only as provided in subsection [(2)] for actual fault or for failure to disclose his custodial capacity "in the contract" when contracting with third parties. In oral contracts, oral disclosure of the custodial capacity is sufficient. The minor, on the other hand, incurs personal liability under subsection [(3)] only for actual fault.

When custodial property is subjected to claims of third parties under this section, the minor or his legal representative, if not a party to the action by which the claim is successfully established, may seek to recover the loss from the custodian in a separate action. See [72-26-802] and the Comment thereto.

Renunciation, Resignation, Death, or Removal of Custodian — Accounting — Termination — Successor

72-26-801. Renunciation, resignation, death, or removal of custodian — designation of successor custodian.

Official Comments

This section tracks but condenses Section 7 of the 1966 Act [former 72-26-401 through 72-26-404] to provide that the custodian, or if the custodian does not do so, the minor if he is 14, may appoint the successor custodian, or failing that, that the conservator of the minor or a court appointee shall serve. It also covers disclaimer of the office by designated or successor custodians or by nominated future custodians who decline to serve.

This Act broadens the category of persons who may be designated by the initial custodian as successor custodian from an adult member of the minor's family, his conservator, or a trust company to any adult or trust company. However, the minor's designation remains limited to an adult member of his family (expanded to include a spouse and a stepparent, see [72-26-502(10)], his conservator, or a trust company.

72-26-802. Accounting by and determination of liability of custodian.

Official Comments

This section carries forward Section 8 of the 1966 Act [former 72-26-306], but expands the class of parties who may require an accounting by the custodian to include any person who made a transfer to him (or any such person's legal representative), the minor's guardian of the person, and the successor custodian.

Subsection [(2)] authorizes but does not obligate a successor custodian to seek an accounting by the predecessor custodian. Since the minor and other persons mentioned in subsection [(1)] may also seek an accounting from the predecessor at any time, it is anticipated that the exercise of this right by the successor should be rare.

Subsection [(1)] also gives the same parties (other than a successor custodian) the right to seek recovery from the custodian for loss or diminution of custodial property resulting from successful claims by third persons under [72-26-706], unless that issue has already been adjudicated in an action under that section to which the minor was a party.

This section does not contain a separate statute of limitations precluding petitions for accounting after termination of the custodianship. Because custodianships can be created without the knowledge of the minor, a person might learn of a custodian's failure to turn over custodial property long after reaching majority, and should not be precluded from asserting his rights in the case of such fraud. In addition, the 1966 Act has no such preclusion and seems to have worked well. Other law, such as general statutes of limitation and the doctrine of laches, should serve adequately to protect former custodians from harassment.

72-26-803. Termination of custodianship.

Official Comments

This section tracks Section 4(d) of the 1966 Act [former 72-26-302], but provides that custodianships created by fiduciaries without express authority from the donor of the property under [72-26-606] and by obligors of the minor under [72-26-607] terminate upon the minor's attaining the age of majority under the general laws of the state, since these custodianships are substitutes for conservatorships that would otherwise terminate at that time. Because property in a single custodianship may be distributable at different times, separate accounting for custodial property by source may be required. See Comment to [72-26-602].

MANAGEMENT OF INSTITUTIONAL FUNDS

General Provisions

72-30-101. Short title.

Compiler's Comments

2007 Amendment: Chapter 421 after ""Uniform" inserted "Prudent". Amendment effective October 1, 2007.

72-30-102. Definitions.

Official Comments

The Uniform Act applies generally to colleges, universities, hospitals, religious organizations and other institutions of an eleemosynary nature. It applies to a governmental organization to the extent that the organization holds funds for the listed purposes, e.g., a public school which has an endowment fund.

A non-governmental institution which is not "charitable" in the classic sense is not within the Act, even though it may hold funds for such purpose. If the fund is separate and distinct from the noncharitable organization, the fund itself may be an institution to which the Act applies.

An institutional fund is any fund held by an institution which it may invest for a long or short term. Excluded from the Act is any fund held by a trustee which is not an institution as defined in this Act, e.g., a bank or trust company, for the benefit of an institution even though the institution is the sole beneficiary.

A fund held by an institution for the benefit of any noninstitutional beneficiary is also excluded. The exclusion would apply to any fund with an individual beneficiary such as an annuity trust or a unitrust. When the interest of a noninstitutional beneficiary is terminated, the fund may then become an institutional fund.

The "use, benefit, or purposes" of an institution broadly encompasses all of the activities permitted by its charter or other source of authority. A fund to provide scholarships for students or medical care for indigent patients is held by the school or hospital for the institution's purposes. Such a fund is not deemed to be held for the benefit of a particular student or patient as distinct from the use, benefit, or purposes of the institution, nor does the student or patient have an interest in the fund as a "beneficiary which is not an institution."

The particular recipient of the aid of a charitable organization is not a "beneficiary" in the sense of a beneficiary of a private trust; only the Attorney General or similar public authority may enforce a charitable trust. 4 Scott, Law of Trusts §348 pp. 2768-9 (3d ed. 1967); Bogert, The Law of Trusts and Trustees §411-15 pp. 317-348 (2d ed. 1962).

An endowment fund is an institutional fund, or any part thereof, which is held in perpetuity or for a term and which is not wholly expendable by the institution. Implicit in the definition is the continued maintenance of all or a specified portion of the original gift. "Endowment fund" is specially defined because it is subject to the appropriation rules of [72-30-201, now repealed].

A restriction on use that makes a fund an endowment fund arises only from the applicable gift instrument. If a governing board has the power to spend all of a fund but, in its discretion, decides to invest the fund and spend only the yield or appreciation therefrom, the fund does not become an endowment fund under this definition, but it may be described as a "quasi-endowment fund" or a "fund functioning as endowment."

A fund which is not an institutional fund originally and therefore not an endowment fund may become an endowment fund at a later time. For example, a fund given to an institution to pay the grantor's widow a life income, with the remainder to the institution, would become an institutional fund on the widow's death, and, if the fund were not then wholly expendable, it would become an endowment fund at that time.

If a gift instrument provided that the institution could use the income from the fund for ten years and thereafter spend the entire principal, the fund would be an endowment fund for the ten-year period and would cease to be an endowment fund at the time it became wholly expendable.

The definition [of "governing board"] is meant to designate the policy making or management group which has the responsibility for the affairs of the institution or the fund.

"Historic dollar value" is simply the value of the fund expressed in dollars at the time of the original contribution to the fund plus the dollar value of any subsequent gifts to the fund. Accounting entries recording realization of gains or losses to the fund have no effect upon historic dollar value. No increase or decrease in historic dollar value of the fund results from the sale of an asset held by the fund and the reinvestment of the proceeds in another asset.

If the gift instrument directs accumulation, the historic dollar value will increase with each accumulation. For example, if a donor gives an institution $300,000 and directs that the fund is to be accumulated until its value reaches $500,000, the historic dollar value will be the aggregate value of $500,000 at the time the fund becomes available for use by the institution.

If under the terms of the gift instrument a portion of an endowment fund, after passage of time or upon the happening of some event, becomes currently wholly expendable, such portion should be treated as a separate fund and the historic dollar value of the remaining endowment fund should be reduced proportionately.

A gift instrument establishes the terms of the gift. It may be a writing of any form, or it may result from the institution's solicitation activities, or the by-laws, or other rules of an existing fund.

2009 Amendment: Chapter 328 in definition of endowment fund after "gift instrument" inserted "or instrument of donor intent"; inserted definition of instrument of donor intent; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective April 18, 2009.

2007 Amendment: Chapter 421 inserted definitions of charitable purpose, person, program-related asset, and record; deleted definition of governing board that read: ""Governing board" means the body responsible for the management of an institution or of an institutional fund"; deleted definition of historic dollar value that read: ""Historic dollar value" means the aggregate fair value in dollars of:

(a) an endowment fund at the time it became an endowment fund;

(b) each subsequent donation to the fund at the time it is made; and

(c) each accumulation made pursuant to a direction in the applicable gift instrument at the time the accumulation is added to the fund"; in definition of endowment fund inserted (b) providing an exemption for assets that an institution designates for its own use; in definition of gift instrument substituted "record or records" for "will, deed, grant, conveyance, agreement, memorandum, writing, or other governing document", substituted "solicitation" for "solicitations for which an institutional fund resulted", and inserted "granted to"; in definition of institution in (a) substituted "a person, other than an individual" for "an incorporated or unincorporated organization", after "for" deleted "educational, religious", and after "charitable" deleted "or other eleemosynary", in (b) substituted "government or governmental subdivision, agency, or instrumentality" for "governmental organization" and at end substituted "a charitable purpose" for "any of these purposes", and inserted (c) concerning a trust that had both charitable and noncharitable interests after all noncharitable interests have terminated; in definition of institutional fund in (a) substituted "exclusively for charitable purposes" for "for its exclusive use, benefit, or purposes", inserted (b)(i) concerning program-related assets, and in (b)(iii) substituted "an interest" for "possible rights"; and made minor changes in style. Part 2

Management of Funds

72-30-207. Release or modification of restrictions on management, investment, or purpose.

Official Comments

One of the difficult problems of fund management involves gifts restricted to uses which cannot be feasibly administered or to investments which are no longer available or productive. There should be an expeditious way to make necessary adjustments when the restrictions no longer serve the original purpose. Cy pres has not been a satisfactory answer and is reluctantly applied in some states. See Restatement of Trusts (2d), §§381, 399; 4 Scott, Law of Trusts §399 p. 3084, §399.4 pp. 3119 et seq. (3d ed. 1967).

This section permits a release of limitations that imperil efficient administration of a fund or prevent sound investment management if the governing board can secure the approval of the donor or the appropriate court.

Although the donor has no property interest in a fund after the gift, nonetheless if it is the donor's limitation that controls the governing board and he or she agrees that the restriction need not apply, the board should be free of the burden. See Restatement of Trusts (2d) §367. Scott suggests that in minor matters, the consent of the settlor may be effective to remove restrictions upon the trustees in the administration of a charitable trust. 4 Scott §367.3 p. 2846 (3d ed. 1967).

If the donor is unable to consent or cannot be identified, the appropriate court may upon application of a governing board release a limitation which is shown to be obsolete, inappropriate or impracticable.

This section authorizes only a release of a limitation. Thus, if a fund were established to provide scholarships for students named Brown from Brown County, Iowa, a donor might acquiesce in a reduction of the limitation to enable the institution to offer scholarships to students from Brown County who are not named Brown, or to students from other counties in Iowa or to students from other states, or he could acquiesce in the release of the restriction to scholarships so that the fund could be used for the general educational purposes of the school.

Subsection [(4)] makes it clear that the Act does not purport to limit the established doctrine of cy pres. A liberalization of, addition to, or substitute for cy pres is not without respectable support. Professor Kenneth Karst in "The Efficiency of the Charitable Dollar: An Unfilled State Responsibility," 73 Harv. L. Rev. 433 (1960) suggested that the doctrine of cy pres be expanded to permit the courts to redirect charitable grants if the purpose had become "obsolete, or useless, or prejudicial to the public welfare, or are insignificant in comparison with the magnitude of the endowment..." quoting from the Nathan Report (of the British Committee on the Law and Practice Relating to Charitable Trusts, Cmd. 8710, 1952) quoting the Scotland Education Act 1946, 9-10 Geo. 6, ch. 72 §119(b). The Uniform Act provision is far less broad; it applies only to the release of restrictions on the gift under limited circumstances.

New England courts apply a rather strict doctrine of separation of powers to deny legislative encroachment on judicial cy pres. The Act is compatible with the New England cases because the final decision is in the courts. See City of Hartford v. Larrabee Fund Association, 161 Conn. 312, 288 A.2d 71 (1971); Opinion of Justices, 101 N.H. 531, 133 A.2d 792 (1957).

No federal tax problems for the donor are anticipated by permitting release of a restriction. The donor has no right to enforce the restriction, no interest in the fund and no power to change the eleemosynary beneficiary of the fund. He may only acquiesce in a lessening of a restriction already in effect.

The attorney general shall be notified of the application and shall be given an opportunity to be heard. If the court finds that the restriction is obsolete, inappropriate, or impracticable, it may by order release the restriction in whole or in part. CHAPTER 31
MISCELLANEOUS PROVISIONS RELATING TO FIDUCIARIES

Chapter Case Notes

Lawsuit by Shareholder Causing Damages Considered Breach of Fiduciary Duty of Care: Sletteland brought a suit against two other corporate shareholders for charging excessive attorney fees and seeking their removal as corporate directors. The District Court held that the fees were excessive, but found no grounds for removal. The other shareholders filed a counterclaim against Sletteland, alleging that he breached his fiduciary duty in bringing the lawsuit because the timing of the suit caused refinancing of a project to fail, resulting in damage to the corporation and to other shareholders. The District Court agreed, and both parties appealed their respective issues. The Supreme Court reversed on the issue of excessive fees, but affirmed on the issue of breach of fiduciary duty. The fiduciary duty between shareholders of a close corporation is one of utmost good faith and loyalty. Sletteland admittedly knew of the refinancing and, as an attorney and investment banker, also knew the effect that a lawsuit alleging misconduct by board members would have on a refinancing effort. In fact, it appeared that the suit was brought to specifically derail the refinancing. Sletteland was the person who determined the timing of the suit, which was filed immediately before the individuals involved in the refinancing were to meet for discussions, and when asked to withdraw the suit so refinancing could conclude, he refused to do so. Sletteland did not use the care that an ordinarily prudent person would use in a similar situation, resulting in the breach of fiduciary duty. The Supreme Court also affirmed the award of damages. Although future damages could not be calculated exactly in this case, the District Court did not abuse its discretion in basing its calculations on expert testimony of a well-known regional economist. Sletteland v. Roberts, 2000 MT 382, 304 M 21, 16 P3d 1062, 57 St. Rep. 1639 (2000).

Bank's Fiduciary Duty to Borrower: The relationship between a bank and a person to whom it lends money is generally that of creditor and debtor and, as such, does not impose fiduciary duties on the bank except on proof of special circumstances, such as a situation in which the bank acts as an adviser. Security agreements between the bank and the company and its owners were part of the creditor/debtor relationship. The bank merely exercised its rights under the security agreements and the law when it foreclosed on the collateral. Even assuming that the bank owed a fiduciary duty to the company and its owners, there could be no breach of such duty when the bank acted for legitimate business reasons in accordance with the security agreements. Richland Nat'l Bank & Trust v. Swenson, 249 M 410, 816 P2d 1045, 48 St. Rep. 730 (1991).

No Negligence Regarding Repayment Term of Loan: Borrowers argued that bank was negligent in structuring a loan, but they cited no authority to support the proposition that a negligence action may be based on a repayment term of a lawful contract bargained between two parties. Absent the existence of a fiduciary duty, which bank did not have with respect to the loan, the law does not support such a claim. Richland Nat'l Bank & Trust v. Swenson, 249 M 410, 816 P2d 1045, 48 St. Rep. 730 (1991).

Fiduciary Duty Between Shareholders in Close Corporation When No Other Type of Relationship Exists: The fiduciary duty between stockholders of a close corporation is one of utmost good faith and loyalty. However, the controlling group should not be stymied by a minority stockholder's grievances if the controlling group can demonstrate a legitimate business purpose and the minority stockholder cannot demonstrate a less harmful alternative. If called on to settle a dispute between the stockholders, the court must weigh the legitimate business purpose, if any, against the practicability of a less harmful alternative. Daniels v. Thomas, Dean & Hoskins, Inc., 246 M 125, 804 P2d 359, 47 St. Rep. 2293 (1990), citing Donahue v. Rodd Electrotype Co. of New England, Inc., 328 NE 2d 505 (Mass. 1975), and Wilkes v. Springside Nursing Home, Inc., 353 NE 2d 657 (Mass. 1976), and distinguishing Skierka v. Skierka Bros., Inc., 192 M 505, 629 P2d 214 (1981), Deist v. Wachholz, 208 M 207, 678 P2d 188 (1984), and Dunfee v. Baskin-Robbins, 221 M 447, 720 P2d 1148 (1986).

In Warren v. Campbell Farming Corp., 2011 MT 324, 363 Mont. 190, 271 P.3d 36, the Montana Supreme Court, in answering a certified question from the Tenth Circuit Court of Appeals, revisited the Daniels test and concluded that the Daniels test does not apply to claims involving director conflict of interest transactions. However, the Daniels test does apply to minority shareholders' claims of breach of fiduciary duties against majority shareholders.

No Constructive Trust When Wife Awarded Home Purchased With Loan From Husband's Mother: In a divorce case, the wife was awarded the family home that had been purchased with money loaned to the husband by his mother. The lower court's decision that no constructive trust existed in the mother's favor was affirmed on appeal. The Supreme Court ruled that there had been no fraud on the wife's part and that the mother continued to lend money to her son after he had failed to secure the loans with the real estate, as she had requested. Gitto v. Gitto, 239 M 47, 778 P2d 906, 46 St. Rep. 1502 (1989).

Breach of Joint Venture Fiduciary Trust — Award of Investment Plus Interest Affirmed: Kelly and Rust agreed to purchase land, subdivide it, and sell it at a profit. Rust advanced Kelly $4,000 as one-half the purchase price. Kelly paid the $4,000 balance and recorded the deed, but did not include Rust on the recorded deed. Rust moved from the area and later attempted, through his agent, to purchase Kelly's interest in the land. The agent was told the land was already sold, so Rust brought an action to recover his investment plus interest. The trial court properly held that: (1) the parties had entered into a joint venture; (2) Kelly was required in equity to hold the property in a constructive trust; (3) Kelly breached the joint venture fiduciary duty and attempted to deprive Rust of his interest in the property; and (4) Rust was entitled to return of his $4,000 investment plus interest. Rust v. Kelly, 228 M 220, 741 P2d 786, 44 St. Rep. 1471 (1987).

Fiduciary Relationship Between Insurer and Insured — Breach Constituting Constructive Fraud: Fiduciary duties are simply a statement of the kind of good faith duty owed by an insurer to an insured. An insurance company has to consider the interests of both itself and the insured, but failure to act in the highest good faith toward the insured may constitute constructive fraud. Tynes v. Bankers Life Co., 224 M 350, 730 P2d 1115, 43 St. Rep. 2243 (1986).

Burdens of Proof in Case Involving Claimed Breach of Fiduciary Duty by Union Officers: In a dispute between a union and its former business managers, the District Court gave a general instruction that the party who asserts the affirmative of an issue has the burden of proving that issue by a preponderance of the evidence. The court further instructed the jury that if a fiduciary profits personally from the use of union funds, the burden shifts to the fiduciary to show he acted reasonably. Finally, the court instructed that a person with the duty to keep proper accounts has the burden of proving that he is entitled to the credits he claims. These instructions were consistent, clear, and accurate. Local Union No. 400 v. Bosh, 220 M 304, 715 P2d 36, 43 St. Rep. 388 (1986).

Fiduciary Duty of Union Officers: It was proper to instruct the jury on the duty of fiduciary responsibility owed by union officers by comparing it to a trust relationship; stating that, as fiduciaries, the officers were required to act prudently; and allowing the jury to consider the duties, powers, and obligations in the union constitution and bylaws. Local Union No. 400 v. Bosh, 220 M 304, 715 P2d 36, 43 St. Rep. 388 (1986). See also Luke v. Gager, 2000 MT 377, 303 M 474, 16 P3d 377, 57 St. Rep. 1599 (2000).

Fiduciary Relationship Basis for Constructive Fraud Cause of Action: Dealings or transactions between parties who have a fiduciary relationship provide a sufficient contract to support an action for constructive fraud. Local Union No. 400 v. Bosh, 220 M 304, 715 P2d 36, 43 St. Rep. 388 (1986). See also Luke v. Gager, 2000 MT 377, 303 M 474, 16 P3d 377, 57 St. Rep. 1599 (2000).

Trustee's Right to Appeal Court Order When Trustee Not a Party: Trustee-bank could appeal from court order directing trustee to pay all income due beneficiary to beneficiary's judgment creditors, even though the trustee was not a party to the action between the beneficiary and creditors. The trustee had a fiduciary duty to preserve and protect the trust assets. Lundgren v. Hoglund, 219 M 295, 711 P2d 809, 42 St. Rep. 2031 (1985).

Banks — Real Estate Sale — No Fiduciary Relationship: The bank prepared a mortgage and deed of trust as a service to and at request of the buyer and the sellers. Upon default of the buyer, the sellers filed an action for declaratory ruling as to rights between the bank and the sellers. The sellers argued there was a fiduciary relationship between themselves and the bank. The court found there were no special circumstances present that would create a fiduciary relationship when the bank did not find the buyer or advise on the terms of the sale, the sellers maintained accounts in other banks, and the sellers had dealt with the loan department on only a few occasions prior to the transaction in question. The sellers' dealings with the bank were not of the exclusive repeated nature necessary to justify finding a fiduciary relationship. Pulse v. N. Am. Land Title Co. of Mont., 218 M 275, 707 P2d 1105, 42 St. Rep. 1578 (1985), followed in Simmons v. Jenkins, 230 M 429, 750 P2d 1067, 45 St. Rep. 328 (1988). See also Mann Farms, Inc. v. Traders St. Bank of Poplar, 245 M 234, 801 P2d 73, 47 St. Rep. 2094 (1990) (replacing previous opinion, subsequently withdrawn, at 47 St. Rep. 1557 (1990)), Lachenmaier v. First Bank Sys., Inc., 246 M 26, 803 P2d 614, 47 St. Rep. 2244 (1990), Simmons Oil Corp. v. Holly Corp., 258 M 79, 852 P2d 523, 50 St. Rep. 433 (1993), Kondelik v. First Fidelity Bank of Glendive, 259 M 446, 857 P2d 687, 50 St. Rep. 874 (1993), and Gliko v. Permann, 2006 MT 30, 331 M 112, 130 P3d 155 (2006).

Attorney's Obligation to Deal in Good Faith: Because of the inequality that exists between attorney and client in bargaining over a fee, attorney has an obligation to deal fairly and in good faith when negotiating, charging, and collecting a fee. In a fee dispute over handling of dissolution, client pleaded sufficient facts to raise question whether there was a breach of the obligation owed to deal fairly and in good faith. District Court erred in granting summary judgment for attorney. Supreme Court reversed and remanded for trial, giving client leave to amend counterclaim to specifically describe a breach of the implied covenant. Morse v. Espeland, 215 M 148, 696 P2d 428, 42 St. Rep. 251 (1985).

Insurer's Concealment of Material Facts — Bad Faith: In an action against his insurance company for failure to settle a third-party claim within policy limits, plaintiff offered and the trial court gave an instruction stating that an insurer is liable for bad faith if it intentionally conceals material facts within its knowledge and not known by the insured. Defendant contended it was error to give the instruction. On appeal, the Supreme Court stated that the duty of a fiduciary to his beneficiary is no less than that of a trustee. The fiduciary, as a trustee, is bound to act in the highest good faith toward his beneficiary and may not obtain any advantage over the latter by the slightest misrepresentation, concealment, threat, or adverse pressure of any kind. It was therefore not error to inform the jury that an insurance company which "intentionally" conceals material facts within its knowledge and not known to the insured may be found to be acting in bad faith. The concealed facts must be material to the subject of the trust or duty of the fiduciary as the instruction stated. The judgment was affirmed. Gibson v. W. Fire Ins. Co., 210 M 267, 682 P2d 725, 41 St. Rep. 1048 (1984).

Bank's Fiduciary Duty to Customers It Gives Financial Advice — Real Estate Sales: Wife, whose husband had recently died, signed a contract for a deed to her ranch with Dittman, who signed as "trustee". There were two other purchasers, who did not sign: a person to whom, according to the evidence, wife would not have knowingly sold and the marketing officer of the bank used by the wife and husband for some 24 years. Wife was unfamiliar with real estate and financial affairs and relied upon the advice of various bank officers with regard to the sale of the ranch. This put the bank in a prima facie fiduciary relationship as to the wife. The relationship and its attendant duties extended to the advising officers in their dealings with the wife in regard to sale of the ranch. The marketing officer thus had a duty to fully inform the wife and protect her interests. This duty he breached, and the breach amounted to constructive fraud, where evidence showed that: (1) the contract price and terms were disadvantageous to the wife; (2) the true purchasers were not disclosed to her either by the contract or the marketing officer; (3) the purchasers intended to and began to subdivide and sell the ranch, though the marketing officer knew wife apparently did not wish this, having refused an earlier offer to purchase with right to subdivide; (4) the marketing officer had extensive financial interests involving loans to him from his bank, and an audit of the bank recommended that in view of this his lending authority should be eliminated or curtailed; and (5) the lower court was unimpressed with the way in which wife's attorney in the negotiations represented her interests. The lower court properly ordered the contract for deed rescinded. Deist v. Wachholz, 208 M 207, 678 P2d 188, 41 St. Rep. 286 (1984). See also Kondelik v. First Fidelity Bank of Glendive, 259 M 446, 857 P2d 687, 50 St. Rep. 874 (1993).

Professional Misconduct — Lawyer Disbarred: The Supreme Court found substantial credible evidence supporting the findings of the Commission on Practice that the respondent violated 72-5-423, 72-20-201 (now repealed), 72-20-203 (now repealed), 72-20-204 (now repealed), 72-20-207 (now repealed), and various disciplinary rules and that he engaged in deceitful conduct for which he could be guilty of a misdemeanor in accordance with 37-61-406. The respondent was ordered disbarred and required to make restitution of $22,127.74. In re Reno, 187 M 262, 609 P2d 704, 37 St. Rep. 688 (1980).

Specific Finding on Existence of Confidential Relationship: There was no need for a specific finding on the issue of the existence of a confidential or fiduciary relationship because there was insufficient proof of wrongdoing on the part of defendant, even if he were considered to be a voluntary trustee. Boatman v. Berg, 176 M 208, 577 P2d 382 (1978).

Forfeiture of Option: Neighboring ranchers signed a writing, agreeing to become equal partners in purchase of adjoining grazing leases and ranch lands. Each contributed $1,000 to bind a 1-year purchase option covering lands and leases. They forfeited the option and option payment but continued their joint activities. Nine months after forfeiture one partner purchased all for himself, taking title jointly with his wife, and they in turn deeded a portion to their son. The wife and son, as donees, were controlled by the donor's actions. Bradbury v. Nagelhus, 132 M 417, 319 P2d 503 (1957).

Joint Option to Purchase: Neighboring ranchers signed a writing, agreeing to become equal partners in purchase of adjoining grazing leases and ranch lands. Each contributed $1,000 to bind a 1-year purchase option covering lands and leases. The option and option payment were forfeited but they continued their joint activities. Nine months after forfeiture one partner purchased all for himself. A constructive trust was raised which purchaser could not revoke. He was required to convey an undivided one-half interest in the lands and leases to other partner subject to down-to-date accounting and reimbursement in net amount of purchase price found to be due from plaintiff to purchaser after accounting was completed from date of original agreement. Bradbury v. Nagelhus, 132 M 417, 319 P2d 503 (1957).

Industrial Accident Board: The Industrial Accident Board (now the Division of Workers' Compensation of the Department of Labor and Industry) is under a legal and moral duty to deal fairly with workmen as beneficiaries and to disclose all matters affecting their interests, either beneficially or otherwise. Yurkovich v. Indus. Accident Bd., 132 M 77, 314 P2d 866 (1957).

Gift in Violation of Trust: One who takes personal property from a trustee by way of a gift made in violation of the latter's trust becomes an involuntary trustee thereof (72-20-301, now repealed), stands in the shoes of the trustee, and cannot assert the bar of the Statute of Limitations unless he repudiates the trust, and knowledge of such repudiation is gained by the cestui que trust. Davidson v. Stagg, 94 M 272, 22 P2d 152 (1933).

Pledge Mingled With Funds of Estate: The money pledged by tenant to protect estate against abatement of property rented for violations of law constituted a trust fund. Since it had been mingled with the funds of the estate without any attempt at segregation, the entire funds of the estate were impressed with the trust in favor of the tenant, and since the residuary legatees and devisees had received the trust fund on distribution, they were liable to him for the money pledged as involuntary trustees. Ryan v. Stagg, 89 M 390, 298 P 353 (1931).

Director of Corporation: The rule declared by 72-20-205 (now repealed) that a trustee may not undertake a trust adverse in its nature to the interest of his beneficiary without the consent of the latter does not preclude a director of a corporation from becoming interested in another concern engaged in a business similar to, but not interfering with, that of his corporation. So long as he acts in good faith to the corporation and its shareholders and violates no legal or moral duty which he owes to it and them, he is free to engage in an independent competitive business. Greer v. Stannard, 85 M 78, 277 P 622, 64 ALR 772 (1929).

Officer of Bank Dealing With It: While an officer or director of a bank stands in a fiduciary relation to it and will not be permitted to profit because of his position as such, he may engage in ordinary business transactions with it or through it, provided his dealings are fair and he takes no undue advantage of his fiduciary relationship. Duffy v. Hastings, 78 M 22, 252 P 316 (1926).

Business Trust: Under 72-20-208 (now repealed), where two of three trustees of a common-law trust were officers of an oil company to which the trustees granted an extension of a drilling lease on lands owned by the trust under circumstances showing lack of good faith, and whose interests were adverse to those of the trust, it will be presumed that the agreement was entered into without consideration and through undue influence. Williard v. Campbell Oil Co., 77 M 30, 248 P 219 (1926).

Manager of Syndicate: By 72-20-201 and 72-20-207 (now repealed), it is made the duty of a trustee to act in the utmost good faith to those for whom he acts, and failure of the manager of a syndicate to inform those to whom sales of units were made through the use of the mails, that by contracts made by him approximately 50% of the proceeds of sales was paid as commissions and expenses to sales agents, was a breach of trust and a fraud upon them. Campbell v. U.S., 12 F2d 873 (1926).

Director Dealing With Corporation: There is no presumption that a director dealing with his corporation does so in bad faith unless he gains an advantage thereby, and if the company is indebted to him on a bona fide claim he may enforce it by the same method open to any other of its creditors. Mayger v. St. Louis Min. & Mill. Co., 68 M 492, 219 P 1102 (1923).

Constructive Trust:

The basis of a constructive trust is fraud, and such a trust arises when the legal title to property is obtained by a person in violation of some duty owed to the one who is equally entitled thereto, the property being held in hostility to his beneficial rights of ownership. Word v. Moore, 66 M 550, 214 P 79 (1923).

A constructive trust is created by operation of law, upon breach of a fiduciary relation by the person sought to be held, its basis being fraud, actual or constructive. MacGinniss Realty Co. v. Hinderager, 63 M 172, 206 P 436 (1922).

A constructive trust is created by operation of law, upon breach of a fiduciary relation by the person sought to be held. Eisenberg v. Goldsmith, 42 M 563, 113 P 1127 (1911).

Sale by Broker to Himself Voidable: A real estate broker entrusted with the privilege of selling the land of his principal cannot sell to himself, and where he does so, the sale made by him is voidable at the option of the owner. Crowley v. Rorvig, 61 M 245, 203 P 496 (1921), followed in Boyne, U.S.A., Inc. v. Mallas, 236 M 305, 769 P2d 1235, 46 St. Rep. 380 (1989).

Guardian: It is fraud for a guardian to use the ward's funds entrusted to him for any purpose not connected with the trust. In re Allard Guardianship, 49 M 219, 141 P 661 (1914).

Accounting — Selling Price of Land: Good faith requires an agent employed to sell land to account to his principal for the entire selling price, less the agreed commission. Middlefork Cattle Co. v. Todd, 49 M 259, 141 P 641 (1914).

Real Estate Broker: If a broker is employed to sell land at a certain price on commission, and he finds a purchaser at that price, but induces his principal to sell at a lower figure, upon the representation that he cannot get any more, and the broker pockets the difference, it is a clear case of fraud upon his principal, and an action lies to compel him to disgorge the amount of profit so wrongfully realized. Middlefork Cattle Co. v. Todd, 49 M 259, 141 P 641 (1914).

Guardian as Trustee:

A guardian is a trustee and is held to the strict accountability attaching to a trustee. Smith v. Smith, 210 F 947 (D.C. Mont. 1914), affirmed in 224 F 1 (1915).

Where a guardian who had used his ward's money in payment of his debts concealed this fact from the Court in applying for authority to borrow his ward's money at a low rate of interest, the order so procured by fraud and imposition was voidable and afforded no protection to the guardian, and he was liable for legal interest both before and after the order granting such authority, there having been no such disclosure as is required by 72-20-204 (now repealed). Smith v. Smith, 210 F 947 (D.C. Mont. 1914), affirmed in 224 F 1 (1915).

Purchase of Property by Fiduciary — Director of Mining Corporation: The directors of a mining corporation are not allowed to profit by virtue of their position, and a breach of official duty on their part is fraud in law. A director who purchases the property of the corporation at a judicial sale must not be permitted to obtain a dishonest advantage over the corporation or its stockholders. Coombs v. Barker, 31 M 526, 79 P 1 (1905).

Uniform Power of Attorney Act

Part Official Comments

Prefatory Note

The catalyst for the Uniform Power of Attorney Act (the "Act") was a national review of state power of attorney legislation. The review revealed growing divergence among states' statutory treatment of powers of attorney. The original Uniform Durable Power of Attorney Act ("Original Act"), last amended in 1987, was at one time followed by all but a few jurisdictions. Despite initial uniformity, the review found that a majority of states had enacted non-uniform provisions to deal with specific matters upon which the Original Act is silent. The topics about which there was increasing divergence included: 1) the authority of multiple agents; 2) the authority of a later-appointed fiduciary or guardian; 3) the impact of dissolution or annulment of the principal's marriage to the agent; 4) activation of contingent powers; 5) the authority to make gifts; and 6) standards for agent conduct and liability. Other topics about which states had legislated, although not necessarily in a divergent manner, included: successor agents, execution requirements, portability, sanctions for dishonor of a power of attorney, and restrictions on authority that has the potential to dissipate a principal's property or alter a principal's estate plan.

A national survey was then conducted by the Joint Editorial Board for Uniform Trust and Estate Acts (JEB) to ascertain whether there was actual divergence of opinion about default rules for powers of attorney or only the lack of a detailed uniform model. The survey was distributed to probate and elder law sections of all state bar associations, to the fellows of the American College of Trust and Estate Counsel, the leadership of the ABA Section of Real Property, Probate and Trust Law and the National Academy of Elder Law Attorneys, as well as to special interest list serves of the ABA Commission on Law and Aging. Forty-four jurisdictions were represented in the 371 surveys returned.

The survey responses demonstrated a consensus of opinion in excess of seventy percent that a power of attorney statute should:

(1) provide for confirmation that contingent powers are activated;

(2) revoke a spouse-agent's authority upon the dissolution or annulment of the marriage to the principal;

(3) include a portability provision;

(4) require gift making authority to be expressly stated in the grant of authority;

(5) provide a default standard for fiduciary duties;

(6) permit the principal to alter the default fiduciary standard;

(7) require notice by an agent when the agent is no longer willing or able to act;

(8) include safeguards against abuse by the agent;

(9) include remedies and sanctions for abuse by the agent;

(10) protect the reliance of other persons on a power of attorney; and

(11) include remedies and sanctions for refusal of other persons to honor a power of attorney.

Informed by the review and the survey results, the Conference's drafting process also incorporated input from the American College of Trust and Estate Counsel, the ABA Section of Real Property, Probate and Trust Law, the ABA Commission on Law and Aging, the Joint Editorial Board for Uniform Trust and Estate Acts, the National Conference of Lawyers and Corporate Fiduciaries, the American Bankers Association, AARP, other professional groups, as well as numerous individual lawyers and corporate counsel. As a result of this process, the Act codifies both state legislative trends and collective best practices, and strikes a balance between the need for flexibility and acceptance of an agent's authority and the need to prevent and redress financial abuse.

While the Act contains safeguards for the protection of an incapacitated principal, the Act is primarily a set of default rules that preserve a principal's freedom to choose both the extent of an agent's authority and the principles to govern the agent's conduct. Among the Act's features that enhance drafting flexibility are the statutory definitions of powers in Article 2 [72-31-336 through 72-31-352], which can be incorporated by reference in an individually drafted power of attorney or selected for inclusion on the optional statutory form provided in Article 3 [72-31-353 and 72-31-354]. The statutory definitions of enumerated powers are an updated version of those in the Uniform Statutory Form Power of Attorney Act (1988), which the Act supersedes. The national review found that eighteen jurisdictions had adopted some type of statutory form power of attorney. The decision to include a statutory form power of attorney in the Act was based on this trend and the proliferation of power of attorney forms currently available to the public.

Sections 119 and 120 [72-31-324 and 72-31-325] of the Act address the problem of persons refusing to accept an agent's authority. Section 119 [72-31-324] provides protection from liability for persons that in good faith accept an acknowledged power of attorney. Section 120 [72-31-325] sanctions refusal to accept an acknowledged power of attorney unless the refusal meets limited statutory exceptions. An alternate Section 120 [72-31-325] is provided for states that may wish to limit sanctions to refusal of an acknowledged statutory form power of attorney.

In exchange for mandated acceptance of an agent's authority, the Act does not require persons that deal with an agent to investigate the agent or the agent's actions. Instead, safeguards against abuse are provided through heightened requirements for granting authority that could dissipate the principal's property or alter the principal's estate plan (Section 201(a)) [72-31-336(1)], provisions that set out the agent's duties and liabilities (Sections 114 and 117) [72-31-319 and 72-31-322] and by specification of the categories of persons that have standing to request judicial review of the agent's conduct (Section 116) [72-31-321]. The following provides a brief overview of the entire Act.

Overview of the Uniform Power of Attorney Act

The Act consists of 4 articles. The basic substance of the Act is located in Articles 1 and 2 [72-31-301 through 72-31-328 and 72-31-336 through 72-31-352]. Article 3 [72-31-353 and 72-31-354] contains the optional statutory form and Article 4 [72-31-365 through 72-31-367] consists of miscellaneous provisions dealing with general application of the Act and repeal of certain prior acts.

Article 1 — General Provisions and Definitions — Section 102 [72-31-302] lists definitions which are useful in interpretation of the Act. Of particular note is the definition of "incapacity" which replaces the term "disability" used in the Original Act. The definition of "incapacity" is consistent with the standard for appointment of a conservator under Section 401 of the Uniform Guardianship and Protective Proceedings Act as amended in 1997. Another significant change in terminology from the Original Act is the use of "agent" in place of the term "attorney in fact." The term "agent" was also used in the Uniform Statutory Form Power of Attorney Act and is intended to clarify confusion in the lay public about the meaning of "attorney in fact." Section 103 [72-31-303] provides that the Act is to apply broadly to all powers of attorney, but excepts from the Act powers of attorney for health care and certain specialized powers such as those coupled with an interest or dealing with proxy voting.

Another innovation is the default rule in Section 104 [72-31-304] that a power of attorney is durable unless it contains express language indicating otherwise. This change from the Original Act reflects the view that most principals prefer their powers of attorney to be durable as a hedge against the need for guardianship. While the Original Act was silent on execution requirements for a power of attorney, Section 105 [72-31-305] requires the principal's signature and provides that an acknowledged signature is presumed genuine. Section 106 [72-31-306] recognizes military powers of attorney and powers of attorney properly executed in other states or countries, or which were properly executed in the state of enactment prior to the Act's effective date. Section 107 [72-31-307] states a choice of law rule for determining the law that governs the meaning and effect of a power of attorney.

Section 108 [72-31-308] addresses the relationship of the agent to a later court-appointed fiduciary. The Original Act conferred upon a conservator or other later-appointed fiduciary the same power to revoke or amend the power of attorney as the principal would have had prior to incapacity. In contrast, the Act reserves this power to the court and states that the agent's authority continues until limited, suspended, or terminated by the court. This approach reflects greater deference for the previously expressed preferences of the principal and is consistent with the state legislative trend that has departed from the Original Act.

The default rule for when a power of attorney becomes effective is stated in Section 109 [72-31-309]. Unless the principal specifies that it is to become effective upon a future date, event, or contingency, the authority of an agent under a power of attorney becomes effective when the power is executed. Section 109 [72-31-309] permits the principal to designate who may determine when contingent powers are triggered. If the trigger for contingent powers is the principal's incapacity, Section 109 [72-31-309] provides that the person designated to make that determination has the authority to act as the principal's personal representative under the Health Insurance Portability and Accountability Act (HIPAA) for purposes of accessing the principal's health-care information and communicating with the principal's health-care provider. This provision does not, however, confer on the designated person the authority to make health-care decisions for the principal. If the trigger for contingent powers is incapacity but the principal has not designated anyone to make the determination, or the person authorized is unable or unwilling to make the determination, the determination may be made by a physician or licensed psychologist, who must find that the principal's ability to manage property or business affairs is impaired, or by an attorney at law, judge, or appropriate governmental official, who must find that the principal is missing, detained, or unable to return to the United States.

The bases for termination of a power of attorney are covered in Section 110 [72-31-310]. In response to concerns expressed in the JEB survey, the Act provides as the default rule that authority granted to a principal's spouse is revoked upon the commencement of proceedings for legal separation, marital dissolution or annulment.

Sections 111 through 118 [72-31-316 through 72-31-323] address matters related to the agent, including default rules for coagents and successor agents (Section 111) [72-31-316], reimbursement and compensation (Section 112) [72-31-317], an agent's acceptance of appointment (Section 113) [72-31-318], and the agent's duties (Section 114) [72-31-319]. Section 115 [72-31-320] provides that a principal may lower the standard of liability for agent conduct subject to a minimum level of accountability for actions taken dishonestly, with an improper motive, or with reckless indifference to the purposes of the power of attorney or the best interest of the principal. Section 116 [72-31-321] sets out a comprehensive list of persons that may petition the court to review the agent's conduct and Section 117 [72-31-322] addresses agent liability. An agent may resign by following the notice procedures described in Section 118 [72-31-323].

Sections 119 and 120 [72-31-324 and 72-31-325] are included in the Act to address the frequently reported problem of persons refusing to accept a power of attorney. Section 119 [72-31-324] protects persons that in good faith accept an acknowledged power of attorney without actual knowledge that the power of attorney is revoked, terminated, or invalid or that the agent is exceeding or improperly exercising the agent's powers. Subject to statutory exceptions, alternative Sections 120 [72-31-325] impose liability for refusal to accept a power of attorney. Alternative A sanctions refusal of an acknowledged power of attorney and Alternative B sanctions only refusal of an acknowledged statutory form power of attorney.

Sections 121 through 123 [72-31-326 through 72-31-328] address the relationship of the Act to other law. Section 121 [72-31-326] clarifies that the Act is supplemented by the principles of common law and equity to the extent those principles are not displaced by a specific provision of the Act, and Section 122 [72-31-327] further clarifies that the Act is not intended to supersede any law applicable to financial institutions or other entities. With respect to remedies, Section 123 [72-31-328] provides that the remedies under the Act are not exclusive and do not abrogate any other cause of action or remedy that may be available under the law of the enacting jurisdiction.

Article 2 — Authority — The Act offers the drafting attorney enhanced flexibility whether drafting an individually tailored power of attorney or using the statutory form. Like the Uniform Statutory Form Power of Attorney Act, Sections 204 through 217 [72-31-339 through 72-31-352] of the Act set forth detailed descriptions of authority relating to subjects such as "real property," "retirement plans," and "taxes," which a principal, pursuant to Section 202 [72-31-337], may incorporate in full into the power of attorney either by a reference to the short descriptive term for the subject used in the Act or to the section number. Section 202 [72-31-337], further states that a principal may modify in a power of attorney any authority incorporated by reference. The definitions in Article 2 also provide meaning for authority with respect to subjects enumerated on the optional statutory form in Article 3. Section 203 [72-31-338], applies to all incorporated authority and grants of general authority, providing further detail on how the authority is to be construed.

Article 2 [72-31-336 through 72-31-352] also addresses concerns about authority that might be used to dissipate the principal's property or alter the principal's estate plan. Section 201(a) [72-31-336(1)] lists specific categories of authority that cannot be implied from a grant of general authority, but which may be granted only through express language in the power of attorney. Section 201(b) [72-31-336(2)] contains a default rule prohibiting an agent that is not an ancestor, spouse, or descendant of the principal from creating in the agent or in a person to whom the agent owes a legal obligation of support an interest in the principal's property, whether by gift, right of survivorship, beneficiary designation, disclaimer, or otherwise.

Article 3 — Statutory Forms — The optional form in Article 3 [72-31-353 and 72-31-354] is designed for use by lawyers as well as lay persons. It contains, in plain language, instructions to the principal and agent. Step-by-step prompts are given for designation of the agent and successor agents, and grant of general and specific authority. In the section of the form addressing general authority, the principal must initial the subjects over which the principal wishes to delegate general authority to the agent. In the section of the form addressing specific authority, the Section 201(a) [72-31-336(1)] categories of specific authority are listed, preceded by a warning to the principal about the potential consequences of granting such authority to an agent. The principal is instructed to initial only the specific categories of actions that the principal intends to authorize. Article 3 [72-31-353 and 72-31-354] also contains a sample agent certification form.

Article 4 — Miscellaneous Provisions — The miscellaneous provisions in Article 4 [72-31-365 through 72-31-367] clarify the relationship of the Act to other law and pre-existing powers of attorney. Enacting jurisdictions should repeal their existing power of attorney statutes, including, if applicable, the Uniform Durable Power of Attorney Act, The Uniform Statutory Form Power of Attorney Act, and Article 5, Part 5 of the Uniform Probate Code.

ARTICLE 1 [72-31-301 through 72-31-328]
GENERAL PROVISIONS

The Uniform Power of Attorney Act replaces the Uniform Durable Power of Attorney Act, the Uniform Statutory Form Power of Attorney Act, and Article 5, Part 5 of the Uniform Probate Code. The primary purpose of the Uniform Durable Power of Attorney Act was to provide individuals with an inexpensive, non-judicial method of surrogate property management in the event of later incapacity. Two key concepts were introduced by the Uniform Durable Power of Attorney Act: 1) creation of a durable agency-one that survives, or is triggered by, the principal's incapacity, and 2) validation of post-mortem exercise of powers by an agent who acts in good faith and without actual knowledge of the principal's death. The success of the Uniform Durable Power of Attorney Act is evidenced by the widespread use of durable powers in every jurisdiction, not only for incapacity planning, but also for convenience while the principal retains capacity. However, the limitations of the Uniform Durable Power of Attorney Act are evidenced by the number of states that have supplemented and revised their statutes to address myriad issues upon which the Uniform Durable Power of Attorney Act is silent. These issues include parameters for the creation and use of powers of attorney as well as guidelines for the principal, the agent, and the person who is asked to accept the agent's authority. The general provisions and definitions of Article 1 in the Uniform Power of Attorney Act address those issues.

In addition to providing greater detail than the Uniform Durable Power of Attorney Act, this Act changes two presumptions in the earlier act: 1) that a power of attorney is not durable unless it contains language to make it durable; and 2) that a later court-appointed fiduciary for the principal has the power to revoke or amend a previously executed power of attorney. Section 104 [72-31-304] of this Article reverses the non-durability presumption by stating that a power of attorney is durable unless it expressly provides that it is terminated by the incapacity of the principal. Section 108 [72-31-308] gives deference to the principal's choice of agent by providing that if a court appoints a fiduciary to manage some or all of the principal's property, the agent's authority continues unless limited, suspended, or terminated by the court.

Although the Act is primarily a default statute, Article 1 also contains rules that govern all powers of attorney subject to the Act. Examples of these rules include imposition of certain minimum fiduciary duties on an agent who has accepted appointment (Section 114(a)) [72-31-319(1)], recognition of persons who have standing to request judicial construction of the power of attorney or review of the agent's conduct (Section 116) [72-31-321], and protections for persons who accept an acknowledged power of attorney without actual knowledge that the power of attorney or the agent's authority is void, invalid, or terminated, or that the agent is exceeding or improperly exercising the power (Section 119) [72-31-324]. In contrast with the rules of general application in Article 1, the default provisions are clearly indicated by signals such as "unless the power of attorney otherwise provides,"or "except as otherwise provided in the power of attorney." These signals alert the draftsperson to options for enlarging or limiting the Act's default terms. For example, default provisions in Article 1 state that, unless the power of attorney otherwise provides, the power of attorney is effective immediately (Section 109) [72-31-309], coagents may exercise their authority independently (Section 111) [72-31-316], and an agent is entitled to reimbursement of expenses reasonably incurred and to reasonable compensation (Section 112) [72-31-317].

AUTHORITY

Article 2 is based in part on the predecessor Uniform Statutory Form Power of Attorney Act, approved in 1988. It provides the default statutory construction for authority granted in a power of attorney. Sections 204 through 217 [72-31-339 through 72-31-352] describe authority with respect to various subject matters. These descriptions may be incorporated by reference in the optional statutory form (Section 301) [72-31-353] or in an individually drafted power of attorney. Incorporation is accomplished either by referring to the descriptive term for the subject or by providing a citation to the section in which the authority is described (Section 202) [72-31-337]. A principal may also modify any authority incorporated by reference (Section 202(c)) [72-31-337(3)]. Section 203 [72-31-338] supplements Sections 204 through 217 [72-31-339 through 72-31-352] by providing general terms of construction that apply to all grants of authority under those sections unless otherwise indicated in the power of attorney.

Most of the language in Sections 204 through 216 of Article 2 [72-31-339 through 72-31-351] comes directly from the Uniform Statutory Form Power of Attorney Act. The language has been revised where necessary to reflect modern custom and practice. Where significant changes have been made, they are noted in a comment to the relevant section. In general, there are two important differences between the statutory treatment of authority in this Act and in the Uniform Statutory Form Power of Attorney Act. First, this Act includes a section that provides a default rule for the parameters of gift making authority (Section 217) [72-31-352]. Second, this Act identifies specific acts that may be authorized only by an express grant in the power of attorney (Section 201(a))[72-31-336(1)]. Express authorization for the acts listed in Section 201(a) [72-31-336(1)] is required because of the risk those acts pose to the principal's property and estate plan. The purpose of Section 201(a) [72-31-336(1)] is to make clear that authority for these acts may not be inferred from a grant of general authority.

ARTICLE 3 [72-31-353 and 72-31-354]
STATUTORY FORMS

Article 3 [72-31-353 and 72-31-354] provides a concise, optional statutory form for creating a power of attorney under this Act (Section 301) [72-31-353]. With the proliferation of power of attorney forms in the public domain, the advantage of a statutorily-sanctioned form is the promotion of uniformity in power of attorney practice. In states such as Illinois and New York, where state-sanctioned statutory forms have existed for many years, the statutory form is widely used by both lawyers and lay persons. The familiarity and common understanding achieved with the use of one statutory form also facilitates acceptance of powers of attorney. In the twenty years preceding this Act, the number of states with statutory forms has increased from only a few to eighteen.

In addition to the statutory form power of attorney, Article 3 provides an optional form for agent certification of facts pertaining to a power of attorney (Section 302) [72-31-354]. Pursuant to Section 119 [72-31-324], a person may request an agent to certify any factual matter concerning the principal, agent, or power of attorney. The form in Section 302 [72-31-354] is intended to facilitate agent compliance with these requests. The form lists factual matters about which persons commonly request certification (e.g., the principal is alive and has not revoked the power of attorney or the agent's authority), and provides a designated space for certification of additional factual statements. Both the statutory form power of attorney and the agent certification form may be tailored to accommodate individual circumstances and objectives.

72-31-301. Short title.

Official Comments

This Act, which replaces the Uniform Durable Power of Attorney Act, does not contain the word "durable" in the title. Pursuant to Section 104 [72-31-304], a power of attorney created under the Act is durable unless the power of attorney provides that it is terminated by the incapacity of the principal.

72-31-302. Definitions.

Although most of the definitions in Section 102 [72-31-302] are self-explanatory, a few of the terms warrant further comment.

"Agent" replaces the term "attorney in fact" used in the Uniform Durable Power of Attorney Act to avoid confusion in the lay public about the meaning of the term and the difference between an attorney in fact and an attorney at law. Agent was also used in the Uniform Statutory Form Power of Attorney Act which this Act supersedes.

"Incapacity" replaces the term "disability" used in the Uniform Durable Power of Attorney Act in recognition that disability does not necessarily render an individual incapable of property and business management. The definition of incapacity stresses the operative consequences of the individual's impairment-inability to manage property and business affairs-rather than the impairment itself. The definition of incapacity in the Act is also consistent with the standard for appointment of a conservator under Section 401 of the Uniform Guardianship and Protective Proceedings Act as amended in 1997.

The definition of "power of attorney" clarifies that the term applies to any grant of authority in a writing or other record from a principal to an agent which appears from the grant to be a power of attorney, without regard to whether the words "power of attorney" are actually used in the grant.

"Presently exercisable general power of appointment" is defined to clarify that where the phrase appears in the Act it does not include a power exercisable by the principal in a fiduciary capacity or exercisable only by will. Cf. Restatement (Third) of Property (Wills and Don. Trans.) §19.8 cmt. d (Tentative Draft No. 5, approved 2006) (noting that unless the donor of a presently exercisable power of attorney has manifested a contrary intent, it is assumed that the donor intends that the donee's agent be permitted to exercise the power for the benefit of the donee). Including in a power of attorney the authority to exercise a presently exercisable general power of appointment held by the principal is consistent with the objective of giving an agent comprehensive management authority over the principal's property and financial affairs. The term appears in Section 211 [72-31-346] (Estates, Trusts, and Other Beneficial Interests) in the context of authority to exercise for the benefit of the principal a presently exercisable general power of appointment held by the principal (see Section 211(b)(3)) [72-31-346(2)(c)], and in Section 217 [72-31-352] (Gifts) in the context of authority to exercise for the benefit of someone else a presently exercisable general power of appointment held by the principal (see Section 217(b)(1)) [72-31-352(2)(a)]. The term is also incorporated by reference when using the statutory form in Section 301 [72-31-353] to grant authority with respect to "Estates, Trusts, and Other Beneficial Interests" or authority with respect to "Gifts." If a principal wishes to delegate authority to exercise a power that the principal holds in a fiduciary capacity, Section 201(a)(7) [72-31-336 (1)(g)] requires that the power of attorney contain an express grant of such authority. Furthermore, delegation of a power held in a fiduciary capacity is possible only if the principal has authority to delegate the power, and the agent's authority is necessarily limited by whatever terms govern the principal's ability to exercise the power.

72-31-303. Applicability.

Official Comments

The Uniform Power of Attorney Act is intended to be comprehensive with respect to delegation of surrogate decision making authority over an individual's property and property interests, whether for the purpose of incapacity planning or mere convenience. Given that an agent will likely exercise authority at times when the principal cannot monitor the agent's conduct, the Act specifies minimum agent duties and protections for the principal's benefit. These provisions, however, may not be appropriate for all delegations of authority that might otherwise be included within the definition of a power of attorney. Section 103 [72-31-303] lists delegations of authority that are excluded from the Act because the subject matter of the delegation, the objective of the delegation, the agent's role with respect to the delegation, or a combination of the foregoing, would make application of the Act's provisions inappropriate.

Paragraph (1) [72-31-303(1)] excludes a power to the extent that it is coupled with an interest in the subject of the power. This exclusion addresses situations where, due to the agent's interest in the subject matter of the power, the agent is not intended to act as the principal's fiduciary. See Restatement (Third) of Agency §3.12 (2006) and M.T. Brunner, Annotation, What Constitutes Power Coupled with Interest within Rule as to Termination of Agency, 28 A.L.R.2d 1243 (1953). Common examples of powers coupled with an interest include powers granted to a creditor to perfect or protect title in, or to sell, pledged collateral. While the example of "a power given to or for the benefit of a creditor in connection with a credit transaction" is highlighted in paragraph (1) [72-31-303(1)], it is not meant to exclude application of paragraph (1) [72-31-303(1)] to other contexts in which a power may be coupled with an interest, such as a power held by an insurer to settle or confess judgment on behalf of an insured. See, e.g., Hayes v. Gessner, 52 N.E.2d 968 (Mass. 1944).

Paragraph (2) [72-31-303(2)] excludes from the Act delegations of authority to make health-care decisions for the principal. Such delegations are covered under other law of the jurisdiction. The Act recognizes, however, that matters of financial management and health-care decision making are often interdependent. The Act consequently provides in Section 114(b)(5) [72-31-319(2)(e)] a default rule that an agent under the Act must cooperate with the principal's health-care decision maker.

Likewise, paragraph (3) [72-31-303(3)] excludes from the Act a proxy or other delegation to exercise voting rights or management rights with respect to an entity. The rules with respect to those rights are typically controlled by entity-specific statutes within a jurisdiction. See, e.g., Model Bus. Corp. Act §7.22 (2002); Unif. Ltd. Partnership Act §118 (2001); and Unif. Ltd. Liability Co. Act §404(e) (1996). Notwithstanding the exclusion of such delegations from the operation of this Act, Section 209 [72-31-344] contemplates that a power granted to an agent with respect to operation of an entity or business includes the authority to "exercise in person or by proxy... a right, power, privilege, or option the principal has or claims to have as the holder of stocks and bonds...." (see paragraph (5) of Section 209) [72-31-344(5)]. Thus, while a person that holds only a proxy pursuant to an entity voting statute will not be subject to the provisions of this Act, an agent that is granted Section 209 [72-31-344] authority is subject to the Act because the principal has given the agent authority that is greater than that of a mere voting proxy. In fact, typical entity statutes contemplate that a principal's agent or "attorney in fact" may appoint a proxy on behalf of the principal. See, e.g., Model Bus. Corp. Act §7.22 (2002); Unif. Ltd. Partnership Act §118 (2001); and Unif. Ltd. Liability Co. Act §404(e) (1996).

Paragraph (4) [72-31-303(4)] excludes from the Act any power created on a governmental form for a governmental purpose. Like the excluded powers in paragraphs (2) and (3) [72-31-303(2) and (3)], the authority for a power created on a governmental form emanates from other law and is generally for a limited purpose. Notwithstanding this exclusion, the Act specifically provides in paragraph (7) of Section 203 [72-31-338(7)] that a grant of authority to an agent includes, with respect to that subject matter, authority to "prepare, execute, and file a record, report, or other document to safeguard or promote the principal's interest under a statute or governmental regulation." Section 203, paragraph (8) [72-31-338(8)], further clarifies that the agent has the authority to "communicate with any representative or employee of a government or governmental subdivision, agency, or instrumentality, on behalf of the principal." The intent of these provisions is to minimize the need for a special power on a governmental form with respect to any subject matter over which an agent is granted authority under the Act.

72-31-304. Power of attorney is durable.

Official Comments

Section 104 [72-31-304] establishes that a power of attorney created under the Act is durable unless it expressly states otherwise. This default rule is the reverse of the approach under the Uniform Durable Power of Attorney Act and based on the assumption that most principals prefer durability as a hedge against the need for guardianship. See also Section 107 [72-31-307] Comment (noting that the default rules of the jurisdiction's law under which a power of attorney is created, including the default rule for durability, govern the meaning and effect of a power of attorney).

2011 Amendment: Chapter 109 substituted current text for "A power of attorney legally sufficient under this part is durable to the extent that durable powers are permitted by other law of this state and the power of attorney contains language, such as "This power of attorney will continue to be effective if I become disabled, incapacitated, or incompetent." showing the intent of the principal that the power granted may be exercised notwithstanding later disability, incapacity, or incompetency." 72-31-305. Execution of power of attorney.

Official Comments

While notarization of the principal's signature is not required to create a valid power of attorney, this section strongly encourages the practice by according acknowledged signatures a statutory presumption of genuineness. Furthermore, because Section 119 [72-31-324] (Acceptance of and Reliance Upon Acknowledged Power of Attorney) and Section 120 [72-31-325] (Liability for Refusal to Accept Acknowledged Power of Attorney, and Alternative B-Liability for Refusal to Accept Acknowledged Statutory Form Power of Attorney) do not apply to unacknowledged powers, persons who are presented with an unacknowledged power of attorney may be reluctant to accept it. As a practical matter, an acknowledged signature is required if the power of attorney will be recorded by the agent in conjunction with the execution of real estate documents on behalf of the principal. See R.P.D., Annotation, Recording Laws as Applied to Power of Attorney under which Deed or Mortgage is Executed, 114 A.L.R. 660 (1938).

This section, at a minimum, requires that the power of attorney be signed by the principal or by another individual who the principal has directed to sign the principal's name. If another individual is directed to sign the principal's name, the signing must occur in the principal's "conscious presence." The 1990 amendments to the Uniform Probate Code codified the "conscious presence" test for the execution of wills (Section 2-502(a)(2)), which generally requires that the signing is sufficient if it takes place within the range of the senses-usually sight or hearing-of the individual who directed that another sign the individual's name. See Unif. Probate Code §2-502 cmt. (2003). For a discussion of acknowledgment of a signature by an individual whose name is

72-31-306. Validity of power of attorney.

Official Comments

One of the purposes of the Uniform Power of Attorney Act is promotion of the portability and use of powers of attorney. Section 106 [72-31-306] makes clear that the Act does not affect the validity of pre-existing powers of attorney executed under prior law in the enacting jurisdiction, powers of attorney validly created under the law of another jurisdiction, and military powers of attorney. While the effect of this section is to recognize the validity of powers of attorney created under other law, it does not abrogate the traditional grounds for contesting the validity of execution such as forgery, fraud, or undue influence.

This section also provides that unless another law in the jurisdiction requires presentation of the original power of attorney, a photocopy or electronically transmitted copy has the same effect as the original. An example of another law that might require presentation of the original power of attorney is the jurisdiction's recording act. See, e.g., Restatement (Third) of Property (Wills & Don. Trans.) §6.3 cmt. e (2003) (noting that in order to record a deed, "some states require that the document of transfer be signed, sealed, attested, and acknowledged").

72-31-307. Meaning and effect of power of attorney.

Official Comments

This section recognizes that a foreign power of attorney, or one executed before the effective date of the Uniform Power of Attorney Act, may have been created under different default rules than those in this Act. Section 107 [72-31-307] provides that the meaning and effect of a power of attorney is to be determined by the law under which it was created. For example, the law in another jurisdiction may provide for different default rules with respect to durability of a power of attorney (see Section 104) [72-31-304], the authority of coagents (see Section 111) [72-31-316] or the scope of specific authority such as the authority to make gifts (see Section 217) [72-31-352]. Section 107 [72-31-307] clarifies that the principal's intended grant of authority will be neither enlarged nor narrowed by virtue of the agent using the power in a different jurisdiction. For a discussion of the issues that can arise with inter-jurisdictional use of powers of attorney, see Linda S. Whitton, Crossing State Lines with Durable Powers, Prob. & Prop., Sept./Oct. 2003, at 28.

This section also establishes an objective means for determining what jurisdiction's law the principal intended to govern the meaning and effect of a power of attorney. The phrase, "the law of the jurisdiction indicated in the power of attorney," is intentionally broad, and includes any statement or reference in a power of attorney that indicates the principal's choice of law. Examples of an indication of jurisdiction include a reference to the name of the jurisdiction in the title or body of the power of attorney, citation to the jurisdiction's power of attorney statute, or an explicit statement that the power of attorney is created or executed under the laws of a particular jurisdiction. In the absence of an indication of jurisdiction in the power of attorney, Section 107 [72-31-307] provides that the law of the jurisdiction in which the power of attorney was executed controls. The distinction between "the law of the jurisdiction indicated in the power of attorney" and "the law of the jurisdiction in which the power of attorney was executed" is an important one. The common practice of property ownership in more than one jurisdiction increases the likelihood that a principal may execute in one jurisdiction a power of attorney that was created and intended to be interpreted under the laws of another jurisdiction. A clear indication of the jurisdiction's law that is intended to govern the meaning and effect of a power of attorney is therefore advisable in all powers of attorney. See, e.g., Section 301 [72-31-353] (providing for the name of the jurisdiction to appear in the title of the statutory form power of attorney).

72-31-308. Nomination of conservator or guardian — relation of agent to court-appointed fiduciary.

Official Comments

Section 108(b) [72-31-308(2)] is a departure from the Uniform Durable Power of Attorney Act which gave a court-appointed fiduciary the same power to revoke or amend a power of attorney as the principal would have if not incapacitated. See Unif. Durable Power of Atty. Act §3(a) (1987). In contrast, this Act gives deference to the principal's choice of agent by providing that the agent's authority continues, notwithstanding the later court appointment of a fiduciary, unless the court acts to limit or terminate the agent's authority. This approach assumes that the later-appointed fiduciary's authority should supplement, not truncate, the agent's authority. If, however, a fiduciary appointment is required because of the agent's inadequate performance or breach of fiduciary duties, the court, having considered this evidence during the appointment proceedings, may limit or terminate the agent's authority contemporaneously with appointment of the fiduciary. Section 108(b) [72-31-308(2)] is consistent with the state legislative trend that has departed from the Uniform Durable Power of Attorney Act. See, e.g., 755 Ill. Comp. Stat. Ann. 45/2-10 (West 1992); Ind. Code Ann. §30-5-3-4 (West 1994); Kan. Stat. Ann. §58-662 (2005); Mo. Ann. Stat. §404.727 (West 2001); N.J. Stat. Ann. §46:2B-8.4 (West 2003); N.M. Stat. Ann. §45-5-503A (LexisNexis 2004); Utah Code Ann. §75-5-501 (Supp. 2006); Vt. Stat. Ann. tit. 14, §3509(a) (2002); Va. Code Ann. §11-9.1B (2006). Section 108(b) [72-31-308(2)] is also consistent with the Uniform Health-Care Decisions Act §6(a) (1993), which provides that a guardian may not revoke the ward's advance health-care directive unless the court appointing the guardian expressly so authorizes. Furthermore, it is consistent with the Uniform Guardianship and Protective Proceedings Act (1997), which provides that a guardian or conservator may not revoke the ward's or protected person's power of attorney for health-care or financial management without first obtaining express authority of the court. See Unif. Guardianship & Protective Proc. Act §316(c) (guardianship), §411(d) (protective proceedings).

Deference for the principal's autonomous choice is evident both in the presumption that an agent's authority continues unless limited or terminated by the court, and in the directive that the court shall appoint a fiduciary in accordance with the principal's most recent nomination (see subsection (a)) [72-31-308(1)]. Typically, a principal will nominate as conservator or guardian the same individual named as agent under the power of attorney. Favoring the principal's choice of agent and nominee, an approach consistent with most statutory hierarchies for guardian selection (see Unif. Guardianship & Protective Proc. Act §310(a)(2) (1997)), also discourages guardianship petitions filed for the sole purpose of thwarting the agent's authority to gain control over a vulnerable principal. See Unif. Guardianship & Protective Proc. Act §310 cmt. (1997). See also Linda S. Ershow-Levenberg, When Guardianship Actions Violate the Constitutionally-Protected Right of Privacy, NAELA News, Apr. 2005, at 1 (arguing that appointment of a guardian when there is a valid power of attorney in place violates the alleged incapacitated person's constitutionally protected rights of privacy and association).

72-31-309. When power of attorney effective.

Official Comments

This section establishes a default rule that a power of attorney is effective when executed. If the principal chooses to create what is commonly known as a "springing" or contingent power of attorney-one that becomes effective at a future date or upon a future event or contingency-the principal may authorize the agent or someone else to provide written verification that the event or contingency has occurred (subsection (b)) [72-31-309(2)]. Because the person authorized to verify the principal's incapacitation will likely need access to the principal's health information, subsection (d) [72-31-309(4)] qualifies that person to act as the principal's "personal representative" for purposes of the Health Insurance Portability and Accountability Act (HIPAA). See 45 C.F.R. §164.502(g)(1)-(2) (2006) (providing that for purposes of disclosing an individual's protected health information, "a covered entity must... treat a personal representative as the individual"). Section 109 [72-31-309] does not, however, empower the agent to make health-care decisions for the principal. See Section 103 [72-31-303] and comment (discussing exclusion from this Act of powers to make health-care decisions).

The default rule reflects a "best practices" philosophy that any agent who can be trusted to act for the principal under a springing power of attorney should be trustworthy enough to hold an immediate power. Survey evidence suggests, however, that a significant number of principals still prefer springing powers, most likely to maintain privacy in the hope that they will never need a surrogate decision maker. See Linda S. Whitton, National Durable Power of Attorney Survey Results and Analysis, National Conference of Commissioners on Uniform State Laws, 6-7 (2002), http://www.law.upenn.edu/bll/ulc/dpoaa/surveyoct2002.htm (reporting that 23% of lawyer respondents found their clients preferred springing powers, 61% reported a preference for immediate powers, and 16% saw no trend; however, 89% stated that a power of attorney statute should authorize springing powers).

If the principal's incapacity is the trigger for a springing power of attorney and the principal has not authorized anyone to make that determination, or the authorized person is unable or unwilling to make the determination, this section provides a default mechanism to trigger the power. Incapacity based on the principal's impairment may be verified by a physician or licensed psychologist (subsection (c)(1)) [72-31-309(3)(a)], and incapacity based on the principal's unavailability (i.e., the principal is missing, detained, or unable to return to the United States) may be verified by an attorney at law, judge, or an appropriate governmental official (subsection (c)(2)) [72-31-309(3)(b)]. Examples of appropriate governmental officials who may be in a position to determine that the principal is incapacitated within the meaning of Section 102(5)(B) [72-31-302(5)(b)] include an officer acting under authority of the United States Department of State or uniformed services of the United States or a sworn federal or state law enforcement officer. The default mechanism for triggering a power of attorney is available only when no incapacity determination has been made. It is not available to challenge the determination made by the principal's authorized designee.

72-31-310. Termination of power of attorney or agent's authority.

Official Comments

This section addresses termination of a power of attorney or an agent's authority under a power of attorney. It first lists termination events (see subsections (a) and (b)) [72-31-310(1) and (2)], and then lists circumstances that, in contrast, either do not invalidate the power of attorney (see subsections (c) and (f)) [72-31-310(3) and (6)] or the actions taken pursuant to the power of attorney (see subsections (d) and (e)) [72-31-310(4) and (5)].

Subsection (c) [72-31-310(3)] provides that a power of attorney under the Act does not become "stale." Unless a power of attorney provides for termination upon a certain date or after the passage of a period of time, lapse of time since execution is irrelevant to validity, a concept carried over from the Uniform Durable Power of Attorney Act. See Unif. Durable Power of Atty. Act §1 (as amended in 1987). Similarly, subsection (f) [72-31-310(6)] clarifies that a subsequently executed power of attorney will not revoke a prior power of attorney by virtue of inconsistency alone. To effect a revocation, a subsequently executed power of attorney must expressly revoke a previously executed power of attorney or state that all other powers of attorney are revoked. The requirement of express revocation prevents inadvertent revocation when the principal intends for one agent to have limited authority that overlaps with broader authority held by another agent. For example, the principal who has given one agent a very broad power of attorney, including general authority with respect to real property, may later wish to give another agent limited authority to execute closing documents with respect to out-of-town real estate.

Subsections (d) and (e) [72-31-310(4) and (5)] emphasize that even a termination event is not effective as to the agent or person who, without actual knowledge of the termination event, acts in good faith under the power of attorney. For example, the principal's death terminates a power of attorney (see subsection (a)(1)) [72-31-310(1)(a)], but an agent who acts in good faith under a power of attorney without actual knowledge of the principal's death will bind the principal's successors in interest with that action (see subsection (d)) [72-31-310(4)]. The same result is true if the agent knows of the principal's death, but the person who accepts the agent's apparent authority has no actual knowledge of the principal's death. See Restatement (Third) of Agency §3.11 (2006) (stating that "termination of actual authority does not by itself end any apparent authority held by an agent"). See also Section 119 (c) [72-31-324(3)] (stating that "[a] person that in good faith accepts an acknowledged power of attorney without actual knowledge that the power of attorney is... terminated... may rely upon the power of attorney as if the power of attorney were... still in effect...."). These concepts are also carried forward from the Uniform Durable Power of Attorney Act. See Unif. Durable Power Atty. Act §4 (1987).

Of special note in the list of termination events is subsection (b)(3) [72-31-310(2)(c)] which provides that a spouse-agent's authority is revoked when an action is filed for the dissolution or annulment of the agent's marriage to the principal, or their legal separation. Although the filing of an action for dissolution or annulment might render a principal particularly vulnerable to self-interested actions by a spouse-agent, subsection (b)(3) [72-31-310(2)(c)] is not mandatory and may be overridden in the power of attorney. There may be special circumstances precipitating the dissolution, such as catastrophic illness and the need for public benefits, that would prompt the principal to specify that the agent's authority continues notwithstanding dissolution, annulment or legal separation.

72-31-316. Coagents or successor agents.

Official Comments

This section provides several default rules that merit careful consideration by the principal. Subsection (a) [72-31-316(1)] states that if a principal names coagents, each coagent may exercise its authority independently unless otherwise directed in the power of attorney. The Act adopts this default position to discourage the practice of executing separate, co-extensive powers of attorney in favor of different agents, and to facilitate transactions with persons who are reluctant to accept a power of attorney from only one of two or more named agents. This default rule should not, however, be interpreted as encouraging the practice of naming coagents. For a principal who can still monitor the activities of an agent, naming coagents multiplies monitoring responsibilities and significantly increases the risk that inconsistent actions will be taken with the principal's property. For the incapacitated principal, the risk is even greater that coagents will use the power of attorney to vie for control of the principal and the principal's property. Although the principal can override the default rule by requiring coagents to act by majority or unanimous consensus, such a requirement impedes use of the power of attorney, especially among agents who do not share close physical or philosophical proximity. A more prudent practice is generally to name one original agent and one or more successor agents. If desirable, a principal may give the original agent authority to delegate the agent's authority during periods when the agent is temporarily unavailable to serve (see Section 201(a)(5)) [72-31-336(1)(e)].

Subsection (b) [72-31-316(2)] states that unless a power of attorney otherwise provides, a successor agent has the same authority as that granted to the original agent. While this default provision ensures that the scope of authority granted to the original agent can be carried forward by successors, a principal may want to consider whether a successor agent is an appropriate person to exercise all of the authority given to the original agent. For example, authority to make gifts, to create, amend, or revoke an inter vivos trust, or to create or change survivorship and beneficiary designations (see Section 201(a)) [72-31-336(1)] may be appropriate for a spouse-agent, but not for an adult child who is named as the successor agent.

Subsection (c) [72-31-316(3)] provides a default rule that an agent is not liable for the actions of another agent unless the agent participates in or conceals the breach of fiduciary duty committed by that other agent. Consequently, absent specification to the contrary in the power of attorney, an agent has no duty to monitor another agent's conduct. However, subsection (d) [72-31-316(4)] does require that an agent that has actual knowledge of a breach or imminent breach of fiduciary duty must notify the principal, and if the principal is incapacitated, take reasonably appropriate action to safeguard the principal's best interest. Subsection (d) [72-31-316(4)] provides that if an agent fails to notify the principal or to take action to safeguard the principal's best interest, that agent is only liable for the reasonably foreseeable damages that could have been avoided had the agent provided the required notification.

72-31-317. Reimbursement and compensation of agent.

Official Comments

This section provides a default rule that an agent is entitled to reimbursement of expenses reasonably incurred on behalf of the principal and to reasonable compensation. While it is unlikely that a principal would choose to alter the default rule as to expenses, a principal's circumstances may warrant including limitations in the power of attorney as to the categories of expenses the agent may incur; likewise, the principal may choose to specify the terms of compensation rather than leave that determination to a reasonableness standard. Although many family-member agents serve without compensation, payment of compensation to the agent may be advantageous to the principal in circumstances where the principal needs to spend down income or resources to meet qualifications for public benefits.

72-31-318. Agent's acceptance.

Official Comments

This section establishes a default rule for agent acceptance of appointment under a power of attorney. Unless a different method is provided in the power of attorney, an agent's acceptance occurs upon exercise of authority, performance of duties, or any other assertion or conduct indicating acceptance. Acceptance is the critical reference point for commencement of the agency relationship and the imposition of fiduciary duties (see Section 114(a)) [72-31-319(1)]. Because a person may be unaware that the principal has designated the person as an agent in a power of attorney, clear demarcation of when an agency relationship commences is necessary to protect both the principal and the agent. See Karen E. Boxx, The Durable Power of Attorney's Place in the Family of Fiduciary Relationships, 36 Ga. L. Rev. 1, 41 (2001) (noting that "fiduciary duties should be imposed only to the extent the attorney-in-fact knows of the role, is able to accept responsibility, and affirmatively accepts"). The Act also provides a default method for agent resignation (see Section 118) [72-31-323], which terminates the agency relationship (see Section 110(b)(2)) [72-31-310(2)(b)].

72-31-319. Agent's duties.

Official Comments

Although well settled that an agent under a power of attorney is a fiduciary, there is little clarity in state power of attorney statutes about what that means. See generally Karen E. Boxx, The Durable Power of Attorney's Place in the Family of Fiduciary Relationships, 36 Ga. L. Rev. 1 (2001); Carolyn L. Dessin, Acting as Agent under a Financial Durable Power of Attorney: An Unscripted Role, 75 Neb. L. Rev. 574 (1996). Among states that address agent duties, the standard of care varies widely and ranges from a due care standard (see, e.g., 755 Ill. Comp. Stat. Ann. 45/2-7 (West 1992); Ind. Code Ann. §30-5-6-2 (West 1994)) to a trustee-type standard (see, e.g., Fla. Stat. Ann. §709.08(8) (West 2000 & Supp. 2006); Mo. Ann. Stat. §404.714 (West 2001)). Section 114 [72-31-319] clarifies agent duties by articulating minimum mandatory duties (subsection (a)) [72-31-319(1)] as well as default duties that can be modified or omitted by the principal (subsection (b)) [72-31-319(2)].

The mandatory duties-acting in accordance with the principal's reasonable expectations, if known, and otherwise in the principal's best interest; acting in good faith; and acting only within the scope of authority granted-may not be altered in the power of attorney. Establishing the principal's reasonable expectations as the primary guideline for agent conduct is consistent with a policy preference for "substituted judgment" over "best interest" as the surrogate decision-making standard that better protects an incapacitated person's self-determination interests. See Wingspan-The Second National Guardianship Conference, Recommendations, 31 Stetson L. Rev. 595, 603 (2002). See also Unif. Guardianship & Protective Proc. Act §314(a) (1997).

The Act does not require, nor does common practice dictate, that the principal state expectations or objectives in the power of attorney. In fact, one of the advantages of a power of attorney over a trust or guardianship is the flexibility and informality with which an agent may exercise authority and respond to changing circumstances. However, when a principal's subjective expectations are potentially inconsistent with an objective best interest standard, good practice suggests memorializing those expectations in a written and admissible form as a precaution against later challenges to the agent's conduct (see Section 116) [72-31-321].

If a principal's expectations potentially conflict with a default duty under the Act, then stating the expectations in the power of attorney, or altering the default rule to accommodate the expectations, or both, is advisable. For example, a principal may want to invest in a business owned by a family member who is also the agent in order to improve the economic position of the agent and the agent's family. Without the principal's clear expression of this objective, investment by the agent of the principal's property in the agent's business may be viewed as breaching the default duty to act loyally for the principal's benefit (subsection (b)(1)) [72-31-319(2)(a)] or the default duty to avoid conflicts of interest that impair the agent's ability to act impartially for the principal's best interest (subsection (b)(2)) [72-31-319(2)(b)].

Two default duties in this section protect the principal's previously-expressed choices. These are the duty to cooperate with the person authorized to make health-care decisions for the principal (subsection (b)(5)) [72-31-319(2)(e)] and the duty to preserve the principal's estate plan (subsection (b)(6)) [72-31-319(2)(f)]. However, an agent has a duty to preserve the principal's estate plan only to the extent the plan is actually known to the agent and only if preservation of the estate plan is consistent with the principal's best interest. Factors relevant to determining whether preservation of the estate plan is in the principal's best interest include the value of the principal's property, the principal's need for maintenance, minimization of taxes, and eligibility for public benefits. The Act protects an agent from liability for failure to preserve the estate plan if the agent has acted in good faith (subsection (c)) [72-31-319(3)].

Subsection (d) [72-31-319(4)] provides that an agent acting with care, competence, and diligence for the best interest of the principal is not liable solely because the agent also benefits from the act or has a conflict of interest. This position is a departure from the traditional common law duty of loyalty which required an agent to act solely for the benefit of the principal. See Restatement (Second) of Agency §387 (1958); see also Unif. Trust Code §802(a) (2003) (requiring a trustee to administer a trust "solely in the interests" of the beneficiary). Subsection (d) [72-31-319(4)] is modeled after state statutes which provide that loyalty to the principal can be compatible with an incidental benefit to the agent. See Cal. Prob. Code §4232(b) (West Supp. 2006); 755 Ill. Comp. Stat. Ann. 45/2-7 (West 1992); Ind. Code Ann. §30-5-9-2 (West 1994 & Supp. 2005). The Restatement (Third) of Agency §8.01 (2006) also contemplates that loyal service to the principal may be concurrently beneficial to the agent (see Reporter's note a). See also John H. Langbein, Questioning the Trust Law Duty of Loyalty: Sole Interest or Best Interest?, 114 Yale L.J. 929, 943 (2005) (arguing that the sole interest test for loyalty should be replaced by the best interest test). The public policy which favors best interest over sole interest as the benchmark for agent loyalty comports with the practical reality that most agents under powers of attorney are family members who have inherent conflicts of interest with the principal arising from joint property ownership or inheritance expectations.

Subsection (e) [72-31-319(5)] provides additional protection for a principal who has selected an agent with special skills or expertise by requiring that such skills or expertise be considered when evaluating the agent's conduct. If a principal chooses to appoint a family member or close friend to serve as an agent, but does not intend that agent to serve under a higher standard because of special skills or expertise, the principal should consider including an exoneration provision within the power of attorney (see comment to Section 115 [72-31-320].

Subsections (f) and (g) [72-31-319(6) and (7)] state protections for an agent that are similar in scope to those applicable to a trustee. Subsection (f) [72-31-319(6)] holds an agent harmless for decline in the value of the principal's property absent a breach of fiduciary duty (cf. Unif. Trust Code §1003(b) (2003)). Subsection (g) [72-31-319(7)] holds an agent harmless for the conduct of a person to whom the agent has delegated authority, or who has been engaged by the agent on the principal's behalf, provided the agent has exercised care, competence, and diligence in selecting and monitoring the person (cf. Unif. Trust Code §807(c) (2003).

Subsection (h) [72-31-319(8)] codifies the agent's common law duty to account to a principal (see Restatement (Third) of Agency §8.12 (2006); Restatement (First) of Agency §382 (1933)). Rather than create an affirmative duty of periodic accounting, subsection (h) [72-31-319(8)] states that the agent is not required to disclose receipts, disbursements or transactions unless ordered by a court or requested by the principal, a fiduciary acting for the principal, or a governmental agency with authority to protect the welfare of the principal. If the principal is deceased, the principal's personal representative or successor in interest may request an agent to account. While there is no affirmative duty to account unless ordered by the court or requested by one of the foregoing persons, subsection (b)(4) [72-31-319(2)(d)] does create a default duty to keep records.

The narrow categories of persons that may request an agent to account are consistent with the premise that a principal with capacity should control to whom the details of financial transactions are disclosed. If a principal becomes incapacitated or dies, then the principal's fiduciary or personal representative may succeed to that monitoring function. The inclusion of a governmental agency (such as Adult Protective Services) in the list of persons that may request an agent to account is patterned after state legislative trends and is a response to growing national concern about financial abuse of vulnerable persons. See 755 Ill. Comp. Stat. Ann. 45/2-7.5 (West Supp. 2006 & 2006 Ill. Legis. Serv. 1754); 20 Pa. Cons. Stat. Ann. §5604(d) (West 2005); Vt. Stat. Ann. tit.14, §3510(b) (2002 & 2006-3 Vt. Adv. Legis. Serv. 228). See generally Donna J. Rabiner, David Brown & Janet O'Keeffe, Financial Exploitation of Older Persons: Policy Issues and Recommendations for Addressing Them, 16 J. Elder Abuse & Neglect 65 (2004). As an additional protective counter-measure to the narrow categories of persons who may request an agent to account, the Act contains a broad standing provision for seeking judicial review of an agent's conduct. 72-31-320. Exoneration of agent.

Official Comments

This section permits a principal to exonerate an agent from liability for breach of fiduciary duty, but prohibits exoneration for a breach committed dishonestly, with improper motive, or with reckless indifference to the purposes of the power of attorney or the best interest of the principal. The mandatory minimum standard of conduct required of an agent is equivalent to the good faith standard applicable to trustees. A trustee's failure to adhere to that standard cannot be excused by language in the trust instrument. See Unif. Trust Code §1008 cmt. (2003) (noting that "a trustee must always act in good faith with regard to the purposes of the trust and the interests of the beneficiaries"). See also Section 102(4) [72-31-302(4)] (defining good faith for purposes of the Act as "honesty in fact"). Section 115 [72-31-320] provides, as an additional measure of protection for the principal, that an exoneration provision is not binding if it was inserted as the result of abuse of a confidential or fiduciary relationship with the principal. While as a matter of good practice an exoneration provision should be the exception rather than the rule, its inclusion in a power of attorney may be useful in meeting particular objectives of the principal. For example, if the principal is concerned that contentious family members will attack the agent's conduct in order to gain control of the principal's assets, an exoneration provision may deter such action or minimize the likelihood of success on the merits.

72-31-321. Judicial relief.

Official Comments

The primary purpose of this section is to protect vulnerable or incapacitated principals against financial abuse. Subsection (a) [72-31-321(1)] sets forth broad categories of persons who have standing to petition the court for construction of the power of attorney or review of the agent's conduct, including in the list a "person that demonstrates sufficient interest in the principal's welfare" (subsection (a)(8)) [72-31-321(1)(h)]. Allowing any person with sufficient interest to petition the court is the approach taken by the majority of states that have standing provisions. See Cal. Prob. Code §4540 (West Supp. 2006); Colo. Rev. Stat. Ann. §15-14-609 (West 2005); 755 Ill. Comp. Stat. Ann. 45/2-10 (West 1992); Ind. Code Ann. §30-5-3-5 (West 1994); Kan. Stat. Ann.§58-662 (2005); Mo. Ann. Stat. §404.727 (West 2001); N.H. Rev. Stat. Ann. §506:7 (LexisNexis 1997 & Supp. 2005); Wash. Rev. Code Ann. §11.94.100 (Supp. 2006); Wis. Stat. Ann. §243.07(6r) (West 2001). But cf. 20 Pa. Cons. Stat. Ann. §5604 (West 2005) (limiting standing to an agency acting pursuant to the Older Adults Protective Services Act); Vt. Stat. Ann. tit.14, §3510(b) (2002 & 2006-3 Vt. Adv. Legis. Serv. 228) (limiting standing to the commissioner of disabilities, aging, and independent living).

In addition to providing a means for detecting and redressing financial abuse by agents, this section protects the self-determination rights of principals. Subsection (b) [72-31-321(2)] states that the court must dismiss a petition upon the principal's motion unless the court finds that the principal lacks the capacity to revoke the agent's authority or the power of attorney. Contrasted with the breadth of Section 116 [72-31-321] is Section 114(h) [72-31-319(8)] which narrowly limits the persons who can request an agent to account for transactions conducted on the principal's behalf. The rationale for narrowly restricting who may request an agent to account is the preservation of the principal's financial privacy. See Section 114 [72-31-319] Comment. Section 116 [72-31-321] operates as a check-and-balance on the narrow scope of Section 114(h) [72-31-319(8)] and provides what, in many circumstances, may be the only means to detect and stop agent abuse of an incapacitated principal.

72-31-322. Agent's liability.

Official Comments

This section provides that an agent's liability for violating the Act includes not only the amount necessary to restore the principal's property to what it would have been had the violation not occurred, but also any amounts for attorney's fees and costs advanced from the principal's property on the agent's behalf. This section does not, however, limit the agent's liability exposure to these amounts. Pursuant to Section 123 [72-31-328], remedies under the Act are not exclusive. If a jurisdiction has enacted separate statutes to deal with financial abuse, an agent may face additional civil or criminal liability. For a discussion of state statutory responses to financial abuse, see Carolyn L. Dessin, Financial Abuse of the Elderly: Is the Solution a Problem?, 34 McGeorge L. Rev. 267 (2003).

72-31-323. Agent's resignation — notice.

Official Comments

Section 118 [72-31-323] provides a default procedure for an agent's resignation. An agent who no longer wishes to serve should formally resign in order to establish a clear demarcation of the end of the agent's authority and to minimize gaps in fiduciary responsibility before a successor accepts the office. If the principal still has capacity when the agent wishes to resign, this section requires only that the agent give notice to the principal. If, however, the principal is incapacitated, the agent must, in addition to giving notice to the principal, give notice as set forth in paragraphs (1) or (2) [72-31-323(1) or (2)].

Paragraph (1) [72-31-323(1)] provides that notice must be given to a fiduciary, if one has been appointed, and to a coagent or successor agent, if any. If the principal does not have an appointed fiduciary and no coagent or successor agent is named in the power of attorney, then the agent may choose among the notice options in paragraph (2) [72-31-323(2)]. Paragraph (2) [72-31-323(2)] permits the resigning agent to give notice to the principal's caregiver, a person reasonably believed to have sufficient interest in the principal's welfare, or a governmental agency having authority to protect the welfare of the principal. The choice among these options is intentionally left to the agent's discretion and is governed by the same standards as apply to other agent conduct. See Section 114(a) [72-31-319(1)] (requiring the agent to act in accordance with the principal's reasonable expectations, if known, and otherwise in the principal's best interest).

72-31-324. Acceptance of and reliance upon acknowledged power of attorney.

Official Comments

This section protects persons who in good faith accept an acknowledged power of attorney. Section 119 [72-31-324] does not apply to unacknowledged powers of attorney. See Section 105 [72-31-305] (providing that the signature on a power of attorney is presumed genuine if acknowledged). Subsection (a) [72-31-324(1)] states that for purposes of this section and Section 120 [72-31-325] "acknowledged" means "purportedly" verified before an individual authorized to take acknowledgments. The purpose of this definition is to protect a person that in good faith accepts an acknowledged power of attorney without knowledge that it contains a forged signature or a latent defect in the acknowledgment. See, e.g., Cal. Prob. Code §4303(a)(2) (West Supp. 2006); 755 Ill. Comp. Stat. Ann. 45/2-8 (Supp. 2006); Ind. Code Ann. §30-5-8-2 (West 1994); N.C. Gen. Stat. §32A-40 (2005). The Act places the risk that a power of attorney is invalid upon the principal rather than the person that accepts the power of attorney. This approach promotes acceptance of powers of attorney, which is essential to their effectiveness as an alternative to guardianship. The national survey conducted by the Joint Editorial Board for Uniform Trust and Estate Acts (see Prefatory Note) found that a majority of respondents had difficulty obtaining acceptance of powers of attorney. Sixty-three percent reported occasional difficulty and seventeen percent reported frequent difficulty. Linda S. Whitton, National Durable Power of Attorney Survey Results and Analysis, National Conference of Commissioners on Uniform State Laws 12-13 (2002), available at http://www.law.upenn.edu/bll/ulc/dpoaa/surveyoct2002.htm.

Section 119 [72-31-324] permits a person to rely in good faith on the validity of the power of attorney, the validity of the agent's authority, and the propriety of the agent's exercise of authority, unless the person has actual knowledge to the contrary (subsection (c)) [72-31-324(3)]. Although a person is not required to investigate whether a power of attorney is valid or the agent's exercise of authority proper, subsection (d) [72-31-324(4)] permits a person to request an agent's certification of any factual matter (see Section 302 [72-31-354] for a sample certification form) and an opinion of counsel as to any matter of law. If the power of attorney contains, in whole or part, language other than English, an English translation may also be requested. Further protection is provided in subsection (f) [72-31-324(6)] for persons that conduct activities through employees. Subsection (f) [72-31-324(6)]states that for purposes of Sections 119 and 120 [72-31-324 and 72-31-325], a person is without actual knowledge of a fact if the employee conducting the transaction is without actual knowledge of the fact.

72-31-325. Liability for refusal to accept acknowledged power of attorney.

Official Comments

As a complement to Section 119 [72-31-324], Section 120 [72-31-325] enumerates the bases for legitimate refusals of a power of attorney as well as sanctions for refusals that violate the Act. Like Section 119, [72-31-324] Section 120 [72-31-325] does not apply to unacknowledged powers of attorney.

Subsection (b) [72-31-325(2)] of Section 120 [72-31-325] provides the bases upon which an acknowledged power of attorney may be refused without liability. The last paragraph of subsection (b) [72-31-325(2)] permits refusal of an otherwise valid acknowledged power of attorney that does not meet any of the other bases for refusal if the person in good faith believes that the principal is subject to abuse by the agent or someone acting in concert with the agent (paragraph (6)) [72-31-325(2)(f)]. A refusal under this paragraph is protected if the person makes, or knows another person has made, a report to the governmental agency authorized to protect the welfare of the principal. Pennsylvania has a similar provision. See 20 Pa. Cons. Stat. Ann. §5608(a) (West 2005).

Unless a basis exists in subsection (b) [72-31-325(2)] for refusing an acknowledged power of attorney, subsection (a) [72-31-325(1)] requires that, within seven business days after the power of attorney is presented, a person must either accept the power of attorney or request a certification, a translation, or an opinion of counsel pursuant to Section 119 [72-31-324]. If a request under Section 119 [72-31-324], is made, the person must decide to accept or reject the power of attorney no later than five business days after receipt of the requested document (subsection (a)(2)) [72-31-325(1)(b)]. Provided no basis exists for refusing the power of attorney, subsection (a)(3) [72-31-325(1)(c)] prohibits a person from requesting an additional or different form of power of attorney for authority granted in the power of attorney presented.

Subsection (c) of Section 120 [72-31-325(3)] provides that a person that refuses an acknowledged power of attorney in violation of Section 120 [72-31-325] is subject to a court order mandating acceptance and to reasonable attorney's fees and costs incurred in the action to confirm the validity of the power of attorney or to mandate acceptance. Statutory liability for unreasonable refusal of a power of attorney is based on a growing state legislative trend. See, e.g., Alaska Stat. §13.26.353(c) (2004); Cal. Prob. Code §4306(a) (West Supp. 2006); Fla. Stat. Ann. §709.08(11) (West 2000 & Supp. 2006); 755 Ill. Comp. Stat. Ann. 45/ 2-8 (West 1992); Ind. Code Ann. §30-5-9-9 (West Supp. 2005); Minn. Stat. Ann. §523.20 (West 2006); N.Y. Gen. Oblig. Law §5-1504 (McKinney 2001); N.C. Gen. Stat. §32A-41 (2005); 20 Pa. Cons. Stat. Ann. §5608 (West 2005); S.C. Code Ann. §62-5-501(F)(1) (Supp. 2005).

72-31-326. Principles of law and equity.

Official Comments

The Act is supplemented by common law, including the common law of agency, where provisions of the Act do not displace relevant common law principles. The common law of agency is articulated in the Restatement of Agency and includes contemporary and evolving rules of decision developed by the courts in exercise of their power to adapt the law to new situations and changing conditions. The common law also includes the traditional and broad equitable jurisdiction of the court, which this Act in no way restricts.

The statutory text of the Uniform Power of Attorney Act is also supplemented by these comments, which, like the comments to any Uniform Act, may be relied on as a guide for interpretation. 72-31-327. Laws applicable to financial institutions and entities.

Official Comments

This section addresses concerns of representatives from the banking and insurance industries that there may be regulations which govern those entities that conflict with provisions of this Act. Although no specific conflicts were identified during the drafting process, Section 122 [72-31-327] provides that in the event a law applicable to a financial institution or other entity is inconsistent with this Act, the other law will supersede this Act to the extent of the inconsistency. This concern about inconsistency with the requirements of other law is already substantially addressed in Section 120 [72-31-325], which provides, in pertinent part, that a person is not required to accept a power of attorney if, "the person is not otherwise required to engage in a transaction with the principal in the same circumstances," or "engaging in a transaction with the agent or the principal in the same circumstances would be inconsistent with federal law."

72-31-328. Remedies under other law.

Official Comments

The remedies under the Act are not intended to be exclusive with respect to causes of action that may accrue in relation to a power of attorney. The Act applies to many persons, individual and entity (see Section 102(6) [72-31-302(6)] (defining "person" for purposes of the Act)), that may serve as agents or that may be asked to accept a power of attorney. Likewise, the Act applies to many subject areas (see Article 2 [72-31-336 through 72-31-352]) over which principals may delegate authority to agents. Remedies under other laws which govern such persons and subject matters should be considered by aggrieved parties in addition to remedies available under this Act. See, e.g., Section 117 [72-31-322] Comment.

72-31-336. Authority that requires specific grant — grant of general authority.

Official Comments

This section distinguishes between grants of specific authority that require express language in a power of attorney and grants of general authority. Section 201(a) [72-31-336(1)] enumerates the acts that require an express grant of specific authority and which may not be inferred from a grant of general authority. This approach follows a growing trend among states to require express specific authority for such actions as making a gift, creating or revoking a trust, and using other non-probate estate planning devices such as survivorship interests and beneficiary designations. See, e.g., Cal. Prob. Code §4264 (West Supp. 2006); Kan. Stat. Ann. §58-654(f) (2005); Mo. Ann. Stat. §404.710 (West 2001); Wash. Rev. Code Ann. §11.94.050 (West Supp. 2006). The rationale for requiring a grant of specific authority to perform the acts enumerated in subsection (a) [72-31-336(1)] is the risk those acts pose to the principal's property and estate plan. Although risky, such authority may nevertheless be necessary to effectuate the principal's property management and estate planning objectives. Ideally, these are matters about which the principal will seek advise before granting authority to an agent.

The Act does not contain statutory construction language for any of the acts enumerated in subsection (a) [72-31-336(1)] other than the making of gifts (see Section 217) [72-31-352]. Because a gift of the principal's property reduces the principal's estate, the Act, like a number of state statutes, sets default per-donee limits on gift amounts. See, e.g., N.Y. Gen. Oblig. Law §5-1502M (McKinney 2001); 20 Pa. Cons. Stat. Ann. §5603(a)(2)(ii) (West 2005). However, as with any authority incorporated by reference in a power of attorney, the principal may enlarge or restrict the default parameters set by the Act.

With respect to other acts listed in Section 201(a) [72-31-336(1)], the Act contemplates that the principal will specify any special instructions in the power of attorney to further define or limit the authority granted. For example, if a principal grants authority to create or change rights of survivorship (subsection (a)(3)) [72-31-336(1)(c)] or beneficiary designations (subsection (a)(4)) [72-31-336(1)(d)] the principal may choose to restrict that authority to specifically identified property interests, accounts, or contracts. Principals should carefully consider not only whether to authorize any of the acts listed in Section 201(a) [72-31-336(1)], but also whether to limit the scope of such actions.

Subsection (b) [72-31-336(2)] contains an additional safeguard for the principal. It establishes as a default rule that an agent who is not an ancestor, spouse, or descendant of the principal may not exercise authority to create in the agent or in an individual the agent is legally obligated to support, an interest in the principal's property. For example, a non-relative agent with gift making authority could not make a gift to the agent or a dependant of the agent without the principal's express authority in the power of attorney. In contrast, a spouse-agent with express gift-making authority could implement the principal's expectation that annual family gifts be continued without additional authority in the power of attorney.

Notwithstanding a grant of authority to perform any of the enumerated acts in subsection (a) [72-31-336(1)], an agent is bound by the mandatory fiduciary duties set forth in Section 114(a) [72-31-319(1)], as well as the default duties that the principal has not modified. For a list of these default rules, see Section 301 [72-31-353] Comment. If the principal's expectations for the performance of authorized acts potentially conflict with those duties, then clarification of the principal's expectations, modification of the default duties, or both, may be advisable. See Section 114 [72-31-319] Comment.

Authority for acts and subject matters other than those listed in Section 201(a) [72-31-336(1)] may be granted either through incorporation by reference (see Section 202) [72-31-337] or, if the principal wishes to grant comprehensive general authority, by a grant of authority to do all the acts that a principal could do. A broad grant of general authority is interpreted under the Act as including all of the subject matters and authority described in Sections 204 through 216 [72-31-339 through 72-31-351] (see subsection (c)) [72-31-336(3)].

72-31-337. Incorporation of authority.

Official Comments

This section provides two methods for incorporating into a power of attorney the Act's statutory construction for authority over various subject matters. A reference in a power of attorney to the descriptive term for a subject in Sections 204 through 217 [72-31-339 through 72-31-352], or to the section number, incorporates the entire statutory section as if it were set out in full in the power of attorney. Subsection (c) [72-31-337(3)] provides that a principal may modify any authority incorporated by reference. The optional statutory form power of attorney provided in Section 301 [72-31-353] uses the descriptive terms in Sections 204 through 217 [72-31-339 through 72-31-352] to incorporate statutory construction for authority granted on the form and provides a "Special Instructions" section where the principal may modify any authority incorporated by reference.

72-31-338. Construction of authority generally.

Official Comments

This section is based on Section 3 of the Uniform Statutory Form Power of Attorney Act. It describes incidental types of authority that accompany all authority granted to an agent under each of Sections 204 through 217 [72-31-339 through 72-31-352], unless this incidental authority is modified in the power of attorney. The actions authorized in Section 203 [72-31-338] are of the type often necessary for the exercise or implementation of authority over the subjects described in Sections 204 through 217 [72-31-339 through 72-31-352]. See Unif. Statutory Form Power of Atty. Act prefatory note (1988). Paragraph (10) [72-31-338(10)], which states that an agent is authorized to "do any lawful act with respect to the subject and all property related to the subject," emphasizes that a grant of general authority is intended to be comprehensive unless otherwise limited by the Act or the power of attorney. Paragraphs (8) and (9) [72-31-338(8) and (9)] were added to the section to clarify that this comprehensive authority includes authorization to communicate with government employees on behalf of the principal, to access communications intended for the principal, and to communicate on behalf of the principal using all modern means of communication.

2011 Amendment: Chapter 109 substituted current text for former text that read: "In a statutory power of attorney, the language granting power with respect to business operating transactions empowers the agent:

(1) to operate, buy, sell, enlarge, reduce, and terminate a business interest;

(2) to the extent that an agent is permitted by law to act for a principal and subject to the terms of the partnership agreement, to:

(a) perform a duty or discharge a liability and exercise a right, power, privilege, or option that the principal has, may have, or claims to have under a partnership agreement, whether or not the principal is a partner;

(b) enforce the terms of a partnership agreement by litigation or otherwise; and

(c) defend, submit to arbitration, settle, or compromise litigation to which the principal is a party because of membership in the partnership;

(3) to exercise in person or by proxy or enforce, by litigation or otherwise, a right, power, privilege, or option the principal has or claims to have as the holder of a bond, share, or other instrument of similar character and to defend, submit to arbitration, settle, or compromise litigation to which the principal is a party because of a bond, share, or similar instrument;

(4) with respect to a business owned solely by the principal, to:

(a) continue, modify, renegotiate, extend, and terminate a contract made with an individual or a legal entity, firm, association, or corporation by or on behalf of the principal with respect to the business before execution of the power of attorney;

(b) determine:

(i) the location of its operation;

(ii) the nature and extent of its business;

(iii) the methods of manufacturing, selling, merchandising, financing, accounting, and advertising employed in its operation;

(iv) the amount and types of insurance carried;

(v) the mode of engaging, compensating, and dealing with its accountants, attorneys, and other agents and employees;

(c) change the name or form of organization under which the business is operated and enter into a partnership agreement with other persons or organize a corporation to take over all or part of the operation of the business; and

(d) demand and receive money due or claimed by the principal or on the principal's behalf in the operation of the business and control and disburse the money in the operation of the business;

(5) to put additional capital into a business in which the principal has an interest;

(6) to join in a plan of reorganization, consolidation, or merger of the business;

(7) to sell or liquidate a business or part of it at the time and upon the terms the agent considers desirable;

(8) to establish the value of a business under a buyout agreement to which the principal is a party;

(9) to prepare, sign, file, and deliver reports, compilations of information, returns, or other papers with respect to a business that are required by a governmental agency or instrumentality or that the agent considers desirable and to make related payments; and

(10) to pay, compromise, or contest taxes or assessments and to do any other act that the agent considers desirable to protect the principal from illegal or unnecessary taxation, fines, penalties, or assessments with respect to a business, including attempts to recover, in any manner permitted by law, money paid before or after the execution of the power of attorney." This section contains a significant change from Section 10 of the Uniform Statutory Form Power of Attorney Act. The default language in the Uniform Statutory Form Power of Attorney Act permitted an agent to designate the beneficiary of an insurance contract. See Unif. Statutory Form Power of Atty. Act §10(4) (1988). However, under Section 210 [72-31-345] of this Act, an agent does not have authority to "create or change a beneficiary designation" unless that authority is specifically granted to the agent pursuant to Section 201(a) [72-31-336(1)]. The authority granted under Paragraph (2) of Section 210 [72-31-345(2)] is more limited, allowing an agent to only "procure new, different, and additional contracts of insurance and annuities for the principal and the principal's spouse, children, and other dependents." A principal who grants authority to an agent under Section 210 [72-31-345] should therefore carefully consider whether a specific grant of authority to create or change beneficiary designations is also desirable.

Official Comments

This section, which corresponds to Section 11 of the Uniform Statutory Form Power of Attorney Act, has been revised to clarify that an agent's authority includes authority to exercise, for the benefit of the principal, a presently exercisable general power of appointment held by the principal (subsection (b)(3)) [72-31-346(2)(c)]. "Presently exercisable general power of appointment" is defined for purposes of the Act in Section 102(8) [72-31-302(8)].

(iv) to agree and contract in any manner, with any person, and on any terms the attorney-in-fact selects, for the accomplishment of the purposes listed in this section and to perform, rescind, reform, release, or modify the agreement or contract or any other similar agreement or contract made by or on behalf of the principal;

(v) to execute, acknowledge, verify, seal, file, and deliver any deed, assignment, mortgage, lease, consent, designation, pleading, notice, demand, election, conveyance, release, assignment, check, pledge, waiver, admission of service, notice of appearance, or other instrument that the attorney-in-fact considers useful for the accomplishment of any of the purposes enumerated in this section;

(vi) to submit to arbitration, settle, and propose or accept a compromise with respect to any controversy or claim that affects the administration of the fund, in any one of which the principal has or claims to have an interest and to do any and all acts that the attorney-in-fact considers to be desirable or necessary in effectuating the compromise;

(vii) to hire, discharge, and compensate any attorney, accountant, expert witness, or other assistant when the attorney-in-fact considers that action to be desirable for the proper execution by the attorney-in-fact of any of the powers described in this section and for the keeping of needed records"; in (6), after "transfer", deleted "any part or all of any", after "real" substituted "property" for "estate", after "accounts" inserted "with financial institutions", after "insurance, and other" substituted "property" for "assets of any kind and nature", and at end substituted "settlor" for "grantor"; deleted former (1)(b) that read: "(b) in general and in addition to all the specific acts listed in this section, to do any other acts with respect to the administration of a trust, probate estate, guardianship, conservatorship, escrow, custodianship, or other fund in which the principal has or claims to have an interest as a beneficiary"; deleted former (2) and (3) that read: "(2) For the purposes of subsection (1), "fund" means any trust, probate estate, guardianship, conservatorship, escrow, custodianship, or any other fund in which the principal has or claims to have an interest.

(3) All powers described in this section are exercisable equally with respect to the administration or disposition of any trust, probate estate, guardianship, conservatorship, escrow, custodianship, or other fund in which the principal is interested at the giving of the power of attorney or becomes interested after that time as a beneficiary, whether located in Montana or elsewhere"; and made minor changes in style.

72-31-348. Personal and family maintenance.

Official Comments

This section, based on Section 13 of the Uniform Statutory Form Power of Attorney Act, contains three important changes. The first is clarification in subsection (a)(1) [72-31-348(1)(a)] of who qualifies to benefit from payments for personal and family maintenance. Paragraph (1) [72-31-348(1)(a)] states that the individuals who may benefit include not only the principal's children and other individuals legally entitled to be supported by the principal, but also "individuals whom the principal has customarily supported or indicated the intent to support," "whether living when the power of attorney is executed or later born." This definition is broad enough to include common recipients of family support such as parents and later-born grandchildren if such support is intended by the principal.

The second important addition to Section 213 [72-31-348] is the inclusion of paragraph (6) in subsection (a) [72-31-348(1)(f)] which qualifies the agent to act as the principal's "personal representative" for purposes of the Health Insurance Portability and Accountability Act (HIPAA) so that the agent can communicate with health care providers in order to pay medical bills. See 45 C.F.R. §164.502(g)(1)-(2) (2006) (providing that for purposes of disclosing an individual's protected health information, "a covered entity must... treat a personal representative as the individual"). Section 213 [72-31-348] does not, however, empower the agent to make health-care decisions for the principal. See Section 103 [72-31-303] and comment (discussing exclusion from this Act of powers to make health-care decisions).

The third important addition to this section is subsection (b) [72-31-348(2)] which provides that authority under Section 213 [72-31-348] is neither dependent upon, nor limited by, authority that an agent may or may not have with respect to making gifts. Although payments made for the benefit of persons under Section 213 [72-31-348] may in fact be subject to gift tax treatment, subsection (b) [72-31-348(2)] clarifies that the authority for personal and family maintenance payments by an agent emanates from this section rather than Section 217 [72-31-352]. This is an important distinction because the Act requires a grant of specific authority under Section 201(a) [72-31-336(1)] to authorize gift making, and the default provisions of Section 217 limit the amounts of those gifts. The authority to make payments under Section 213 [72-31-348] is not constrained by either of these provisions.

Compiler's Comments

2011 Amendment: Chapter 109 in (1) substituted introductory language for "In a statutory power of attorney, the language granting power with respect to personal and family maintenance empowers the agent to"; in (1)(a) after "principal and the" substituted "following individuals, whether living when the power of attorney is executed or later born" for "principal's spouse, children, and other individuals customarily or legally entitled to be supported by the principal"; inserted (1)(a)(i) through (1)(a)(iii) concerning individuals supported by the principal; inserted (1)(b) concerning child support and other family maintenance; in (1)(d) inserted reference to postsecondary and vocational education; in (1)(e) substituted "health care" for "medical, dental, and surgical care, hospitalization"; inserted (1)(f) concerning authority to act as the principal's personal representative pursuant to HIPAA; in (1)(h) near beginning after "maintain" substituted "credit and debit" for "or open charge" and after "open new accounts" deleted "the agent considers desirable to accomplish a lawful purpose"; in (1)(i) after "principal in a" substituted "religious institution" for "church"; inserted (2) regarding an agent's authority with respect to maintenance; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective October 1, 2011.

1993 Amendment: Chapter 494 in introductory clause, after "statutory", deleted "short form", after "language" substituted "granting power" for "conferring general authority", after "respect to" inserted "personal and" and after "maintenance" substituted "empowers the agent to" for "means that the principal authorizes the attorney-in-fact"; in (1), after "standard of living", substituted "of the principal and the principal's spouse, children, and other individuals customarily or legally entitled to be supported by the principal" for "of the spouse, children, and other dependents, including, by way of illustration and not of restriction, power to" and at end, after "occupied by", substituted "those individuals" for "the principal's family or dependents"; in (2), at beginning, substituted "provide for the individuals described in subsection (1) normal domestic help" for "to provide normal domestic help for the operation of the household" and after

"travel expenses" substituted "and funds for shelter, clothing, food, appropriate education, and other current living costs" for "to provide usual educational facilities; and to provide funds for all the current living costs of the spouse, children, and other dependents, including, among other things, shelter, clothing, food, and incidentals"; in (3), after "pay for", inserted "the individuals described in subsection (1)" and after "care" deleted "for the spouse, children, and other dependents of the principal"; in (4), after "made by the principal", substituted "for the individuals described in subsection (1) for" for "either prior to or after the execution of the power of attorney, for the principal's spouse, children, and other dependents with respect to" and after "including" substituted "registering, licensing, insuring, and replacing them" for "by way of illustration but not of restriction, power to license, insure, and replace any automobiles owned by the principal and customarily used by the spouse, children, or other dependents"; substituted (5) concerning maintaining or opening charge accounts for former text that read: "(d) to continue whatever charge accounts have been operated by the principal prior to the execution of the power of attorney or after execution of the power of attorney for the convenience of the principal's spouse, children, or other dependents; to open new accounts the attorney-in-fact considers to be desirable for the accomplishment of any of the purposes enumerated in this section; and to pay the items charged on those accounts by any person authorized or permitted by the principal to make charges prior to the execution of the power of attorney"; deleted former (1)(f) through (1)(j) that read: "(f) to demand, receive, or obtain by action, proceeding, or otherwise any money or other thing of value to which the principal is, may become, or may claim to be entitled to as salary, wages, commission, or other remuneration for services performed, as a dividend or distribution upon any stock, or as interest or principal upon any indebtedness or any periodic distribution of profits from any partnership or business in which the principal has or claims an interest and to endorse, collect, or otherwise realize upon any instrument for the payment received;

(g) to use any asset of the principal for the performance of the powers enumerated in this section, including, by way of illustration and not of restriction, power to draw money by check or otherwise from any bank deposit of the principal; to sell any interest in real property, bonds, shares, commodity interests, tangible personal property, or other assets of the principal; and to borrow money and pledge as security for a loan, any asset, including insurance, that belongs to the principal;

(h) to execute, acknowledge, verify, seal, file, and deliver any application, consent, petition, notice, release, waiver, agreement, or other instrument that the attorney-in-fact considers useful for the accomplishment of any of the purposes enumerated in this section;

(i) to hire, discharge, and compensate any attorney, accountant, or other assistant when the attorney-in-fact considers that action to be desirable for the proper execution by any of the powers described in this section and for the keeping of needed records; and

(j) in general and in addition to all the specific acts listed in this section, to do any other acts for the welfare of the spouse, children, or other dependents or for the preservation and maintenance of the other personal relationships of the principal to parents, relatives, friends, and organizations as are appropriate"; deleted former (2) that read: "(2) All powers described in this section are exercisable equally whether the acts required for their execution relate to real or personal property owned by the principal at the giving of the power of attorney or acquired after that time, whether those acts are performable in Montana or elsewhere"; and made minor changes in style.

72-31-350. Retirement plans.

Official Comments

This section, based on Section 15 of the Uniform Statutory Form Power of Attorney Act, has been substantially updated to reflect changes in the laws governing retirement plans. A significant departure from the Uniform Statutory Form Power of Attorney Act is the deletion of default authority in the agent to waive the right of the principal to be a beneficiary of a joint or survivor annuity (see Unif. Statutory Form Power of Atty. Act §15 (1988)). Under this Act, the authority to waive the principal's right to be a beneficiary of a joint and survivor annuity must be given by a specific grant pursuant to Section 201(a) [72-31-336(1)].

Compiler's Comments

2011 Amendment: Chapter 109 substituted current text for former text that read: "In a statutory power of attorney, the language granting power with respect to retirement plan transactions empowers the agent to:

(1) select payment options under any retirement plan in which the principal participates, including plans for self-employed individuals;

(2) designate beneficiaries under those plans and change existing designations;

(3) make voluntary contributions to those plans;

(4) exercise the investment powers available under any self-directed retirement plan;

(5) make "rollovers" of plan benefits into other retirement plans;

(6) if authorized by the plan, borrow from, sell assets to, and purchase assets from the plan; and

(7) waive the right of the principal to be a beneficiary of a joint or survivor annuity if the principal is a spouse who is not employed." Amendment effective October 1, 2011.

72-31-352. Gifts.

Official Comments

This section provides default limitations on an agent's authority to make a gift of the principal's property. Authority to make a gift must be made by a specific grant in a power of attorney (see Section 201(a)(2)) [72-31-336(1)(b)]; see also Section 301 [72-31-353]. The mere granting to an agent of authority to make gifts does not, however, grant an agent unlimited authority. The agent's authority is subject to this section unless enlarged or further limited by an express modification in the power of attorney. Without modification, the authority of an agent under this section is limited to gifts in an amount per donee not to exceed the annual dollar limits of the federal gift tax exclusion, or twice that amount if the principal and the principal's spouse consent to make a split gift.

Subsection (a) of this section [72-31-352(1)] clarifies the fact that a gift includes not only outright gifts, but also gifts for the benefit of a person. Subsection (a) [72-31-352(1)] provides examples of gifts made for the benefit of a person, but these examples are not intended to be exclusive.

Subsection (c) [72-31-352(3)] emphasizes that exercise of authority to make a gift, as with exercise of all authority under a power of attorney, must be consistent with the principal's objectives. If these objectives are not known, then gifts must be consistent with the principal's best interest based on all relevant factors. Subsection (c) [72-31-352(3)] provides examples of factors relevant to the principal's best interest, but these examples are illustrative rather than exclusive.

To the extent that a principal's objectives with respect to the making of gifts may potentially conflict with an agent's default duties under the Act, the principal should carefully consider stating those objectives in the power of attorney, or altering the default rules to accommodate the objectives, or both. See Section 114 [72-31-319] Comment.

72-31-353. Statutory form power of attorney.

Official Comments

This section provides an optional form for creating a power of attorney. Any power of attorney that substantially complies with the form in Section 301 [72-31-353] constitutes a statutory form power of attorney with the meaning and effect prescribed by the Act.

The form begins with an "Important Information" section that contains instructions for the principal and concludes with an "Important Information for Agent" section that contains general information for the agent about agent duties, events that terminate an agent's authority, and agent liability. The form is constructed to guide the principal through designation of an agent, optional designation of one or more successor agents, and selection of subject areas and acts with respect to which the principal wishes to grant the agent authority. The form also contains an option for nomination of a conservator or guardian in the event later court-appointment of a fiduciary becomes necessary (see Section 108 [72-31-308] and Comment).

The grant of authority provisions in the form are divided into two sections: "Grant of General Authority," which corresponds to the subject areas defined in Sections 204 through 216 [72-31-339 through 72-31-351] of the Act, and "Grant of Specific Authority," which corresponds to the actions for which Section 201(a) [72-31-336(1)] requires an express grant of authority in a power of attorney. Article 2 of the Act [72-31-336 through 72-31-352] provides statutory construction with respect to all of the subject matters in the Grant of General Authority section and for the authority to make a gift listed in the Grant of Specific Authority section. The principal may modify any authority granted in the form by using the "Special Instructions" section of the form. For example, the scope of authority to make a gift is defined by the default provisions of Section 217 [72-31-352] unless the principal expands or narrows that authority in the Special Instructions.

Cautionary language in the Grant of Specific Authority section alerts the principal to the increased risks associated with a grant of authority that could significantly reduce the principal's property or alter the principal's estate plan. The form is constructed to require that the principal initial each action over which the principal grants specific authority. The separate authorization of acts covered by Section 201(a) [72-31-336(1)] is intended to emphasize to the principal the significance of granting such specific authority and to minimize the risk that those actions might be authorized inadvertently.

Many principals may wish to grant an agent comprehensive authority over their day-to-day affairs. If this is the case, the principal may grant authority over all of the subject areas in the Grant of General Authority section by initialing "All Preceding Subjects." Otherwise, the principal may authorize fewer than all of the subjects listed in the Grant of General Authority section by initialing only those particular subjects.

The statutory form is drafted to follow the Act's default provisions, but it does not preclude alteration of the default rules or the exercise of other options available under the Act. For example, if not altered by the Special Instructions, the default rules embodied in a statutory form power of attorney include:

(1) the power of attorney is durable (Section 104) [72-31-304];

(2) the power of attorney is effective when executed (Section 109) [72-31-309];

(3) a spouse-agent's authority terminates upon the filing of an action for dissolution, annulment, or legal separation (Section 110(b)(3)) [72-31-310(2)(c)];

(4) lapse of time does not affect an agent's authority (Section 110(c)) [72-31-310(3)];

(5) a successor agent has the same authority as the original agent (Section 111(b)) [72-31-316(2)];

(6) a successor agent may not act until all predecessors have resigned, died, become incapacitated, are no longer qualified to serve, or have declined to serve (Section 111(b)) [72-31-316(2)];

(7) an agent is entitled to reimbursement of expenses reasonably incurred (Section 112) [72-31-317];

(8) an agent is entitled to reasonable compensation (Section 112) [72-31-317];

(9) the agent accepts appointment by exercising authority or performing duties, or by any assertion or conduct indicating acceptance (Section 113) [72-31-318];

(10) an agent has a duty to act loyally for the principal's benefit; to act so as not to create a conflict of interest that impairs the ability to act impartially in the principal's best interest; to act with care, competence, and diligence; to keep a record of receipts, disbursements, and transactions; to cooperate with the principal's health-care agent; to attempt to preserve the principal's estate plan to the extent the plan is known to the agent and if preservation is consistent with the principal's best interest; and to account if ordered by a court or requested by the principal, a fiduciary acting for the principal, a governmental agency with authority to protect the principal, or the personal representative or successor in interest of the principal's estate (Section 114) [72-31-319];

(11) an agent must give notice of resignation as specified in Section 118 [72-31-323]; and

(12) an agent that is not the principal's ancestor, spouse, or descendant may not exercise authority to create in the agent, or an individual to whom the agent owes support, an interest in the principal's property (Section 201(b)) [72-31-336(2)].

Although the statutory form does not include express prompts for deviating from the foregoing default rules, any statutorily-sanctioned deviation from the statutory form may be indicated in, or on an addendum to, the Special Instructions.

Source — Explanation of Official Comments: The text of the Montana Trust Code (Title 72, ch. 33 through 36, MCA) was proposed by a joint committee of the State Bar of Montana and the Montana Bankers Association and was enacted by Ch. 685, L. 1989. Professor E. Edwin Eck of the University of Montana (now University of Montana-Missoula) School of Law was the lawyer chairman of the Joint Committee on Trust Law Revision. The Committee began work in 1986 and completed its proposal in November 1987.

The Montana Trust Code is based in substantial part on the California Trust Law, California Probate Code sections 15000 through 18201, which was adopted by California in 1986 and became operative in California on July 1, 1987. The official comments that follow each section cite the corresponding California section, if any. If the Montana section constitutes a change in substance from the corresponding California provision, the official comment includes a discussion of the change. If the Montana section is based upon a statute of a state other than California, that state's statute is cited in the official comment.

The official comments that follow were prepared by the Joint Committee on Trust Law Revision.

Chapter Case Notes

Self-Dealing During Agency Relationship — Proof of Undue Influence and Constructive Fraud — Shift of Burden of Proof — Agent Prohibited From Acting as Trustee Would Have Been Prohibited: Alice, a good friend of Maggie, lived near her and undertook to manage Maggie's financial affairs when Maggie's health began failing. As Maggie became more afflicted with dementia, Alice moved in with Maggie to care for her and began writing all of Maggie's checks for her. Alice also began selling Maggie's securities, depositing the proceeds into her own account, and writing checks to herself for purposes that sometimes involved Maggie. During this time, Maggie's physician found her mental capacity to be steadily diminishing and urged Alice to take Maggie to a nursing home. After Alice had depleted Maggie's financial resources from approximately $200,000 to approximately $20,000, Maggie's sister, Ida, discovered that Maggie had been moved to a nursing home and discovered that her money had been spent by Alice. Maggie died shortly thereafter, and the personal representative brought an action against Alice for an accounting of Maggie's funds. The Supreme Court held that all of the criteria for proof of undue influence established in Christensen v. Britton, 240 M 393, 784 P2d 908 (1989), had been satisfied and that the District Court therefore erred in not shifting the burden of proof to Alice to prove that the financial transactions involving Alice were fair and voluntary. Likewise, the Supreme Court also held, because of the agency or fiduciary relationship between Alice and Maggie, that the District Court erred in placing the burden on the estate to prove constructive fraud. The Supreme Court held that under statutory provisions of agency law, Alice was not authorized to do any act that a trustee would be prohibited by this chapter from doing and found that such a prohibition still existed under 28-10-407(3), even though 72-20-208 had been repealed. The Supreme Court therefore remanded the case to the District Court for a new trial. Luke v. Gager, 2000 MT 377, 303 M 474, 16 P3d 377, 57 St. Rep. 1599 (2000).

Part 4
Montana Uniform Principal and Income Act

Part Official Comments

PREFATORY NOTE

This revision of the 1931 Uniform Principal and Income Act and the 1962 Revised Uniform Principal and Income Act has two purposes.

One purpose is to revise the 1931 and the 1962 Acts. Revision is needed to support the now widespread use of the revocable living trust as a will substitute, to change the rules in those Acts that experience has shown need to be changed, and to establish new rules to cover situations not provided for in the old Acts, including rules that apply to financial instruments invented since 1962.

The other purpose is to provide a means for implementing the transition to an investment regime based on principles embodied in the Uniform Prudent Investor Act [Title 72, chapter 34, part 6], especially the principle of investing for total return rather than a certain level of "income" as traditionally perceived in terms of interest, dividends, and rents.

Revision of the 1931 and 1962 Acts

The prior Acts and this revision of those Acts deal with four questions affecting the rights of beneficiaries:

(1) How is income earned during the probate of an estate to be distributed to trusts and to persons who receive outright bequests of specific property, pecuniary gifts, and the residue?

(2) When an income interest in a trust begins (i.e., when a person who creates the trust dies or when she transfers property to a trust during life), what property is principal that will eventually go to the remainder beneficiaries and what is income?

(3) When an income interest ends, who gets the income that has been received but not distributed, or that is due but not yet collected, or that has accrued but is not yet due?

(4) After an income interest begins and before it ends, how should its receipts and disbursements be allocated to or between principal and income?

Changes in the traditional sections are of three types: new rules that deal with situations not covered by the prior Acts, clarification of provisions in the 1962 Act, and changes to rules in the prior Acts.

New rules. Issues addressed by some of the more significant new rules include:

(1) The application of the probate administration rules to revocable living trusts after the settlor's death and to other terminating trusts. Articles 2 and 3 [72-34-428 through 72-34-432].

(2) The payment of interest or some other amount on the delayed payment of an outright pecuniary gift that is made pursuant to a trust agreement instead of a will when the agreement or state law does not provide for such a payment. Section 201(3) [72-34-428(2)].

(3) The allocation of net income from partnership interests acquired by the trustee other than from a decedent (the old Acts deal only with partnership interests acquired from a decedent). Section 401 [72-34-433].

(4) An "unincorporated entity" concept has been introduced to deal with businesses operated by a trustee, including farming and livestock operations, and investment activities in rental real estate, natural resources, timber, and derivatives. Section 403 [72-34-435].

(5) The allocation of receipts from discount obligations such as zero-coupon bonds. Section 406(b) [72-34-438(2)].

(6) The allocation of net income from harvesting and selling timber between principal and income. Section 412 [72-34-444].

(7) The allocation between principal and income of receipts from derivatives, options, and asset-backed securities. Sections 414 and 415 [72-34-446 and 72-34-447].

(8) Disbursements made because of environmental laws. Section 502(a)(7) [72-34-449(1)(g)].

(9) Income tax obligations resulting from the ownership of S corporation stock and interests in partnerships. Section 505 [72-34-452].

(10) The power to make adjustments between principal and income to correct inequities caused by tax elections or peculiarities in the way the fiduciary income tax rules apply. Section 506 [72-34-453].

Clarifications and changes in existing rules. A number of matters provided for in the prior Acts have been changed or clarified in this revision, including the following:

(1) An income beneficiary's estate will be entitled to receive only net income actually received by a trust before the beneficiary's death and not items of accrued income. Section 303 [72-34-432].

(2) Income from a partnership is based on actual distributions from the partnership, in the same manner as corporate distributions. Section 401 [72-34-433].

(3) Distributions from corporations and partnerships that exceed 20% of the entity's gross assets will be principal whether or not intended by the entity to be a partial liquidation. Section 401(d)(2) [72-34-433(4)(a)(ii)].

(4) Deferred compensation is dealt with in greater detail in a separate section. Section 409 [72-34-441].

(5) The 1962 Act rule for "property subject to depletion," (patents, copyrights, royalties, and the like), which provides that a trustee may allocate up to 5% of the asset's inventory value to income and the balance to principal, has been replaced by a rule that allocates 90% of the amounts received to principal and the balance to income. Section 410 [72-34-442].

(6) The percentage used to allocate amounts received from oil and gas has been changed - 90% of those receipts are allocated to principal and the balance to income. Section 411 [72-34-443].

(7) The unproductive property rule has been eliminated for trusts other than marital deduction trusts. Section 413 [72-34-445].

(8) Charging depreciation against income is no longer mandatory, and is left to the discretion of the trustee. Section 503 [72-34-450].

Coordination with the Uniform Prudent Investor Act [Title 72, chapter 34, part 6]

The law of trust investment has been modernized. See Uniform Prudent Investor Act [Title 72, chapter 34, part 6] (1994); Restatement (Third) of Trusts: Prudent Investor Rule (1992) (hereinafter Restatement of Trusts 3d: Prudent Investor Rule). Now it is time to update the principal and income allocation rules so the two bodies of doctrine can work well together. This revision deals conservatively with the tension between modern investment theory and traditional income allocation. The starting point is to use the traditional system. If prudent investing of all the assets in a trust viewed as a portfolio and traditional allocation effectuate the intent of the settlor, then nothing need be done. The Act, however, helps the trustee who has made a prudent, modern portfolio-based investment decision that has the initial effect of skewing return from all the assets under management, viewed as a portfolio, as between income and principal beneficiaries. The Act gives that trustee a power to reallocate the portfolio return suitably. To leave a trustee constrained by the traditional system would inhibit the trustee's ability to fully implement modern portfolio theory.

As to modern investing see, e.g., the Preface to, terms of, and Comments to the Uniform Prudent Investor Act [Title 72, chapter 34, part 6] (1994); the discussion and reporter's note by Edward C. 72-34-422. Definitions.

Official Comments

"Income beneficiary." The definitions of income beneficiary (Section 102(5)) [72-34-422(4)] and income interest (Section 102(6)) [72-34-422(5)] cover both mandatory and discretionary beneficiaries and interests. There are no definitions for "discretionary income beneficiary" or "discretionary income interest" because those terms are not used in the Act.

Inventory value. There is no definition for inventory value in this Act because the provisions in which that term was used in the 1962 Act have either been eliminated (in the case of the underproductive property provision) or changed in a way that eliminates the need for the term (in the case of bonds and other money obligations, property subject to depletion, and the method for determining entitlement to income distributed from a probate estate).

"Net income." The reference to "transfers under this Act to or from income" means transfers made under Sections 104(a), 412(b), 502(b), 503(b), 504(a), and 506 [72-34-424(1), 72-34-444(2), 72-34-449(2), 72-34-450(2), 72-34-451(1), and 72-34-453].

"Terms of a trust." This term was chosen in preference to "terms of the trust instrument" (the phrase used in the 1962 Act) to make it clear that the Act applies to oral trusts as well as those whose terms are expressed in written documents. The definition is based on the Restatement (Second) of Trusts §4 (1959) and the Restatement (Third) of Trusts §4 (Tent. Draft No. 1, 1996). Constructional preferences or rules would also apply, if necessary, to determine the terms of the trust.

72-34-423. Allocation between principal and income — impartial exercise of discretion.

Official Comments

Prior Act. The rule in Section 2(a) [72-34-403(1), now repealed] of the 1962 Act is restated in Section 103(a) [72-34-423(1)], without changing its substance, to emphasize that the Act contains only default rules and that provisions in the terms of the trust are paramount. However, Section 2(a) [72-34-403(1), now repealed] of the 1962 Act applies only to the allocation of receipts and disbursements to or between principal and income. In this Act, the first sentence of Section 103(a) [72-34-423(1)] states that it also applies to matters within the scope of Articles 2 and 3 [72-34-428 through 72-34-432]. Section 103(a)(2) [72-34-423(1)(b)] incorporates the rule in Section 2(b) [72-34-403(2), now repealed] of the 1962 Act that a discretionary allocation made by the trustee that is contrary to a rule in the Act should not give rise to an inference of imprudence or partiality by the trustee.

The Act deletes the language that appears at the end of 1962 Act Section 2(a)(3) [72-34-403(1)(c), now repealed]- "and in view of the manner in which men of ordinary prudence, discretion and judgment would act in the management of their affairs" - because persons of ordinary prudence, discretion and judgment, acting in the management of their own affairs do not normally think in terms of the interests of successive beneficiaries. If there is an analogy to an individual's decision-making process, it is probably the individual's decision to spend or to save, but this is not a useful guideline for trust administration. No case has been found in which a court has relied on the "prudent man" rule of the 1962 Act.

Fiduciary discretion. The general rule is that if a discretionary power is conferred upon a trustee, the exercise of that power is not subject to control by a court except to prevent an abuse of discretion. Restatement (Second) of Trusts §187. The situations in which a court will control the exercise of a trustee's discretion are discussed in the comments to §187. See also id. §233 Comment p.

Questions for which there is no provision. Section 103(a)(4) [72-34-423(1)(d)] allocates receipts and disbursements to principal when there is no provision for a different allocation in the terms of the trust, the will, or the Act. This may occur because money is received from a financial instrument not available at the present time (inflation-indexed bonds might have fallen into this category had they been announced after this Act was approved by the Commissioners on Uniform State Laws) or because a transaction is of a type or occurs in a manner not anticipated by the Drafting Committee for this Act or the drafter of the trust instrument.

Allocating to principal a disbursement for which there is no provision in the Act or the terms of the trust preserves the income beneficiary's level of income in the year it is allocated to principal, but thereafter will reduce the amount of income produced by the principal. Allocating to principal a receipt for which there is no provision will increase the income received by the income beneficiary in subsequent years, and will eventually, upon termination of the trust, also favor the remainder beneficiary. Allocating these items to principal implements the rule that requires a trustee to administer the trust impartially, based on what is fair and reasonable to both income and remainder beneficiaries. However, if the trustee decides that an adjustment between principal and income is needed to enable the trustee to comply with Section 103(b) [72-34-423(2)], after considering the return from the portfolio as a whole, the trustee may make an appropriate adjustment under Section 104(a) [72-34-424(1)].

Duty of impartiality. Whenever there are two or more beneficiaries, a trustee is under a duty to deal impartially with them. Restatement of Trusts 3d: Prudent Investor Rule §183 (1992). This rule applies whether the beneficiaries' interests in the trust are concurrent or successive. If the terms of the trust give the trustee discretion to favor one beneficiary over another, a court will not control the exercise of such discretion except to prevent the trustee from abusing it. Id. §183, Comment a. "The precise meaning of the trustee's duty of impartiality and the balancing of competing interests and objectives inevitably are matters of judgment and interpretation. Thus, the duty and balancing are affected by the purposes, terms, distribution requirements, and other circumstances of the trust, not only at the outset but as they may change from time to time." Id. §232, Comment c.

The terms of a trust may provide that the trustee, or an accountant engaged by the trustee, or a committee of persons who may be family members or business associates, shall have the power to determine what is income and what is principal. If the terms of a trust provide that this Act specifically or principal and income legislation in general does not apply to the trust but fail to provide a rule to deal with a matter provided for in this Act, the trustee has an implied grant of discretion to decide the question. Section 103(b) [72-34-423(2)] provides that the rule of impartiality applies in the exercise of such a discretionary power to the extent that the terms of the trust do not provide that one or more of the beneficiaries are to be favored. The fact that a person is named an income beneficiary or a remainder beneficiary is not by itself an indication of partiality for that beneficiary.

72-34-424. Adjustments between principal and income.

Official Comments

Purpose and Scope of Provision. The purpose of Section 104 [72-34-424] is to enable a trustee to select investments using the standards of a prudent investor without having to realize a particular portion of the portfolio's total return in the form of traditional trust accounting income such as interest, dividends, and rents. Section 104(a) [72-34-424(1)] authorizes a trustee to make adjustments between principal and income if three conditions are met: (1) the trustee must be managing the trust assets under the prudent investor rule; (2) the terms of the trust must express the income beneficiary's distribution rights in terms of the right to receive "income" in the sense of traditional trust accounting income; and (3) the trustee must determine, after applying the rules in Section 103(a) [72-34-423(1)], that he is unable to comply with Section 103(b) [72-34-423(2)]. In deciding whether and to what extent to exercise the power to adjust, the trustee is required to consider the factors described in Section 104(b) [72-34-424(7)], but the trustee may not make an adjustment in circumstances described in Section 104(c) [72-34-424(2)].

Section 104 [72-34-424] does not empower a trustee to increase or decrease the degree of beneficial enjoyment to which a beneficiary is entitled under the terms of the trust; rather, it authorizes the trustee to make adjustments between principal and income that may be necessary if the income component of a portfolio's total return is too small or too large because of investment decisions made by the trustee under the prudent investor rule. The paramount consideration in applying Section 104(a) [72-34-424(1)] is the requirement in Section 103(b) [72-34-423(2)] that "a fiduciary must administer a trust or estate impartially, based on what is fair and reasonable to all of the beneficiaries, except to the extent that the terms of the trust or the will clearly manifest an intention that the fiduciary shall or may favor one or more of the beneficiaries." The power to adjust is subject to control by the court to prevent an abuse of discretion. Restatement (Second) of Trusts §187 (1959). See also id. §§183, 232, 233, Comment p (1959).

Section 104 [72-34-424] will be important for trusts that are irrevocable when a State adopts the prudent investor rule by statute or judicial approval of the rule in Restatement of Trusts 3d: Prudent Investor Rule. Wills and trust instruments executed after the rule is adopted can be drafted to describe a beneficiary's distribution rights in terms that do not depend upon the amount of trust accounting income, but to the extent that drafters of trust documents continue to describe an income beneficiary's distribution rights by referring to trust accounting income, Section 104 [72-34-424] will be an important tool in trust administration.

Three conditions to the exercise of the power to adjust. The first of the three conditions that must be met before a trustee can exercise the power to adjust - that the trustee invest and manage trust assets as a prudent investor - is expressed in this Act by language derived from the Uniform Prudent Investor Act [Title 72, chapter 34, part 6], but the condition will be met whether the prudent investor rule applies because the Uniform Act [Title 72, chapter 34, part 6] or other prudent investor legislation has been enacted, the prudent investor rule has been approved by the courts, or the terms of the trust require it. Even if a State's legislature or courts have not formally adopted the rule, the Restatement establishes the prudent investor rule as an authoritative interpretation of the common law prudent man rule, referring to the prudent investor rule as a "modest reformulation of the Harvard College dictum and the basic rule of prior Restatements." Restatement of Trusts 3d: Prudent Investor Rule, Introduction, at 5. As a result, there is a basis for concluding that the first condition is satisfied in virtually all States except those in which a trustee is permitted to invest only in assets set forth in a statutory "legal list."

The second condition will be met when the terms of the trust require all of the "income" to be distributed at regular intervals; or when the terms of the trust require a trustee to distribute all of the income, but permit the trustee to decide how much to distribute to each member of a class of beneficiaries; or when the terms of a trust provide that the beneficiary shall receive the greater of the trust accounting income and a fixed dollar amount (an annuity), or of trust accounting income and a fractional share of the value of the trust assets (a unitrust amount). If the trust authorizes the trustee in its discretion to distribute the trust's income to the beneficiary or to accumulate some or all of the income, the condition will be met because the terms of the trust do not permit the trustee to distribute more than the trust accounting income.

To meet the third condition, the trustee must first meet the requirements of Section 103(a) [72-34-423(1)], i.e., she must apply the terms of the trust, decide whether to exercise the discretionary powers given to the trustee under the terms of the trust, and must apply the provisions of the Act if the terms of the trust do not contain a different provision or give the trustee discretion. Second, the trustee must determine the extent to which the terms of the trust clearly manifest an intention by the settlor that the trustee may or must favor one or more of the beneficiaries. To the extent that the terms of the trust do not require partiality, the trustee must conclude that she is unable to comply with the duty to administer the trust impartially. To the extent that the terms of the trust do require or permit the trustee to favor the income beneficiary or the remainder beneficiary, the trustee must conclude that she is unable to achieve the degree of partiality required or permitted. If the trustee comes to either conclusion - that she is unable to administer the trust impartially or that she is unable to achieve the degree of partiality required or permitted - she may exercise the power to adjust under Section 104(a) [72-34-424(1)].

Impartiality and productivity of income. The duty of impartiality between income and remainder beneficiaries is linked to the trustee's duty to make the portfolio productive of trust accounting income whenever the distribution requirements are expressed in terms of distributing the trust's "income." The 1962 Act implies that the duty to produce income applies on an asset by asset basis because the right of an income beneficiary to receive "delayed income" from the sale proceeds of underproductive property under Section 12 [72-34-412, now repealed] of that Act arises if "any part of principal . . . has not produced an average net income of a least 1% per year of its inventory value for more than a year . . . ." Under the prudent investor rule, "[t]o whatever extent a requirement of income productivity exists, . . . the requirement applies not investment by investment but to the portfolio as a whole." Restatement of Trusts 3d: Prudent Investor Rule §227, Comment i, at 34. The power to adjust under Section 104(a) [72-34-424(1)] is also to be exercised by considering net income from the portfolio as a whole and not investment by investment. Section 413(b) [72-34-445(2)] of this Act eliminates the underproductive property rule in all cases other than trusts for which a marital deduction is allowed; the rule applies to a marital deduction trust if the trust's assets "consist substantially of property that does not provide the spouse with sufficient income from or use of the trust assets . . . " - in other words, the section applies by reference to the portfolio as a whole.

While the purpose of the power to adjust in Section 104(a) [72-34-424(1)] is to eliminate the need for a trustee who operates under the prudent investor rule to be concerned about the income component of the portfolio's total return, the trustee must still determine the extent to which a distribution must be made to an income beneficiary and the adequacy of the portfolio's liquidity as a whole to make that distribution.

For a discussion of investment considerations involving specific investments and techniques under the prudent investor rule, see Restatement of Trusts 3d: Prudent Investor Rule §227, Comments k-p.

Factors to consider in exercising the power to adjust. Section 104(b) [72-34-424(7)] requires a trustee to consider factors relevant to the trust and its beneficiaries in deciding whether and to what extent the power to adjust should be exercised. Section 2(c) of the Uniform Prudent Investor Act [72-34-603(3)] sets forth circumstances that a trustee is to consider in investing and managing trust assets. The circumstances in Section 2(c) of the Uniform Prudent Investor Act [72-34-603(3)] are the source of the factors in paragraphs (3) through (6) and (8) of Section 104(b) [72-34-424(7)(c) through (7)(f) and (7)(h)], (modified where necessary to adapt them to the purposes of this Act) so that, to the extent possible, comparable factors will apply to investment decisions and decisions involving the power to adjust. If a trustee who is operating under the prudent investor rule decides that the portfolio should be composed of financial assets whose total return will result primarily from capital appreciation rather than dividends, interest, and rents, the trustee can decide at the same time the extent to which an adjustment from principal to income may be necessary under Section 104 [72-34-424]. On the other hand, if a trustee decides that the risk and return objectives for the trust are best achieved by a portfolio whose total return includes interest and dividend income that is sufficient to provide the income beneficiary with the beneficial interest to which the beneficiary is entitled under the terms of the trust, the trustee can decide that it is unnecessary to exercise the power to adjust.

Assets received from the settlor. Section 3 of the Uniform Prudent Investor Act [72-34-605(1)] provides that "[a] trustee shall diversify the investments of the trust unless the trustee reasonably determines that, because of special circumstances, the purposes of the trust are better served without diversifying." The special circumstances may include the wish to retain a family business, the benefit derived from deferring liquidation of the asset in order to defer payment of income taxes, or the anticipated capital appreciation from retaining an asset such as undeveloped real estate for a long period. To the extent the trustee retains assets received from the settlor because of special circumstances that overcome the duty to diversify, the trustee may take these circumstances into account in determining whether and to what extent the power to adjust should be exercised to change the results produced by other provisions of this Act that apply to the retained assets. See Section 104(b)(5) [72-34-424(7)(e)]; Uniform Prudent Investor Act §3, [72-34-605(1)] Comment, 7B U.L.A. 18, at 25-26 (Supp. 1997); Restatement of Trusts 3d: Prudent Investor Rule §229 and Comments a-e.

Limitations on the power to adjust. The purpose of subsections (c)(1) through (4) [72-34-424(2)(a) through (2)(d)] is to preserve tax benefits that may have been an important purpose for creating the trust. Subsections (c)(5), (6), and (8) [72-34-424(2)(e) and (2)(f)] deny the power to adjust in the circumstances described in those subsections in order to prevent adverse tax consequences, and subsection (c)(7) [72-34-424(2)(g)] denies the power to adjust to any beneficiary, whether or not possession of the power may have adverse tax consequences.

Under subsection (c)(1) [72-34-424(2)(a)], a trustee cannot make an adjustment that diminishes the income interest in a trust that requires all of the income to be paid at least annually to a spouse and for which an estate tax or gift tax marital deduction is allowed; but this subsection does not prevent the trustee from making an adjustment that increases the amount of income paid from a marital deduction trust to the spouse. Subsection (c)(1) [72-34-424(2)(a)] applies to a trust that qualifies for the marital deduction because the spouse has a general power of appointment over the trust, but it applies to a qualified terminable interest property (QTIP) trust only if and to the extent that the fiduciary makes the election required to obtain the tax deduction. Subsection (c)(1) [72-34-424(2)(a)] does not apply to a so-called "estate" trust. This type of trust qualifies for the marital deduction because the terms of the trust require the principal and undistributed income to be paid to the surviving spouse's estate when the spouse dies; it is not necessary for the terms of an estate trust to require the income to be distributed annually. Reg. §20.2056(c)-2(b)(1)(iii).

Subsection (c)(3) [72-34-424(2)(c)] applies to annuity trusts and unitrusts with no charitable beneficiaries as well as to trusts with charitable income or remainder beneficiaries; its purpose is to make it clear that a beneficiary's right to receive a fixed annuity or a fixed fraction of the value of a trust's assets is not subject to adjustment under Section 104(a) [72-34-424(1)]. Subsection (c)(3) [72-34-424(2)(c)] does not apply to any additional amount to which the beneficiary may be entitled that is expressed in terms of a right to receive income from the trust. For example, if a beneficiary is to receive a fixed annuity or the trust's income, whichever is greater, subsection (c)(3) [72-34-424(2)(c)] does not prevent a trustee from making an adjustment under Section 104(a) [72-34-424(1)] in determining the amount of the trust's income.

If subsection (c)(5), (6), (7), or (8), [72-34-424(2)(e), (2)(f), or (2)(g)] prevents a trustee from exercising the power to adjust, subsection (d) [72-34-424(3)] permits a cotrustee who is not subject to the provision to exercise the power unless the terms of the trust do not permit the cotrustee to do so.

Release of the power to adjust. Section 104(e) [72-34-424(4)] permits a trustee to release all or part of the power to adjust in circumstances in which the possession or exercise of the power might deprive the trust of a tax benefit or impose a tax burden. For example, if possessing the power would diminish the actuarial value of the income interest in a trust for which the income beneficiary's estate may be eligible to claim a credit for property previously taxed if the beneficiary dies within ten years after the death of the person creating the trust, the trustee is permitted under subsection (e) [72-34-424(4)] to release just the power to adjust from income to principal.

Trust terms that limit a power to adjust. Section 104(f) [72-34-424(6)] applies to trust provisions that limit a trustee's power to adjust. Since the power is intended to enable trustees to employ the prudent investor rule without being constrained by traditional principal and income rules, an instrument executed before the adoption of this Act whose terms describe the amount that may or must be distributed to a beneficiary by referring to the trust's income or that prohibit the invasion of principal or that prohibit equitable adjustments in general should not be construed as forbidding the use of the power to adjust under Section 104(a) [72-34-424(1)] if the need for adjustment arises because the trustee is operating under the prudent investor rule. Instruments containing such provisions that are executed after the adoption of this Act should specifically refer to the power to adjust if the settlor intends to forbid its use. See generally, Joel C. Dobris, Limits on the Doctrine of Equitable Adjustment in Sophisticated Postmortem Tax Planning, 66 Iowa L. Rev. 273 (1981).

Examples. The following examples illustrate the application of Section 104 [72-34-424]:

Example (1) - T is the successor trustee of a trust that provides income to A for life, remainder to B. T has received from the prior trustee a portfolio of financial assets invested 20% in stocks and 80% in bonds. Following the prudent investor rule, T determines that a strategy of investing the portfolio 50% in stocks and 50% in bonds has risk and return objectives that are reasonably suited to the trust, but T also determines that adopting this approach will cause the trust to receive a smaller amount of dividend and interest income. After considering the factors in Section 104(b) [72-34-424(7)], T may transfer cash from principal to income to the extent T considers it necessary to increase the amount distributed to the income beneficiary.

Example (2) - T is the trustee of a trust that requires the income to be paid to the settlor's son C for life, remainder to C's daughter D. In a period of very high inflation, T purchases bonds that pay double-digit interest and determines that a portion of the interest, which is allocated to income under Section 406 [72-34-438] of this Act, is a return of capital. In consideration of the loss of value of principal due to inflation and other factors that T considers relevant, T may transfer part of the interest to principal.

Example (3) - T is the trustee of a trust that requires the income to be paid to the settlor's sister E for life, remainder to charity F. E is a retired schoolteacher who is single and has no children. E's income from her social security, pension, and savings exceeds the amount required to provide for her accustomed standard of living. The terms of the trust permit T to invade principal to provide for E's health and to support her in her accustomed manner of living, but do not otherwise indicate that T should favor E or F. Applying the prudent investor rule, T determines that the trust assets should be invested entirely in growth stocks that produce very little dividend income. Even though it is not necessary to invade principal to maintain E's accustomed standard of living, she is entitled to receive from the trust the degree of beneficial enjoyment normally accorded a person who is the sole income beneficiary of a trust, and T may transfer cash from principal to income to provide her with that degree of enjoyment.

Example (4) - T is the trustee of a trust that is governed by the law of State X. The trust became irrevocable before State X adopted the prudent investor rule. The terms of the trust require all of the income to be paid to G for life, remainder to H, and also give T the power to invade principal for the benefit of G for "dire emergencies only." The terms of the trust limit the aggregate amount that T can distribute to G from principal during G's life to 6% of the trust's value at its inception. The trust's portfolio is invested initially 50% in stocks and 50% in bonds, but after State X adopts the prudent investor rule T determines that, to achieve suitable risk and return objectives for the trust, the assets should be invested 90% in stocks and 10% in bonds. This change increases the total return from the portfolio and decreases the dividend and interest income. Thereafter, even though G does not experience a dire emergency, T may exercise the power to adjust under Section 104(a) [72-34-424(1)] to the extent that T determines that the adjustment is from only the capital appreciation resulting from the change in the portfolio's asset allocation. If T is unable to determine the extent to which capital appreciation resulted from the change in asset allocation or is unable to maintain adequate records to determine the extent to which principal distributions to G for dire emergencies do not exceed the 6% limitation, T may not exercise the power to adjust. See Joel C. Dobris, Limits on the Doctrine of Equitable Adjustment in Sophisticated Postmortem Tax Planning, 66 Iowa L. Rev. 273 (1981).

Example (5) - T is the trustee of a trust for the settlor's child. The trust owns a diversified portfolio of marketable financial assets with a value of $600,000, and is also the sole beneficiary of the settlor's IRA, which holds a diversified portfolio of marketable financial assets with a value of $900,000. The trust receives a distribution from the IRA that is the minimum amount required to be distributed under the Internal Revenue Code, and T allocates 10% of the distribution to income under Section 409(c) [72-34-441(3)] of this Act. The total return on the IRA's assets exceeds the amount distributed to the trust, and the value of the IRA at the end of the year is more than its value at the beginning of the year. Relevant factors that T may consider in determining whether to exercise the power to adjust and the extent to which an adjustment should be made to comply with Section 103(b) [72-34-423(2)] include the total return from all of the trust's assets, those owned directly as well as its interest in the IRA, the extent to which the trust will be subject to income tax on the portion of the IRA distribution that is allocated to principal, and the extent to which the income beneficiary will be subject to income tax on the amount that T distributes to the income beneficiary.

Example (6) - T is the trustee of a trust whose portfolio includes a large parcel of undeveloped real estate. T pays real property taxes on the undeveloped parcel from income each year pursuant to Section 501(3) [72-34-448(3)]. After considering the return from the trust's portfolio as a whole and other relevant factors described in Section 104(b) [72-34-424(7)], T may exercise the power to adjust under Section 104(a) [72-34-424(1)] to transfer cash from principal to income in order to distribute to the income beneficiary an amount that T considers necessary to comply with Section 103(b) [72-34-423(2)].

Example (7) - T is the trustee of a trust whose portfolio includes an interest in a mutual fund that is sponsored by T. As the manager of the mutual fund, T charges the fund a management fee that reduces the amount available to distribute to the trust by $2,000. If the fee had been paid directly by the trust, one-half of the fee would have been paid from income under Section 501(1) [72-34-448(1)] and the other one-half would have been paid from principal under Section 502(a)(1) [72-34-449(1)(a)]. After considering the total return from the portfolio as a whole and other relevant factors described in Section 104(b) [72-34-424(7)]), T may exercise its power to adjust under Section 104(a) [72-34-424(1)] by transferring $1,000, or half of the trust's proportionate share of the fee, from principal to income.

2013 Amendment: Chapter 264 in (1)(a) substituted "72-38-901" for "72-34-603"; in (3) at beginning deleted "Notwithstanding 72-33-611"; and in (7)(b) and (7)(e) substituted "settlor" for "trustor". Amendment effective October 1, 2013.

72-34-428. Rules applicable after decedent's death or termination of income interest.

Official Comments

Terminating income interests and successive income interests. A trust that provides for a single income beneficiary and an outright distribution of the remainder ends when the income interest ends. A more complex trust may have a number of income interests, either concurrent or successive, and the trust will not necessarily end when one of the income interests ends. For that reason, the Act speaks in terms of income interests ending and beginning rather than trusts ending and beginning. When an income interest in a trust ends, the trustee's powers continue during the winding up period required to complete its administration. A terminating income interest is one that has ended but whose administration is not complete.

If two or more people are given the right to receive specified percentages or fractions of the income from a trust concurrently and one of the concurrent interests ends, e.g., when a beneficiary dies, the beneficiary's income interest ends but the trust does not. Similarly, when a trust with only one income beneficiary ends upon the beneficiary's death, the trust instrument may provide that part or all of the trust assets shall continue in trust for another income beneficiary. While it is common to think and speak of this (and even to characterize it in a trust instrument) as a "new" trust, it is a continuation of the original trust for a remainder beneficiary who has an income interest in the trust assets instead of the right to receive them outright. For purposes of this Act, this is a successive income interest in the same trust. The fact that a trust may or may not end when an income interest ends is not significant for purposes of this Act.

If the assets that are subject to a terminating income interest pass to another trust because the income beneficiary exercises a general power of appointment over the trust assets, the recipient trust would be a new trust; and if they pass to another trust because the beneficiary exercises a nongeneral power of appointment over the trust assets, the recipient trust might be a new trust in some States (see 5A Austin W. Scott & William F. Fratcher, The Law of Trusts §640, at 483 (4th ed. 1989)); but for purposes of this Act a new trust created in these circumstances is also a successive income interest.

Gift of a pecuniary amount. Section 201(3) and (4) [72-34-428(2) and (4)] provide different rules for an outright gift of a pecuniary amount and a gift in trust of a pecuniary amount; this is the same approach used in Section 5(b)(2) [72-34-406(2)(b), now repealed] of the 1962 Act.

Interest on pecuniary amounts. Section 201(3) [72-34-428(2)] provides that the beneficiary of an outright pecuniary amount is to receive the interest or other amount provided by applicable law if there is no provision in the will or the terms of the trust. Many States have no applicable law that provides for interest or some other amount to be paid on an outright pecuniary gift under an inter vivos trust; this section provides that in such a case the interest or other amount to be paid shall be the same as the interest or other amount required to be paid on testamentary pecuniary gifts. This provision is intended to accord gifts under inter vivos instruments the same treatment as testamentary gifts. The various state authorities that provide for the amount that a beneficiary of an outright pecuniary amount is entitled to receive are collected in Richard B. Covey, Marital Deduction and Credit Shelter Dispositions and the Use of Formula Provisions, App. B (4th ed. 1997).

Administration expenses and interest on death taxes. Under Section 201(2)(B) [72-34-428(3)(b)] a fiduciary may pay administration expenses and interest on death taxes from either income or principal. An advantage of permitting the fiduciary to choose the source of the payment is that, if the fiduciary's decision is consistent with the decision to deduct these expenses for income tax purposes or estate tax purposes, it eliminates the need to adjust between principal and income that may arise when, for example, an expense that is paid from principal is deducted for income tax purposes or an expense that is paid from income is deducted for estate tax purposes.

The United States Supreme Court has considered the question of whether an estate tax marital deduction or charitable deduction should be reduced when administration expenses are paid from income produced by property passing in trust for a surviving spouse or for charity and deducted for income tax purposes. The Court rejected the IRS position that administration expenses properly paid from income under the terms of the trust or state law must reduce the amount of a marital or charitable transfer, and held that the value of the transferred property is not reduced for estate tax purposes unless the administration expenses are material in light of the income the trust corpus could have been expected to generate. Commissioner v. Estate of Otis C. Hubert, 117 S.Ct. 1124 (1997). The provision in Section 201(2)(B) [72-34-428(3)(b)] permits a fiduciary to pay and deduct administration expenses from income only to the extent that it will not cause the reduction or loss of an estate tax marital or charitable contributions deduction, which means that the limit on the amount payable from income will be established eventually by Treasury Regulations.

Interest on estate taxes. The IRS agrees that interest on estate and inheritance taxes may be deducted for income tax purposes without having to reduce the estate tax deduction for amounts passing to a charity or surviving spouse, whether the interest is paid from principal or income. Rev. Rul. 93-48, 93-2 C.B. 270. For estates of persons who died before 1998, a fiduciary may not want to deduct for income tax purposes interest on estate tax that is deferred under Section 6166 or 6163 because deducting that interest for estate tax purposes may produce more beneficial results, especially if the estate has little or no income or the income tax bracket is significantly lower than the estate tax bracket. For estates of persons who die after 1997, no estate tax or income tax deduction will be allowed for interest paid on estate tax that is deferred under Section 6166. However, interest on estate tax deferred under Section 6163 will continue to be deductible for both purposes, and interest on estate tax deficiencies will continue to be deductible for estate tax purposes if an election under Section 6166 is not in effect.

Under the 1962 Act, Section 13(c)(5) [72-34-416(3)(e), now repealed] charges interest on estate and inheritance taxes to principal. The 1931 Act has no provision. Section 501(3) [72-34-448(3)] of this Act provides that, except to the extent provided in Section 201(2)(B) or (C) [72-34-428(3)(b) or (3)(c), all interest must be paid from income.

Case Notes

Interpretation of Will Devising Ranch — Distribution of Income: After two siblings disputed who should receive their parents' ranch, the District Court interpreted the decedent's will to devise the entirety of the ranch to one sibling. The other sibling, who was also the personal representative of the estate, appealed, arguing that under the will he was entitled to a portion of the ranch and that the other sibling should not have been allowed to object to the proposed distribution of income from the ranch. The Supreme Court affirmed, concluding that the District Court correctly interpreted the clear intent of the decedent and that once the District Court determined that one sibling was entitled to the entire ranch, it followed that the same sibling was entitled to receive all of the income from the ranch. Ecton v. Ecton, 2013 MT 114, 370 Mont. 52, 300 P.3d 706.

Relationship to prior Acts. Section 202 [72-34-429] retains the concept in Section 5(b)(2) [72-34-406(2)(b), now repealed] of the 1962 Act that the residuary legatees of estates are to receive net income earned during the period of administration on the basis of their proportionate interests in the undistributed assets when distributions are made. It changes the basis for determining their proportionate interests by using asset values as of a date reasonably near the time of distribution instead of inventory values; it extends the application of these rules to distributions from terminating trusts; and it extends these rules to gain or loss realized from the disposition of assets during administration, an omission in the 1962 Act that has been noted by several commentators. See, e.g., Richard B. Covey, Marital Deduction and Credit Shelter Dispositions and the Use of Formula Provisions 91 (4th ed. 1998); Thomas H. Cantrill, Fractional or Percentage Residuary Bequests: Allocation of Postmortem Income, Gain and Unrealized Appreciation, 10 Prob. Notes 322, 327 (1985).

Period during which there is no beneficiary. The purpose of the second part of subsection (d) [72-34-430(4)] is to provide that, at the end of a period during which there is no beneficiary to whom a trustee may distribute income, the trustee must apply the same apportionment rules that apply when a mandatory income interest ends. This provision would apply, for example, if a settlor creates a trust for grandchildren before any grandchildren are born. When the first grandchild is born, the period preceding the date of birth is treated as having ended, followed by a successive income interest, and the apportionment rules in Sections 302 and 303 [72-34-431 and 72-34-432] apply accordingly if the terms of the trust do not contain different provisions.

72-34-431. Allocation of income receipt or disbursement.

Official Comments

Prior Acts. Professor Bogert stated that "Section 4 [72-34-405, now repealed] of the [1962] Act makes a change with respect to the apportionment of the income of trust property not due until after the trust began but which accrued in part before the commencement of the trust. It treats such income as to be credited entirely to the income account in the case of a living trust, but to be apportioned between capital and income in the case of a testamentary trust. The [1931] Act apportions such income in the case of both types of trusts, except in the case of corporate dividends." George G. Bogert, The Revised Uniform Principal and Income Act, 38 Notre Dame Law. 50, 52 (1962). The 1962 Act also provides that an asset passing to an inter vivos trust by a bequest in the settlor's will is governed by the rule that applies to a testamentary trust, so that different rules apply to assets passing to an inter vivos trust depending upon whether they were transferred to the trust during the settlor's life or by his will.

Having several different rules that apply to similar transactions is confusing. In order to simplify administration, Section 302 [72-34-431] applies the same rule to inter vivos trusts (revocable and irrevocable), testamentary trusts, and assets that become subject to an inter vivos trust by a testamentary bequest.

Periodic payments. Under Section 302 [72-34-431], a periodic payment is principal if it is due but unpaid before a decedent dies or before an asset becomes subject to a trust, but the next payment is allocated entirely to income and is not apportioned. Thus, periodic receipts such as rents, dividends, interest, and annuities, and disbursements such as the interest portion of a mortgage payment, are not apportioned. This is the original common law rule. Edwin A. Howes, Jr., The American Law Relating to Income and Principal 70 (1905). In trusts in which a surviving spouse is dependent upon a regular flow of cash from the decedent's securities portfolio, this rule will help to maintain payments to the spouse at the same level as before the settlor's death. Under the 1962 Act, the pre-death portion of the first periodic payment due after death is apportioned to principal in the case of a testamentary trust or securities bequeathed by will to an inter vivos trust.

Nonperiodic payments. Under the second sentence of Section 302(b) [72-34-431(2)], interest on an obligation that does not provide a due date for the interest payment, such as interest on an income tax refund, would be apportioned to principal to the extent it accrues before a person dies or an income interest begins unless the obligation is specifically given to a devisee or remainder beneficiary, in which case all of the accrued interest passes under Section 201(1) [72-34-428(1)] to the person who receives the obligation. The same rule applies to interest on an obligation that has a due date but does not provide for periodic payments. If there is no stated interest on the obligation, such as a zero coupon bond, and the proceeds from the obligation are received more than one year after it is purchased or acquired by the trustee, the entire amount received is principal under Section 406 [72-34-438].

72-34-432. Undistributed income — definition — payment to beneficiary.

Official Comments

Prior Acts. Both the 1931 Act (Section 4) and the 1962 Act (Section 4(d)) [72-34-405(4), now repealed] provide that a deceased income beneficiary's estate is entitled to the undistributed income. The Drafting Committee concluded that this is probably not what most settlors would want, and that, with respect to undistributed income, most settlors would favor the income beneficiary first, the remainder beneficiaries second, and the income beneficiary's heirs last, if at all. However, it decided not to eliminate this provision to avoid causing disputes about whether the trustee should have distributed collected cash before the income beneficiary died.

Accrued periodic payments. Under the prior Acts, an income beneficiary or his estate is entitled to receive a portion of any payments, other than dividends, that are due or that have accrued when the income interest terminates. The last sentence of subsection (a) [72-34-432(1)] changes that rule by providing that such items are not included in undistributed income. The items affected include periodic payments of interest, rent, and dividends, as well as items of income that accrue over a longer period of time; the rule also applies to expenses that are due or accrued.

Example - accrued periodic payments. The rules in Section 302 [72-34-431] and Section 303 [72-34-432] work in the following manner: Assume that a periodic payment of rent that is due on July 20 has not been paid when an income interest ends on July 30; the successive income interest begins on July 31, and the rent payment that was due on July 20 is paid on August 3. Under Section 302(a) [72-34-431(1)], the July 20 payment is added to the principal of the successive income interest when received. Under Section 302(b) [72-34-431(2)], the entire periodic payment of rent that is due on August 20 is income when received by the successive income interest. Under Section 303 [72-34-432], neither the income beneficiary of the terminated income interest nor the beneficiary's estate is entitled to any part of either the July 20 or the August 20 payments because neither one was received before the income interest ended on July 30. The same principles apply to expenses of the trust.

Beneficiary with an unqualified power to revoke. The requirement in subsection (b) [72-34-432(2)] to pay undistributed income to a mandatory income beneficiary or her estate does not apply to the extent the beneficiary has an unqualified power to revoke more than five percent of the trust immediately before the income interest ends. Without this exception, subsection (b) [72-34-432(2)] would apply to a revocable living trust whose settlor is the mandatory income beneficiary during her lifetime, even if her will provides that all of the assets in the probate estate are to be distributed to the trust.

If a trust permits the beneficiary to withdraw all or a part of the trust principal after attaining a specified age and the beneficiary attains that age but fails to withdraw all of the principal that she is permitted to withdraw, a trustee is not required to pay her or her estate the undistributed income attributable to the portion of the principal that she left in the trust. The assumption underlying this rule is that the beneficiary has either provided for the disposition of the trust assets (including the undistributed income) by exercising a power of appointment that she has been given or has not withdrawn the assets because she is willing to have the principal and undistributed income be distributed under the terms of the trust. If the beneficiary has the power to withdraw 25% of the trust principal, the trustee must pay to her or her estate the undistributed income from the 75% that she cannot withdraw.

72-34-433. Allocation of receipts to income or principal — entity defined.

Official Comments

Entities to which Section 401 [72-34-433] applies. The reference to partnerships in Section 401(a) [72-34-433(1)] is intended to include all forms of partnerships, including limited partnerships, limited liability partnerships, and variants that have slightly different names and characteristics from State to State. The section does not apply, however, to receipts from an interest in property that a trust owns as a tenant in common with one or more co-owners, nor would it apply to an interest in a joint venture if, under applicable law, the trust's interest is regarded as that of a tenant in common.

Capital gain dividends. Under the Internal Revenue Code and the Income Tax Regulations, a "capital gain dividend" from a mutual fund or real estate investment trust is the excess of the fund's or trust's net long-term capital gain over its net short-term capital loss. As a result, a capital gain dividend does not include any net short-term capital gain, and cash received by a trust because of a net short-term capital gain is income under this Act.

Reinvested dividends. If a trustee elects (or continues an election made by its predecessor) to reinvest dividends in shares of stock of a distributing corporation or fund, whether evidenced by new certificates or entries on the books of the distributing entity, the new shares would be principal. Making or continuing such an election would be equivalent to deciding under Section 104 [72-34-424] to transfer income to principal in order to comply with Section 103(b) [72-34-423(2)]. However, if the trustee makes or continues the election for a reason other than to comply with Section 103(b) [72-34-423(2)], e.g., to make an investment without incurring brokerage commissions, the trustee should transfer cash from principal to income in an amount equal to the reinvested dividends.

Distribution of property. The 1962 Act describes a number of types of property that would be principal if distributed by a corporation. This becomes unwieldy in a section that applies to both corporations and all other entities. By stating that principal includes the distribution of any property other than money, Section 401 [72-34-433] embraces all of the items enumerated in Section 6 [72-34-407, now repealed] of the 1962 Act as well as any other form of nonmonetary distribution not specifically mentioned in that Act.

Partial liquidations. Under subsection (d)(1) [72-34-433(4)(a)(i)], any distribution designated by the entity as a partial liquidating distribution is principal regardless of the percentage of total assets that it represents. If a distribution exceeds 20% of the entity's gross assets, the entire distribution is a partial liquidation under subsection (d)(2) [72-34-433(4)(a)(ii)] whether or not the entity describes it as a partial liquidation. In determining whether a distribution is greater than 20% of the gross assets, the portion of the distribution that does not exceed the amount of income tax that the trustee or a beneficiary must pay on the entity's taxable income is ignored.

Other large distributions. A cash distribution may be quite large (for example, more than 10% but not more than 20% of the entity's gross assets) and have characteristics that suggest it should be treated as principal rather than income. For example, an entity may have received cash from a source other than the conduct of its normal business operations because it sold an investment asset; or because it sold a business asset other than one held for sale to customers in the normal course of its business and did not replace it; or it borrowed a large sum of money and secured the repayment of the loan with a substantial asset; or a principal source of its cash was from assets such as mineral interests, 90% of which would have been allocated to principal if the trust had owned the assets directly. In such a case the trustee, after considering the total return from the portfolio as a whole and the income component of that return, may decide to exercise the power under Section 104(a) [72-34-424(1)] to make an adjustment between income and principal, subject to the limitations in Section 104(c) [72-34-424(2)].

72-34-434. Allocation of amounts received from specified trusts or estates.

Official Comments

Terms of the distributing trust or estate. Under Section 103(a) [72-34-423(1)], a trustee is to allocate receipts in accordance with the terms of the recipient trust or, if there is no provision, in accordance with this Act. However, in determining whether a distribution from another trust or an estate is income or principal, the trustee should also determine what the terms of the distributing trust or estate say about the distribution - for example, whether they direct that the distribution, even though made from the income of the distributing trust or estate, is to be added to principal of the recipient trust. Such a provision should override the terms of this Act, but if the terms of the recipient trust contain a provision requiring such a distribution to be allocated to income, the trustee may have to obtain a judicial resolution of the conflict between the terms of the two documents.

Investment trusts. An investment entity to which the second sentence of this section applies includes a mutual fund, a common trust fund, a business trust or other entity organized as a trust for the purpose of receiving capital contributed by investors, investing that capital, and managing investment assets, including asset-backed security arrangements to which Section 415 [72-34-447] applies. See John H. Langbein, The Secret Life of the Trust: The Trust as an Instrument of Commerce, 107 Yale L.J. 165 (1997).

72-34-435. Separate accounting records for business or other activity.

Official Comments

Purpose and scope. The provisions in Section 403 [72-34-435] are intended to give greater flexibility to a trustee who operates a business or other activity in proprietorship form rather than in a wholly-owned corporation (or, where permitted by state law, a single-member limited liability company), and to facilitate the trustee's ability to decide the extent to which the net receipts from the activity should be allocated to income, just as the board of directors of a corporation owned entirely by the trust would decide the amount of the annual dividend to be paid to the trust. It permits a trustee to account for farming or livestock operations, rental properties, oil and gas properties, timber operations, and activities in derivatives and options as though they were held by a separate entity. It is not intended, however, to permit a trustee to account separately for a traditional securities portfolio to avoid the provisions of this Act that apply to such securities.

Section 403 [72-34-435] permits the trustee to account separately for each business or activity for which the trustee determines separate accounting is appropriate. A trustee with a computerized accounting system may account for these activities in a "subtrust"; an individual trustee may continue to use the business and record-keeping methods employed by the decedent or transferor who may have conducted the business under an assumed name. The intent of this section is to give the trustee broad authority to select business record-keeping methods that best suit the activity in which the trustee is engaged.

If a fiduciary liquidates a sole proprietorship or other activity to which Section 403 [72-34-435] applies, the proceeds would be added to principal, even though derived from the liquidation of accounts receivable, because the proceeds would no longer be needed in the conduct of the business. If the liquidation occurs during probate or during an income interest's winding up period, none of the proceeds would be income for purposes of Section 201 [72-34-428].

Separate accounts. A trustee may or may not maintain separate bank accounts for business activities that are accounted for under Section 403 [72-34-435]. A professional trustee may decide not to maintain separate bank accounts, but an individual trustee, especially one who has continued a decedent's business practices, may continue the same banking arrangements that were used during the decedent's lifetime. In either case, the trustee is authorized to decide to what extent cash is to be retained as part of the business assets and to what extent it is to be transferred to the trust's general accounts, either as income or principal.

72-34-436. Amounts allocated to principal.

Official Comments

Eminent domain awards. Even though the award in an eminent domain proceeding may include an amount for the loss of future rent on a lease, if that amount is not separately stated the entire award is principal. The rule is the same in the 1931 and 1962 Acts.

72-34-437. Amounts received from rental property allocation.

Official Comments

Application of Section 403 [72-34-435]. This section applies to the extent that the trustee does not account separately under Section 403 [72-34-435] for the management of rental properties owned by the trust.

Receipts that are capital in nature. A portion of the payment under a lease may be a reimbursement of principal expenditures for improvements to the leased property that is characterized as rent for purposes of invoking contractual or statutory remedies for nonpayment. If the trustee is accounting for rental income under Section 405 [72-34-437], a transfer from income to reimburse principal may be appropriate under Section 504 [72-34-451] to the extent that some of the "rent" is really a reimbursement for improvements. This set of facts could also be a relevant factor for a trustee to consider under Section 104(b) [72-34-424(7)] in deciding whether and to what extent to make an adjustment between principal and income under Section 104(a) [72-34-424(1)] after considering the return from the portfolio as a whole.

72-34-438. Interest on obligation to pay money — allocation.

Official Comments

Variable or floating interest rates. The reference in subsection (a) [72-34-438(1)] to variable or floating interest rate obligations is intended to clarify that, even though an obligation's interest rate may change from time to time based upon changes in an index or other market indicator, an obligation to pay money containing a variable or floating rate provision is subject to this section and is not to be treated as a derivative financial instrument under Section 414 [72-34-446].

Discount obligations. Subsection (b) [72-34-438(2)] applies to all obligations acquired at a discount, including short-term obligations such as U.S. Treasury Bills, long-term obligations such as U.S. Savings Bonds, zero-coupon bonds, and discount bonds that pay interest during part, but not all, of the period before maturity. Under subsection (b) [72-34-438(2)], the entire increase in value of these obligations is principal when the trustee receives the proceeds from the disposition unless the obligation, when acquired, has a maturity of less than one year. In order to have one rule that applies to all discount obligations, the Act eliminates the provision in the 1962 Act for the payment from principal of an amount equal to the increase in the value of U.S. Series E bonds. The provision for bonds that mature within one year after acquisition by the trustee is derived from the Illinois act. 760 ILCS 15/8 (1996).

Subsection (b) [72-34-438(2)] also applies to inflation-indexed bonds - any increase in principal due to inflation after issuance is principal upon redemption if the bond matures more than one year after the trustee acquires it; if it matures within one year, all of the increase, including any attributable to an inflation adjustment, is income.

Effect of Section 104 [72-34-424]. In deciding whether and to what extent to exercise the power to adjust between principal and income granted by Section 104(a) [72-34-424(1)], a relevant factor for the trustee to consider is the effect on the portfolio as a whole of having a portion of the assets invested in bonds that do not pay interest currently.

72-34-440. Insubstantial allocation — allocation of entire amount to principal — exceptions.

Official Comments

This section is intended to relieve a trustee from making relatively small allocations while preserving the trustee's right to do so if an allocation is large in terms of absolute dollars.

For example, assume that a trust's assets, which include a working interest in an oil well, have a value of $1,000,000; the net income from the assets other than the working interest is $40,000; and the net receipts from the working interest are $400. The trustee may allocate all of the net receipts from the working interest to principal instead of allocating 10%, or $40, to income under Section 411 [72-34-443]. If the net receipts from the working interest are $35,000, so that the amount allocated to income under Section 411 [72-34-443] would be $3,500, the trustee may decide that this amount is sufficiently significant to the income beneficiary that the allocation provided for by Section 411 [72-34-443] should be made, even though the trustee is still permitted under Section 408 [72-34-440] to allocate all of the net receipts to principal because the $3,500 would increase the net income of $40,000, as determined before making an allocation under Section 411 [72-34-443], by less than 10%. Section 408 [72-34-440] will also relieve a trustee from having to allocate net receipts from the sale of trees in a small woodlot between principal and income.

While the allocation to principal of small amounts under this section should not be a cause for concern for tax purposes, allocations are not permitted under this section in circumstances described in Section 104(c) [72-34-424(2)] to eliminate claims that the power in this section has adverse tax consequences.

72-34-441. Payments characterized as interest or dividend — allocation to income — allocation of other payments — excess allocation to income in order to obtain estate tax marital deduction.

Official Comments

Scope. Section 409 [72-34-441] applies to amounts received under contractual arrangements that provide for payments to a third party beneficiary as a result of services rendered or property transferred to the payer. While the right to receive such payments is a liquidating asset of the kind described in Section 410 [72-34-442] (i.e., "an asset whose value will diminish or terminate because the asset is expected to produce receipts for a period of limited duration"), these payment rights are covered separately in Section 409 [72-34-441] because of their special characteristics.

Section 409 [72-34-441] applies to receipts from all forms of annuities and deferred compensation arrangements, whether the payment will be received by the trust in a lump sum or in installments over a period of years. It applies to bonuses that may be received over two or three years and payments that may last for much longer periods, including payments from an individual retirement account (IRA), deferred compensation plan (whether qualified or not qualified for special federal income tax treatment), and insurance renewal commissions. It applies to a retirement plan to which the settlor has made contributions, just as it applies to an annuity policy that the settlor may have purchased individually, and it applies to variable annuities, deferred annuities, annuities issued by commercial insurance companies, and "private annuities" arising from the sale of property to another individual or entity in exchange for payments that are to be made for the life of one or more individuals. The section applies whether the payments begin when the payment right becomes subject to the trust or are deferred until a future date, and it applies whether payments are made in cash or in kind, such as employer stock (in-kind payments usually will be made in a single distribution that will be allocated to principal under the second sentence of subsection (c)) [72-34-441(3)].

The 1962 Act. Under Section 12 [72-34-412, now repealed] of the 1962 Act, receipts from "rights to receive payments on a contract for deferred compensation" are allocated to income each year in an amount "not in excess of 5% per year" of the property's inventory value. While "not in excess of 5%" suggests that the annual allocation may range from zero to 5% of the inventory value, in practice the rule is usually treated as prescribing a 5% allocation. The inventory value is usually the present value of all the future payments, and since the inventory value is determined as of the date on which the payment right becomes subject to the trust, the inventory value, and thus the amount of the annual income allocation, depends significantly on the applicable interest rate on the decedent's date of death. That rate may be much higher or lower than the average long-term interest rate. The amount determined under the 5% formula tends to become fixed and remain unchanged even though the amount received by the trust increases or decreases.

Allocations Under Section 409(b) [72-34-441(2)]. Section 409(b) [72-34-441(2)] applies to plans whose terms characterize payments made under the plan as dividends, interest, or payments in lieu of dividends or interest. For example, some deferred compensation plans that hold debt obligations or stock of the plan's sponsor in an account for future delivery to the person rendering the services provide for the annual payment to that person of dividends received on the stock or interest received on the debt obligations. Other plans provide that the account of the person rendering the services shall be credited with "phantom" shares of stock and require an annual payment that is equivalent to the dividends that would be received on that number of shares if they were actually issued; or a plan may entitle the person rendering the services to receive a fixed dollar amount in the future and provide for the annual payment of interest on the deferred amount during the period prior to its payment. Under Section 409(b) [72-34-441(2)], payments of dividends, interest or payments in lieu of dividends or interest under plans of this type are allocated to income; all other payments received under these plans are allocated to principal.

Section 409(b) [72-34-441(2)] does not apply to an IRA or an arrangement with payment provisions similar to an IRA. IRAs and similar arrangements are subject to the provisions in Section 409(c) [72-34-441(3)].

Allocations Under Section 409(c) [72-34-441(3)]. The focus of Section 409 [72-34-441], for purposes of allocating payments received by a trust to or between principal and income, is on the payment right rather than on assets that may be held in a fund from which the payments are made. Thus, if an IRA holds a portfolio of marketable stocks and bonds, the amount received by the IRA as dividends and interest is not taken into account in determining the principal and income allocation except to the extent that the Internal Revenue Service may require them to be taken into account when the payment is received by a trust that qualifies for the estate tax marital deduction (a situation that is provided for in Section 409(d)) [72-34-441(4)]. An IRA is subject to federal income tax rules that require payments to begin by a particular date and be made over a specific number of years or a period measured by the lives of one or more persons. The payment right of a trust that is named as a beneficiary of an IRA is not a right to receive particular items that are paid to the IRA, but is instead the right to receive an amount determined by dividing the value of the IRA by the remaining number of years in the payment period. This payment right is similar to the right to receive a unitrust amount, which is normally expressed as an amount equal to a percentage of the value of the unitrust assets without regard to dividends or interest that may be received by the unitrust.

An amount received from an IRA or a plan with a payment provision similar to that of an IRA is allocated under Section 409(c) [72-34-441(3)], which differentiates between payments that are required to be made and all other payments. To the extent that a payment is required to be made (either under federal income tax rules or, in the case of a plan that is not subject to those rules, under the terms of the plan), 10% of the amount received is allocated to income and the balance is allocated to principal. All other payments are allocated to principal because they represent a change in the form of a principal asset; Section 409 [72-34-441] follows the rule in Section 404(2) [72-34-436(2)], which provides that money or property received from a change in the form of a principal asset be allocated to principal.

Section 409(c) [72-34-441(3)] produces an allocation to income that is similar to the allocation under the 1962 Act formula if the annual payments are the same throughout the payment period, and it is simpler to administer. The amount allocated to income under Section 409 [72-34-441] is not dependent upon the interest rate that is used for valuation purposes when the decedent dies, and if the payments received by the trust increase or decrease from year to year because the fund from which the payment is made increases or decreases in value, the amount allocated to income will also increase or decrease.

Marital deduction requirements. When an IRA is payable to a QTIP marital deduction trust, the IRS treats the IRA as separate terminable interest property and requires that a QTIP election be made for it. In order to qualify for QTIP treatment, an IRS ruling states that all of the IRA's income must be distributed annually to the QTIP marital deduction trust and then must be allocated to trust income for distribution to the spouse. Rev. Rul. 89-89, 1989-2 C.B. 231. If an allocation to income under this Act of 10% of the required distribution from the IRA does not meet the requirement that all of the IRA's income be distributed from the trust to the spouse, the provision in subsection (d) [72-34-441(4)] requires the trustee to make a larger allocation to income to the extent necessary to qualify for the marital deduction. The requirement of Rev. Rul. 89-89 should also be satisfied if the IRA beneficiary designation permits the spouse to require the trustee to withdraw the necessary amount from the IRA and distribute it to her, even though the spouse never actually requires the trustee to do so. If such a provision is in the beneficiary designation, a distribution under subsection (d) [72-34-441(4)] should not be necessary.

Application of Section 104 [72-34-424]. Section 104(a) [72-34-424(1)] of this Act gives a trustee who is acting under the prudent investor rule the power to adjust from principal to income if, considering the portfolio as a whole and not just receipts from deferred compensation, the trustee determines that an adjustment is necessary. See Example (5) in the Comment following Section 104 [72-34-424].

Compiler's Comments

2011 Amendment: Chapter 285 in (1)(a) inserted third sentence referring to payment from separate fund; in (1)(b) at beginning substituted ""Separate fund" includes" for "including"; deleted former (4) that read: "(4) If, to obtain an estate tax marital deduction for a trust, a trustee allocates more of a payment to income than provided by this section, the trustee shall allocate to income the additional amount necessary to obtain the marital deduction"; inserted (4), (5), (6), and (7) relating to application of section and determination of internal income; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective January 1, 2012.

Applicability — Transitional Matters: Section 3, Ch. 285, L. 2011, provided: "Section 72-34-441, as amended by [section 1], applies to a trust described in 72-34-441(4) on and after the following dates:

(1) if the trust is not funded as of [the effective date of section 1] [January 1, 2012], the date of the decedent's death;

(2) if the trust is initially funded in the calendar year beginning January 1, 2012, the date of the decedent's death; or

(3) if the trust is not described in subsection (1) or (2), January 1, 2012."

72-34-442. Receipts from liquidating assets — allocation.

Official Comments

Prior Acts. Section 11 [72-34-412] of the 1962 Act allocates receipts from "property subject to depletion" to income in an amount "not in excess of 5%" of the asset's inventory value. The 1931 Act has a similar 5% rule that applies when the trustee is under a duty to change the form of the investment. The 5% rule imposes on a trust the obligation to pay a fixed annuity to the income beneficiary until the asset is exhausted. Under both the 1931 and 1962 Acts the balance of each year's receipts is added to principal. A fixed payment can produce unfair results. The remainder beneficiary receives all of the receipts from unexpected growth in the asset, e.g., if royalties on a patent or copyright increase significantly. Conversely, if the receipts diminish more rapidly than expected, most of the amount received by the trust will be allocated to income and little to principal. Moreover, if the annual payments remain the same for the life of the asset, the amount allocated to principal will usually be less than the original inventory value. For these reasons, Section 410 [72-34-442] abandons the annuity approach under the 5% rule.

Lottery payments. The reference in subsection (a) [72-34-442(1)] to rights to receive payments under an arrangement that does not provide for the payment of interest includes state lottery prizes and similar fixed amounts payable over time that are not deferred compensation arrangements covered by Section 409 [72-34-441].

72-34-443. Receipts from mineral interests and other natural resources — allocation.

Official Comments

Prior Acts. The 1962 Act allocates to principal as a depletion allowance, 27-1/2% of the gross receipts, but not more than 50% of the net receipts after paying expenses. The Internal Revenue Code no longer provides for a 27-1/2% depletion allowance, although the major oil-producing States have retained the 27-1/2% provision in their principal and income acts (Texas amended its Act in 1993, but did not change the depletion provision). Section 9 of the 1931 Act allocates all of the net proceeds received as consideration for the "permanent severance of natural resources from the lands" to principal.

Section 411 [72-34-443] allocates 90% of the net receipts to principal and 10% to income. A depletion provision that is tied to past or present Code provisions is undesirable because it causes a large portion of the oil and gas receipts to be paid out as income. As wells are depleted, the amount received by the income beneficiary falls drastically. Allocating a larger portion of the receipts to principal enables the trustee to acquire other income producing assets that will continue to produce income when the mineral reserves are exhausted.

Application of Sections 403 and 408 [72-34-435 and 72-34-440]. This section applies to the extent that the trustee does not account separately for receipts from minerals and other natural resources under Section 403 [72-34-435] or allocate all of the receipts to principal under Section 408 [72-34-440].

Open mine doctrine. The purpose of Section 411(c) [72-34-443(3)] is to abolish the "open mine doctrine" as it may apply to the rights of an income beneficiary and a remainder beneficiary in receipts from the production of minerals from land owned or leased by a trust. Instead, such receipts are to be allocated to or between principal and income in accordance with the provisions of this Act. For a discussion of the open mine doctrine, see generally 3A Austin W. Scott & William F. Fratcher, The Law of Trusts §239.3 (4th ed. 1988), and Nutter v. Stockton, 626 P.2d 861 (Okla. 1981).

Effective date provision. Section 9(b) of the 1962 Act provides that the natural resources provision does not apply to property interests held by the trust on the effective date of the Act, which reflects concerns about the constitutionality of applying a retroactive administrative provision to interests in real estate, based on the opinion in the Oklahoma case of Franklin v. Margay Oil Corporation, 153 P.2d 486, 501 (Okla. 1944). Section 411(d) permits a trustee to use either the method provided for in this Act or the method used before the Act takes effect. Lawyers in jurisdictions other than Oklahoma may conclude that retroactivity is not a problem as to property situated in their States, and this provision permits trustees to decide, based on advice from counsel in States whose law may be different from that of Oklahoma, whether they may apply this provision retroactively if they conclude that to do so is in the best interests of the beneficiaries.

If the property is in a State other than the State where the trust is administered, the trustee must be aware that the law of the property's situs may control this question. The outcome turns on a variety of questions: whether the terms of the trust specify that the law of a State other than the situs of the property shall govern the administration of the trust, and whether the courts will follow the terms of the trust; whether the trust's asset is the land itself or a leasehold interest in the land (as it frequently is with oil and gas property); whether a leasehold interest or its proceeds should be classified as real property or personal property, and if as personal property, whether applicable state law treats it as a movable or an immovable for conflict of laws purposes. See 5A Austin W. Scott & William F. Fratcher, The Law of Trusts §§648, at 531, 533-534; §657, at 600 (4th ed. 1989).

72-34-444. Receipts from sale of timber and related products — allocation.

Official Comments

Scope of section. The rules in Section 412 [72-34-444] are intended to apply to net receipts from the sale of trees and by-products from harvesting and processing trees without regard to the kind of trees that are cut or whether the trees are cut before or after a particular number of years of growth. The rules apply to the sale of trees that are expected to produce lumber for building purposes, trees sold as pulpwood, and Christmas and other ornamental trees. Subsection (a) [72-34-444(1)] applies to net receipts from property owned by the trustee and property leased by the trustee. The Act is not intended to prevent a tenant in possession of the property from using wood that he cuts on the property for personal, noncommercial purposes, such as a Christmas tree, firewood, mending old fences or building new fences, or making repairs to structures on the property.

Under subsection (a) [72-34-444(1)], the amount of net receipts allocated to income depends upon whether the amount of timber removed is more or less than the rate of growth. The method of determining the amount of timber removed and the rate of growth is up to the trustee, based on methods customarily used for the kind of timber involved.

Application of Sections 403 and 408 [72-34-435 and 72-34-440]. This section applies to the extent that the trustee does not account separately for net receipts from the sale of timber and related products under Section 403 [72-34-435] or allocate all of the receipts to principal under Section 408 [72-34-440]. The option to account for net receipts separately under Section 403 [72-34-435] takes into consideration the possibility that timber harvesting operations may have been conducted before the timber property became subject to the trust, and that it may make sense to continue using accounting methods previously established for the property. It also permits a trustee to use customary accounting practices for timber operations even if no harvesting occurred on the property before it became subject to the trust.

72-34-445. Increasing income in order to maintain marital deduction.

Official Comments

Prior Acts' Conflict with Uniform Prudent Investor Act [Title 72, chapter 34, part 6]. Section 2(b) of the Uniform Prudent Investor Act [72-34-603(2)] provides that "[a] trustee's investment and management decisions respecting individual assets must be evaluated not in isolation but in the context of the trust portfolio as a whole . . . ." The underproductive property provisions in Section 12 [72-34-412, now repealed] of the 1962 Act and Section 11 of the 1931 Act give the income beneficiary a right to receive a portion of the proceeds from the sale of underproductive property as "delayed income." In each Act the provision applies on an asset by asset basis and not by taking into consideration the trust portfolio as a whole, which conflicts with the basic precept in Section 2(b) of the Prudent Investor Act [72-34-603(2)]. Moreover, in determining the amount of delayed income, the prior Acts do not permit a trustee to take into account the extent to which the trustee may have distributed principal to the income beneficiary, under principal invasion provisions in the terms of the trust, to compensate for insufficient income from the unproductive asset. Under Section 104(b)(7) [72-34-424(7)(g)] of this Act, a trustee must consider prior distributions of principal to the income beneficiary in deciding whether and to what extent to exercise the power to adjust conferred by Section 104(a) [72-34-424(1)].

Duty to make property productive of income. In order to implement the Uniform Prudent Investor Act [Title 72, chapter 34, part 6], this Act abolishes the right to receive delayed income from the sale proceeds of an asset that produces little or no income, but it does not alter existing state law regarding the income beneficiary's right to compel the trustee to make property productive of income. As the law continues to develop in this area, the duty to make property productive of current income in a particular situation should be determined by taking into consideration the performance of the portfolio as a whole and the extent to which a trustee makes principal distributions to the income beneficiary under the terms of the trust and adjustments between principal and income under Section 104 [72-34-424] of this Act.

Trusts for which the value of the right to receive income is important for tax reasons may be affected by Reg. §1.7520-3(b)(2)(v) Example (1), §20.7520-3(b)(2)(v) Examples (1) and (2), and §25.7520-3(b)(2)(v) Examples (1) and (2), which provide that if the income beneficiary does not have the right to compel the trustee to make the property productive, the income interest is considered unproductive and may not be valued actuarially under those sections.

Marital deduction trusts. Subsection (a) [72-34-445(1)] draws on language in Reg. §20.2056(b)-5(f)(4) and (5) to enable a trust for a spouse to qualify for a marital deduction if applicable state law is unclear about the spouse's right to compel the trustee to make property productive of income. The trustee should also consider the application of Section 104 [72-34-424] of this Act and the provisions of Restatement of Trusts 3d: Prudent Investor Rule §240, at 186, app. §240, at 252 (1992). Example (6) in the Comment to Section 104 [72-34-424] describes a situation involving the payment from income of carrying charges on unproductive real estate in which Section 104 [72-34-424] may apply.

Once the two conditions have occurred - insufficient beneficial enjoyment from the property and the spouse's demand that the trustee take action under this section - the trustee must act; but instead of the formulaic approach of the 1962 Act, which is triggered only if the trustee sells the property, this Act permits the trustee to decide whether to make the property productive of income, convert it, transfer funds from principal to income, or to take some combination of those actions. The trustee may rely on the power conferred by Section 104(a) [72-34-424(1)] to adjust from principal to income if the trustee decides that it is not feasible or appropriate to make the property productive of income or to convert the property. Given the purpose of Section 413 [72-34-445], the power under Section 104(a) [72-34-424(1)] would be exercised to transfer principal to income and not to transfer income to principal.

Section 413 [72-34-445] does not apply to a so-called "estate" trust, which will qualify for the marital deduction, even though the income may be accumulated for a term of years or for the life of the surviving spouse, if the terms of the trust require the principal and undistributed income to be paid to the surviving spouse's estate when the spouse dies. Reg. §20.2056(c)-2(b)(1)(iii).

72-34-446. Transactions in derivatives — allocations of receipts and disbursements — options to buy or sell property — allocation of amounts received or paid.

Official Comments

Scope and application. It is difficult to predict how frequently and to what extent trustees will invest directly in derivative financial instruments rather than participating indirectly through investment entities that may utilize these instruments in varying degrees. If the trust participates in derivatives indirectly through an entity, an amount received from the entity will be allocated under Section 401 [72-34-433] and not Section 414 [72-34-446]. If a trustee invests directly in derivatives to a significant extent, the expectation is that receipts and disbursements related to derivatives will be accounted for under Section 403 [72-34-435]; if a trustee chooses not to account under Section 403 [72-34-435], Section 414(b) [72-34-446(2)] provides the default rule. Certain types of option transactions in which trustees may engage are dealt with in subsection (c) [72-34-446(3)] to distinguish those transactions from ones involving options that are embedded in derivative financial instruments.

Definition of "derivative." "Derivative" is a difficult term to define because new derivatives are invented daily as dealers tailor their terms to achieve specific financial objectives for particular clients. Since derivatives are typically contract-based, a derivative can probably be devised for almost any set of objectives if another party can be found who is willing to assume the obligations required to meet those objectives.

The most comprehensive definition of derivative is in the Exposure Draft of a Proposed Statement of Financial Accounting Standards titled "Accounting for Derivative and Similar Financial Instruments and for Hedging Activities," which was released by the Financial Accounting Standards Board (FASB) on June 20, 1996 (No. 162-B). The definition in Section 414(a) [72-34-446(1)] is derived in part from the FASB definition. The purpose of the definition in subsection (a) [72-34-446(1)] is to implement the substantive rule in subsection (b) [72-34-446(2)] that provides for all receipts and disbursements to be allocated to principal to the extent the trustee elects not to account for transactions in derivatives under Section 403 [72-34-435]. As a result, it is much shorter than the FASB definition, which serves much more ambitious objectives.

A derivative is frequently described as including futures, forwards, swaps and options, terms that also require definition, and the definition in this Act avoids these terms. FASB used the same approach, explaining in paragraph 65 of the Exposure Draft:

The definition of derivative financial instrument in this Statement includes those financial instruments generally considered to be derivatives, such as forwards, futures, swaps, options, and similar instruments. The Board considered defining a derivative financial instrument by merely referencing those commonly understood instruments, similar to paragraph 5 of Statement 119, which says that "... a derivative financial instrument is a futures, forward, swap, or option contract, or other financial instrument with similar characteristics." However, the continued development of financial markets and innovative financial instruments could ultimately render a definition based on examples inadequate and obsolete. The Board, therefore, decided to base the definition of a derivative financial instrument on a description of the common characteristics of those instruments in order to accommodate the accounting for newly developed derivatives. (Footnote omitted.)

Marking to market. A gain or loss that occurs because the trustee marks securities to market or to another value during an accounting period is not a transaction in a derivative financial instrument that is income or principal under the Act - only cash receipts and disbursements, and the receipt of property in exchange for a principal asset, affect a trust's principal and income accounts.

Receipt of property other than cash. If a trustee receives property other than cash upon the settlement of a derivatives transaction, that property would be principal under Section 404(2) [72-34-436(2)].

Options. Options to which subsection (c) [72-34-446(3)] applies include an option to purchase real estate owned by the trustee and a put option purchased by a trustee to guard against a drop in value of a large block of marketable stock that must be liquidated to pay estate taxes. Subsection (c) [72-34-446(3)] would also apply to a continuing and regular practice of selling call options on securities owned by the trust if the terms of the option require delivery of the securities. It does not apply if the consideration received or given for the option is something other than cash or property, such as cross-options granted in a buy-sell agreement between owners of an entity.

2013 Amendment: Chapter 264 in (3) in last sentence substituted "settlor" for "trustor". Amendment effective October 1, 2013.

Severability: Section 161, Ch. 264, L. 2013, was a severability clause.

72-34-447. Payments from collateral financial assets and payments in exchange for interest in asset-backed security — allocation.

Official Comments

Scope of section. Typical asset-backed securities include arrangements in which debt obligations such as real estate mortgages, credit card receivables and auto loans are acquired by an investment trust and interests in the trust are sold to investors. The source for payments to an investor is the money received from principal and interest payments on the underlying debt. An asset-backed security includes an "interest only" or a "principal only" security that permits the investor to receive only the interest payments received from the bonds, mortgages or other assets that are the collateral for the asset-backed security, or only the principal payments made on those collateral assets. An asset-backed security also includes a security that permits the investor to participate in either the capital appreciation of an underlying security or in the interest or dividend return from such a security, such as the "Primes" and "Scores" issued by Americus Trust. An asset-backed security does not include an interest in a corporation, partnership, or an investment trust described in the Comment to Section 402 [72-34-434], whose assets consist significantly or entirely of investment assets. Receipts from an instrument that do not come within the scope of this section or any other section of the Act would be allocated entirely to principal under the rule in Section 103(a)(4) [72-34-423(1)(d)], and the trustee may then consider whether and to what extent to exercise the power to adjust in Section 104 [72-34-424], taking into account the return from the portfolio as whole and other relevant factors.

72-34-448. Disbursements from income.

Official Comments

Trustee fees. The regular compensation of a trustee or the trustee's agent includes compensation based on a percentage of either principal or income or both.

Insurance premiums. The reference in paragraph (4) [72-34-448(4)] to "recurring" premiums is intended to distinguish premiums paid annually for fire insurance from premiums on title insurance, each of which covers the loss of a principal asset. Title insurance premiums would be a principal disbursement under Section 502(a)(5) [72-34-449(1)(e)].

Regularly recurring taxes. The reference to "regularly recurring taxes assessed against principal" includes all taxes regularly imposed on real property and tangible and intangible personal property.

72-34-449. Disbursements from principal.

Official Comments

Environmental expenses. All environmental expenses are payable from principal, subject to the power of the trustee to transfer funds to principal from income under Section 504 [72-34-451]. However, the Drafting Committee decided that it was not necessary to broaden this provision to cover other expenditures made under compulsion of governmental authority. See generally the annotation at 43 A.L.R.4th 1012 (Duty as Between Life Tenant and Remainderman with Respect to Cost of Improvements or Repairs Made Under Compulsion of Governmental Authority).

Environmental expenses paid by a trust are to be paid from principal under Section 502(a)(7) [72-34-449(1)(g)] on the assumption that they will usually be extraordinary in nature. Environmental expenses might be paid from income if the trustee is carrying on a business that uses or sells toxic substances, in which case environmental cleanup costs would be a normal cost of doing business and would be accounted for under Section 403 [72-34-435]. In accounting under that Section, environmental costs will be a factor in determining how much of the net receipts from the business is trust income. Paying all other environmental expenses from principal is consistent with this Act's approach regarding receipts - when a receipt is not clearly a current return on a principal asset, it should be added to principal because over time both the income and remainder beneficiaries benefit from this treatment. Here, allocating payments required by environmental laws to principal imposes the detriment of those payments over time on both the income and remainder beneficiaries.

Under Sections 504(a) and 504(b)(5) [72-34-451(1) and (2)(e)], a trustee who makes or expects to make a principal disbursement for an environmental expense described in Section 502(a)(7) [72-34-449(1)(g)] is authorized to transfer an appropriate amount from income to principal to reimburse principal for disbursements made or to provide a reserve for future principal disbursements.

The first part of Section 502(a)(7) [72-34-449(1)(g)] is based upon the definition of an "environmental remediation trust" in Treas. Reg. §301.7701-4(e)(as amended in 1996). This is not because the Act applies to an environmental remediation trust, but because the definition is a useful and thoroughly vetted description of the kinds of expenses that a trustee owning contaminated property might incur. Expenses incurred to comply with environmental laws include the cost of environmental consultants, administrative proceedings and burdens of every kind imposed as the result of an administrative or judicial proceeding, even though the burden is not formally characterized as a penalty.

Title proceedings. Disbursements that are made to protect a trust's property, referred to in Section 502(a)(4) [72-34-449(1)(d)], include an "action to assure title" that is mentioned in Section 13(c)(2) [72-34-416(3)(b)(iv), now repealed] of the 1962 Act.

Insurance premiums. Insurance premiums referred to in Section 502(a)(5) [72-34-449(1)(e)] include title insurance premiums. They also include premiums on life insurance policies owned by the trust, which represent the trust's periodic investment in the insurance policy. There is no provision in the 1962 Act for life insurance premiums.

Taxes. Generation-skipping transfer taxes are payable from principal under subsection (a)(6) [72-34-449(1)(f)].

72-34-450. Assets subject to depreciation — transfer from income to principal of portion of net cash receipts.

Official Comments

Prior Acts. The 1931 Act has no provision for depreciation. Section 13(a)(2) [72-34-466(1)(b), now repealed] of the 1962 Act provides that a charge shall be made against income for ". . . a reasonable allowance for depreciation on property subject to depreciation under generally accepted accounting principles . . . ." That provision has been resisted by many trustees, who do not provide for any depreciation for a variety of reasons. One reason relied upon is that a charge for depreciation is not needed to protect the remainder beneficiaries if the value of the land is increasing; another is that generally accepted accounting principles may not require depreciation to be taken if the property is not part of a business. The Drafting Committee concluded that the decision to provide for depreciation should be discretionary with the trustee. The power to transfer funds from income to principal that is granted by this section is a discretionary power of administration referred to in Section 103(b) [72-34-423(2)], and in exercising the power a trustee must comply with Section 103(b) [72-34-423(2)].

One purpose served by transferring cash from income to principal for depreciation is to provide funds to pay the principal of an indebtedness secured by the depreciable property. Section 504(b)(4) [72-34-451(2)(d)] permits the trustee to transfer additional cash from income to principal for this purpose to the extent that the amount transferred from income to principal for depreciation is less than the amount of the principal payments.

72-34-451. Transfer from income to principal in anticipation of principal disbursement.

Official Comments

Prior Acts. The sources of Section 504 [72-34-451] are Section 13(b) [72-34-416(2), now repealed] of the 1962 Act, which permits a trustee to "regularize distributions," if charges against income are unusually large, by using "reserves or other reasonable means" to withhold sums from income distributions; Section 13(c)(3) [72-34-416(3)(c), now repealed] of the 1962 Act, which authorizes a trustee to establish an allowance for depreciation out of income if principal is used for extraordinary repairs, capital improvements and special assessments; and Section 12(3) of the 1931 Act, which permits the trustee to spread income expenses of unusual amount "throughout a series of years." Section 504 [72-34-451] contains a more detailed enumeration of the circumstances in which this authority may be used, and includes in subsection (b)(4) [72-34-451(2)(d)] the express authority to use income to make principal payments on a mortgage if the depreciation charge against income is less than the principal payments on the mortgage.

72-34-452. Payment of taxes.

Official Comments

Electing Small Business Trusts. An Electing Small Business Trust (ESBT) is a creature created by Congress in the Small Business Job Protection Act of 1996 (P.L. 104-188). For years beginning after 1996, an ESBT may qualify as an S corporation stockholder even if the trustee does not distribute all of the trust's income annually to its beneficiaries. The portion of an ESBT that consists of the S corporation stock is treated as a separate trust for tax purposes (but not for trust accounting purposes), and the S corporation income is taxed directly to that portion of the trust even if some or all of that income is distributed to the beneficiaries.

A trust normally receives a deduction for distributions it makes to its beneficiaries. Subsection (d) [72-34-452(4)] takes into account the possibility that an ESBT may not receive a deduction for trust accounting income that is distributed to the beneficiaries. Only limited guidance has been issued by the Internal Revenue Service, and it is too early to anticipate all of the technical questions that may arise, but the powers granted to a trustee in Sections 506 and 104 [72-34-453 and 72-34-424] to make adjustments are probably sufficient to enable a trustee to correct inequities that may arise because of technical problems.

2011 Amendment: Chapter 285 in (3) at end after "paid" deleted "proportionately as follows"; in (3)(a) after "allocated" inserted "only"; in (3)(b) at end after "that" deleted "both of the following apply" and after "allocated" inserted "only"; deleted former (3)(b)(ii) that read: "(ii) the trust's share of the entity's taxable income exceeds the total receipts described in subsection (3)(a) and subsection (3)(b)(i)"; inserted (3)(c) requiring payment of tax proportionately from principal and income; inserted (3)(d) requiring tax payment from principal if tax exceeds total receipts; deleted former (4) that read: "(4) For purposes of this section, receipts allocated to principal or income must be reduced by the amount distributed to a beneficiary from principal or income for which the trust receives a deduction in calculating the tax"; inserted (4) requiring adjustment of income or principal receipts when trust receives deduction for payment to beneficiary; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective January 1, 2012.

72-34-453. Adjustments between principal and income in certain cases.

Official Comments

Discretionary adjustments. Section 506(a) [72-34-453(1)] permits the fiduciary to make adjustments between income and principal because of tax law provisions. It would permit discretionary adjustments in situations like these: (1) A fiduciary elects to deduct administration expenses that are paid from principal on an income tax return instead of on the estate tax return; (2) a distribution of a principal asset to a trust or other beneficiary causes the taxable income of an estate or trust to be carried out to the distributee and relieves the persons who receive the income of any obligation to pay income tax on the income; or (3) a trustee realizes a capital gain on the sale of a principal asset and pays a large state income tax on the gain, but under applicable federal income tax rules the trustee may not deduct the state income tax payment from the capital gain in calculating the trust's federal capital gain tax, and the income beneficiary receives the benefit of the deduction for state income tax paid on the capital gain. See generally Joel C. Dobris, Limits on the Doctrine of Equitable Adjustment in Sophisticated Postmortem Tax Planning, 66 Iowa L. Rev. 273 (1981).

Section 506(a)(3) [72-34-453(1)(c)] applies to a qualified Subchapter S trust (QSST) whose income beneficiary is required to include a pro rata share of the S corporation's taxable income in his return. If the QSST does not receive a cash distribution from the corporation that is large enough to cover the income beneficiary's tax liability, the trustee may distribute additional cash from principal to the income beneficiary. In this case the retention of cash by the corporation benefits the trust principal. This situation could occur if the corporation's taxable income includes capital gain from the sale of a business asset and the sale proceeds are reinvested in the business instead of being distributed to shareholders.

Mandatory adjustment. Subsection (b) [72-34-453(2)] provides for a mandatory adjustment from income to principal to the extent needed to preserve an estate tax marital deduction or charitable contributions deduction. It is derived from New York's EPTL §11-1.2(A), which requires principal to be reimbursed by those who benefit when a fiduciary elects to deduct administration expenses on an income tax return instead of the estate tax return. Unlike the New York provision, subsection (b) [72-34-453(2)] limits a mandatory reimbursement to cases in which a marital deduction or a charitable contributions deduction is reduced by the payment of additional estate taxes because of the fiduciary's income tax election. It is intended to preserve the result reached in Estate of Britenstool v. Commissioner, 46 T.C. 711 (1966), in which the Tax Court held that a reimbursement required by the predecessor of EPTL §11-1.2(A) resulted in the estate receiving the same charitable contributions deduction it would have received if the administration expenses had been deducted for estate tax purposes instead of for income tax purposes. Because a fiduciary will elect to deduct administration expenses for income tax purposes only when the income tax reduction exceeds the estate tax reduction, the effect of this adjustment is that the principal is placed in the same position it would have occupied if the fiduciary had deducted the expenses for estate tax purposes, but the income beneficiaries receive an additional benefit. For example, if the income tax benefit from the deduction is $30,000 and the estate tax benefit would have been $20,000, principal will be reimbursed $20,000 and the net benefit to the income beneficiaries will be $10,000.

Irrevocable grantor trusts. Under Sections 671-679 of the Internal Revenue Code (the "grantor trust" provisions), a person who creates an irrevocable trust for the benefit of another person may be subject to tax on the trust's income or capital gains, or both, even though the settlor is not entitled to receive any income or principal from the trust. Because this is now a well-known tax result, many trusts have been created to produce this result, but there are also trusts that are unintentionally subject to this rule. The Act does not require or authorize a trustee to distribute funds from the trust to the settlor in these cases because it is difficult to establish a rule that applies only to trusts where this tax result is unintended and does not apply to trusts where the tax result is intended. Settlors who intend this tax result rarely state it as an objective in the terms of the trust, but instead rely on the operation of the tax law to produce the desired result. As a result it may not be possible to determine from the terms of the trust if the result was intentional or unintentional. If the drafter of such a trust wants the trustee to have the authority to distribute principal or income to the settlor to reimburse the settlor for taxes paid on the trust's income or capital gains, such a provision should be placed in the terms of the trust. In some situations the Internal Revenue Service may require that such a provision be placed in the terms of the trust as a condition to issuing a private letter ruling.

MONTANA UNIFORM TRUST CODE

Chapter Official Comments

PREFATORY NOTE

The Uniform Trust Code (2000) is the first national codification of the law of trusts. The primary stimulus to the Commissioners' drafting of the Uniform Trust Code is the greater use of trusts in recent years, both in family estate planning and in commercial transactions, both in the United States and internationally. This greater use of the trust, and consequent rise in the number of day-to-day questions involving trusts, has led to a recognition that the trust law in many States is thin. It has also led to a recognition that the existing Uniform Acts relating to trusts, while numerous, are fragmentary. The Uniform Trust Code will provide States with precise, comprehensive, and easily accessible guidance on trust law questions. On issues on which States diverge or on which the law is unclear or unknown, the Code will for the first time provide a uniform rule. The Code also contains a number of innovative provisions.

Default Rule: Most of the Uniform Trust Code consists of default rules that apply only if the terms of the trust fail to address or insufficiently cover a particular issue. Pursuant to Section 105 [72-38-105], a drafter is free to override a substantial majority of the Code's provisions. The exceptions are scheduled in Section 105(b) [72-38-105(2)].

Innovative Provisions: Much of the Uniform Trust Code is a codification of the common law of trusts. But the Code does contain a number of innovative provisions. Among the more significant are specification of the rules of trust law that are not subject to override in the trust's terms (Section 105) [72-38-105], the inclusion of a comprehensive article on representation of beneficiaries (Article 3) [Title 72, ch. 38, pt. 3], rules on trust modification and termination that will enhance flexibility (Sections 410-417) [72-38-410 through 72-38-417], and the inclusion of an article collecting the special rules pertaining to revocable trusts (Article 6) [Title 72, ch. 38, pt. 6].

Models for Drafting: While the Uniform Trust Code is the first comprehensive Uniform Act on the subject of trusts, comprehensive trust statutes are already in effect in several States. Notable examples include the statutes in California, Georgia, Indiana, Texas, and Washington, all of which were referred to in the drafting process. Most influential was the 1986 California statute, found at Division 9 of the California Probate Code (Sections 15000 et seq.), which was used by the Drafting Committee as its initial model.

Existing Uniform Laws on Trust Law Subjects: Certain older Uniform Acts are incorporated into the Uniform Trust Code. Others, addressing more specialized topics, will continue to be available for enactment in free-standing form.

The following Uniform Acts are incorporated into or otherwise superseded by the Uniform Trust Code:

Uniform Probate Code Article VII — Originally approved in 1969, Article VII has been enacted in about 15 jurisdictions. Article VII, although titled "Trust Administration," is a modest statute, addressing only a limited number of topics. Article VII is superseded by the Uniform

Trust Code. Its provisions on jurisdiction are incorporated into Article 2 of the Code, and its provision on trustee liability to persons other than beneficiaries are replaced by Section 1010.

Uniform Prudent Investor Act (1994) — This Act has been enacted in 35 jurisdictions. This Act, and variant forms enacted in a number of other States, has displaced the older "prudent man" standard, bringing trust law into line with modern investment practice. States that have enacted the Uniform Prudent Investor Act are encouraged to recodify it as part of their enactment of the Uniform Trust Code. A place for this is provided in Article 9.

Uniform Trustee Powers Act (1964) — This Act has been enacted in 16 States. The Act contains a list of specific trustee powers and deals with other selected issues, particularly relations of a trustee with persons other than beneficiaries. The Uniform Trustee Powers Act is outdated and is entirely superseded by the Uniform Trust Code, principally at Sections 815, 816, and 1012. States enacting the Uniform Trust Code should repeal their existing trustee powers legislation.

Uniform Trusts Act (1937) — This largely overlooked Act of similar name was enacted in only six States, none within the past several decades. Despite a title suggesting comprehensive coverage of its topic, this Act, like Article VII of the UPC, addresses only a limited number of topics. These include the duty of loyalty, the registration and voting of securities, and trustee liability to persons other than beneficiaries. States enacting the Uniform Trust Code should repeal this earlier namesake.

The following Uniform Acts are not affected by enactment of the Uniform Trust Code and do not need to be amended or repealed:

Uniform Common Trust Fund Act — Originally approved in 1938, this Act has been enacted in 34 jurisdictions. The Uniform Trust Code does not address the subject of common trust funds. In recent years, many banks have replaced their common trust funds with mutual funds that may also be available to non-trust customers. The Code addresses investment in mutual funds at Section 802(f).

Uniform Custodial Trust Act (1987) — This Act has been enacted in 14 jurisdictions. This Act allows standard trust provisions to be automatically incorporated into the terms of a trust simply by referring to the Act. This Act is not displaced by the Uniform Trust Code but complements it.

Uniform Management of Institutional Funds Act (1972) — This Act has been enacted in 47 jurisdictions. It governs the administration of endowment funds held by charitable, religious, and other eleemosynary institutions. The Uniform Management of Institutional Funds Act establishes a standard of prudence for use of appreciation on assets, provides specific authority for the making of investments, authorizes the delegation of this authority, and specifies a procedure, through either donor consent or court approval, for removing restrictions on the use of donated funds.

Uniform Principal and Income Act (1997) — The 1997 Uniform Principal and Income Act is a major revision of the widely enacted Uniform Act of the same name approved in 1962. Because this Act addresses issues with respect both to decedent's estates and trusts, a jurisdiction enacting the revised Uniform Principal and Income Act may wish to include it either as part of this Code or as part of its probate laws.

Uniform Probate Code — Originally approved in 1969, and enacted in close to complete form in about 20 States but influential in virtually all, the UPC overlaps with trust topics in several areas. One area of overlap, already mentioned, is UPC Article VII. Another area of overlap concerns representation of beneficiaries. UPC Section 1-403 provides principles of representation for achieving binding judicial settlements of matters involving both estates and trusts. The Uniform Trust Code refines these representation principles, and extends them to nonjudicial settlement agreements and to optional notices and consents. See Uniform Trust Code, Section 111 and Article 3. A final area of overlap between the UPC and trust law concerns rules of construction. The UPC, in Article II, Part 7, extends certain of the rules on the construction of wills to trusts and other nonprobate instruments. The Uniform Trust Code similarly extends to trusts the rules on the construction of wills. Unlike the UPC, however, the Trust Code does not prescribe the exact rules. Instead, Section 112 of the Uniform Trust Code is an optional provision applying to trusts whatever rules the enacting jurisdiction already has in place on the construction of wills.

Uniform Statutory Rule Against Perpetuities — Originally approved in 1986, this Act has been enacted in 27 jurisdictions. The Act reforms the durational limit on when property interests, including interests created under trusts, must vest or fail. The Uniform Trust Code does not limit the duration of trusts or alter the time when interests must otherwise vest, but leaves this issue to other state law. The Code may be enacted without change regardless of the status of the perpetuities law in the enacting jurisdiction.

Uniform Supervision of Trustees for Charitable Purposes Act (1954) — This Act, which has been enacted in four States, is limited to mechanisms for monitoring the actions of charitable trustees. Unlike the Uniform Trust Code, the Supervision of Trustees for Charitable Purposes Act does not address the substantive law of charitable trusts.

Uniform Testamentary Additions to Trusts Act — This Act is available in two versions: the 1960 Act, with 24 enactments; and the 1991 Act, with 20 enactments through 1999. As its name suggests, this Act validates pourover devises to trusts. Because it validates provisions in wills, it is incorporated into the Uniform Probate Code, not into the Uniform Trust Code.

Role of Restatement of Trusts: The Restatement (Second) of Trusts was approved by the American Law Institute in 1957. Work on the Restatement Third began in the late 1980s. The portion of Restatement Third relating to the prudent investor rule and other investment topics was completed and approved in 1990. A tentative draft of the portion of Restatement Third relating to the rules on the creation and validity of trusts was approved in 1996, and the portion relating to the office of trustee, trust purposes, spendthrift provisions and the rights of creditors was approved in 1999. The Uniform Trust Code was drafted in close coordination with the writing of the Restatement Third.

Overview of Uniform Trust Code

The Uniform Trust Code consists of 11 articles. The substance of the Code is focused in the first 10 articles; Article 11 is primarily an effective date provision.

Article 1 [Title 72, ch. 38, pt. 1] — General Provisions and Definitions — In addition to definitions, this article addresses miscellaneous but important topics. The Uniform Trust Code is primarily default law. A settlor, subject to certain limitations, is free to draft trust terms departing from the provisions of this Code. The settlor, if minimum contacts are present, may in addition designate the trust's principal place of administration; the trustee, if certain standards are met, may transfer the principal place of administration to another State or country. To encourage nonjudicial resolution of disputes, the Uniform Trust Code provides more certainty for when such settlements are binding. While the Code does not prescribe the exact rules to be applied to the construction of trusts, it does extend to trusts whatever rules the enacting jurisdiction has on the construction of wills. The Uniform Trust Code, although comprehensive, does not legislate on every issue. Its provisions are supplemented by the common law of trusts and principles of equity.

Article 2 [Title 72, ch. 38, pt. 2] — Judicial Proceedings — This article addresses selected issues involving judicial proceedings concerning trusts, particularly trusts having contacts with more than one State or country. The courts in the trust's principal place of administration have jurisdiction over both the trustee and the beneficiaries as to any matter relating to the trust. Optional provisions on subject-matter jurisdiction and venue are provided. The minimal coverage of this article was deliberate. The Drafting Committee concluded that most issues related to jurisdiction and procedure are not appropriate to a Trust Code, but are best left to other bodies of law.

Article 3 [Title 72, ch. 38, pt. 3] — Representation — This article deals with the representation of beneficiaries and other interested persons, both by fiduciaries (personal representatives, guardians and conservators), and through what is known as virtual representation. The representation principles of the article apply to settlement of disputes, whether by a court or nonjudicially. They apply for the giving of required notices. They apply for the giving of consents to certain actions. The article also authorizes a court to appoint a representative if the court concludes that representation of a person might otherwise be inadequate. The court may appoint a representative to represent and approve a settlement on behalf of a minor, incapacitated, or unborn person or person whose identity or location is unknown and not reasonably ascertainable.

Article 4 [Title 72, ch. 38, pt. 4] — Creation, Validity, Modification and Termination of Trust — This article specifies the requirements for creating, modifying and terminating trusts. Most of the requirements relating to creation of trusts (Sections 401 through 409) [72-38-401 through 72-38-409] track traditional doctrine, including requirements of intent, capacity, property, and valid trust purpose. The Uniform Trust Code articulates a three-part classification system for trusts: noncharitable, charitable, and honorary. Noncharitable trusts, the most common type, require an ascertainable beneficiary and a valid purpose. Charitable trusts, on the other hand, by their very nature are created to benefit the public at large. The so called honorary or purposes trust, although unenforceable at common law, is valid and enforceable under this Code despite the absence of an ascertainable beneficiary. The most common example is a trust for the care of an animal.

Sections 410 through 417 [72-38-410 through 72-38-417] provide a series of interrelated rules on when a trust may be terminated or modified other than by its express terms. The overall objective of these sections is to enhance flexibility consistent with the principle that preserving the settlor's intent is paramount. Termination or modification may be allowed upon beneficiary consent if the court concludes that the trust or a particular provision no longer serves a material purpose or if the settlor concurs; by the court in response to unanticipated circumstances or to remedy ineffective administrative terms; or by the court or trustee if the trust is of insufficient size to justify continued administration under its existing terms. Trusts may be reformed to correct a mistake of law or fact, or modified to achieve the settlor's tax objectives. Trusts may be combined or divided. Charitable trusts may be modified or terminated under cy pres to better achieve the settlor's charitable purposes.

Article 5 [Title 72, ch. 38, pt. 5] — Creditor's Claims; Spendthrift and Discretionary Trusts — This article addresses the validity of a spendthrift provision and other issues relating to the rights of creditors to reach the trust to collect a debt. To the extent a trust is protected by a spendthrift provision, a beneficiary's creditor may not reach the beneficiary's interest until distribution is made by the trustee. To the extent not protected by a spendthrift provision, a creditor can reach the beneficiary's interest, subject to the court's power to limit the award. Certain categories of claims are exempt from a spendthrift restriction, including certain governmental claims and claims for child support or alimony. Other issues addressed in this article include creditor claims against discretionary trusts; creditor claims against a settlor, whether the trust is revocable or irrevocable; and the rights of creditors when a trustee fails to make a required distribution within a reasonable time.

Article 6 [Title 72, ch. 38, pt. 6] — Revocable Trusts — This short article deals with issues of significance not totally settled under current law. The basic policy of this article and of the Uniform Trust Code in general is to treat the revocable trust as the functional equivalent of a will. The article specifies a standard of capacity, provides that a trust is presumed revocable unless its terms provide otherwise, prescribes the procedure for revocation or amendment of a revocable trust, addresses the rights of beneficiaries during the settlor's lifetime, and provides a statute of limitations on contests.

Article 7 [Title 72, ch. 38, pt. 7] — Office of Trustee — This article contains a series of default rules dealing with the office of trustee, all of which may be modified in the terms of the trust. Rules are provided on acceptance of office and bonding. The role of the cotrustee is addressed, including the extent that one cotrustee may delegate to another, and the extent to which one cotrustee can be held liable for actions of another trustee. Also covered are changes in trusteeship, including the circumstances when a vacancy must be filled, the procedure for resignation, the grounds for removal, and the process for appointing a successor trustee. Finally, standards are provided for trustee compensation and reimbursement for expenses.

Article 8 [Title 72, ch. 38, pt. 8] — Duties and Powers of Trustee — This article states the fundamental duties of a trustee and enumerates the trustee's powers. The duties listed are not new, although some of the particulars have changed over the years. This article was drafted where possible to conform to the Uniform Prudent Investor Act. The Uniform Prudent Investor Act prescribes a trustee's responsibilities with respect to the management and investment of trust property. This article also addresses a trustee's duties regarding distributions to beneficiaries.

Article 9 [Title 72, ch. 38, pt. 9] — Uniform Prudent Investor Act — This article provides a place for a jurisdiction to enact, reenact or codify its version of the Uniform Prudent Investor Act. States adopting the Uniform Trust Code which have previously enacted the Uniform Prudent Investor Act are encouraged to reenact their version of the Prudent Investor Act in this article.

Article 10 [Title 72, ch. 38, pt. 10] — Liability of Trustees and Rights of Persons Dealing With Trustees — Sections 1001 through 1009 [72-38-1001 through 72-38-1009] list the remedies for breach of trust, describe how money damages are to be determined, provide a statute of limitations on claims against a trustee, and specify other defenses, including consent of a beneficiary and recognition of and limitations on the effect of an exculpatory clause. Sections 1010 through 1013 [72-38-1010 through 72-38-1013] address trustee relations with persons other than beneficiaries. The objective is to encourage third parties to engage in commercial transactions with trustees to the same extent as if the property were not held in trust.

Article 11 [Title 72, ch. 38, pt. 11] — Miscellaneous Provisions — The Uniform Trust Code is intended to have the widest possible application, consistent with constitutional limitations. The Code applies not only to trusts created on or after the effective date, but also to trusts in existence on the date of enactment.

The Drafting Committee was assisted by numerous officially designated advisors and observers, representing an array of organizations. In addition to the American Bar Association advisors listed above, advisors and observers who attended a majority of the Drafting Committee meetings include Edward C. Halbach, Jr., Reporter, Restatement (Third) of Trust Law; Kent H. McMahan, American College of Trust and Estate Counsel; Alex Misheff, American Bankers Association; and Lawrence W. Waggoner, Reporter, Restatement (Third) of Property: Wills and Other Donative Transfers. Significant input was also received from the Joint Editorial Board for Uniform Trusts and Estates Acts and the Committee on State Laws of the American College of Trust and Estate Counsel.

Chapter Compiler's Comments

Severability: Section 161, Ch. 264, L. 2013, was a severability clause.

Effective Date: Section 163, Ch. 264, L. 2013, provided: "[This act] is effective October 1, 2013."

Application to Existing Relationships: Section 164, Ch. 264, L. 2013, provided: "(1) Except as otherwise provided in [this act], on [the effective date of this act]:

(a) [this act] applies to all trusts created before, on, or after [the effective date of this act];

(b) [this act] applies to all judicial proceedings concerning trusts commenced on or after [the effective date of this act];

(c) [this act] applies to judicial proceedings concerning trusts commenced before [the effective date of this act] unless the court finds that application of a particular provision of [this act] would substantially interfere with the effective conduct of the judicial proceedings or prejudice the rights of the parties, in which case the particular provision of [this act] does not apply and the superseded law applies;

(d) any rule of construction or presumption provided in [this act] applies to trust instruments executed before [the effective date of this act] unless there is a clear indication of a contrary intent in the terms of the trust; and

(e) an act done before [the effective date of this act] is not affected by [this act].

(2) If a right is acquired, extinguished, or barred upon the expiration of a prescribed period that has commenced to run under any other statute before [the effective date of this act], that statute continues to apply to the right even if it has been repealed or superseded." Effective October 1, 2013.

Source — Explanation of Official Comments: The text of the former Montana Trust Code (Title 72, ch. 33 through 36, MCA, now repealed) was proposed by a joint committee of the State Bar of Montana and the Montana Bankers Association and was enacted by Ch. 685, L. 1989. Professor E. Edwin Eck of the University of Montana (now University of Montana-Missoula) School of Law was the lawyer chairman of the Joint Committee on Trust Law Revision. The Committee began work in 1986 and completed its proposal in November 1987.

The former Montana Trust Code was based in substantial part on the California Trust Law, California Probate Code sections 15000 through 18201, which was adopted by California in 1986 and became operative in California on July 1, 1987. The official comments that followed each section cited the corresponding California section, if any. If the Montana section constituted a change in substance from the corresponding California provision, the official comment included a discussion of the change. If the Montana section was based upon a statute of a state other than California, that state's statute was cited in the official comment.

General Provisions, Definitions, Constructive and Resulting Trusts, and Notice of Proposed Action by Trustee

Part Official Comments

The Uniform Trust Code is primarily a default statute. Most of the Code's provisions can be overridden in the terms of the trust. The provisions not subject to override are scheduled in Section 105(b) [72-38-105(2)]. These include the duty of a trustee to act in good faith and with regard to the purposes of the trust, public policy exceptions to enforcement of spendthrift provisions, the requirements for creating a trust, and the authority of the court to modify or terminate a trust on specified grounds.

The remainder of the article specifies the scope of the Code (Section 102) [72-38-102], provides definitions (Section 103) [72-38-103], and collects provisions of importance not amenable to codification elsewhere in the Uniform Trust Code. Sections 106 [72-38-106] and 107 [72-38-107] focus on the sources of law that will govern a trust. Section 106 [72-38-106] clarifies that despite the Code's comprehensive scope, not all aspects of the law of trusts have been codified. The Uniform Trust Code is supplemented by the common law of trusts and principles of equity. Section 107 [72-38-107] addresses selection of the jurisdiction or jurisdictions whose laws will govern the trust. A settlor, absent overriding public policy concerns, is free to select the law that will determine the meaning and effect of a trust's terms.

Changing a trust's principal place of administration is sometimes desirable, particularly to lower a trust's state income tax. Such transfers are authorized in Section 108 [72-38-108]. The trustee, following notice to the "qualified beneficiaries," defined in Section 103(13) [72-38-103(16)], may without approval of court transfer the principal place of administration to another State or country if a qualified beneficiary does not object and if the transfer is consistent with the trustee's duty to administer the trust at a place appropriate to its purposes, its administration, and the interests of the beneficiaries. The settlor, if minimum contacts are present, may also designate the trust's principal place of administration.

Sections 104 [72-38-104] and 109 through 111 [72-38-109 through 72-38-111] address procedural issues. Section 104 [72-38-104] specifies when persons, particularly persons who work in organizations, are deemed to have acquired knowledge of a fact. Section 109 [72-38-109] specifies the methods for giving notice and excludes from the Code's notice requirements persons whose identity or location is unknown and not reasonably ascertainable. Section 110 [72-38-110] allows beneficiaries with remote interests to request notice of actions, such as notice of a trustee resignation, which are normally given only to the qualified beneficiaries.

Section 111 [72-38-111] ratifies the use of nonjudicial settlement agreements. While the judicial settlement procedures may be used in all court proceedings relating to the trust, the nonjudicial settlement procedures will not always be available. The terms of the trust may direct that the procedures not be used, or settlors may negate or modify them by specifying their own methods for obtaining consents. Also, a nonjudicial settlement may include only terms and conditions a court could properly approve.

The Uniform Trust Code does not prescribe the rules of construction to be applied to trusts created under the Code. The Code instead recognizes that enacting jurisdictions are likely to take a diversity of approaches, just as they have with respect to the rules of construction applicable to wills. Section 112 [72-38-112] accommodates this variation by providing that the State's specific rules on construction of wills, whatever they may be, also apply to the construction of trusts.

CASES DECIDED AFTER ADOPTION OF 1989 TRUST CODE

Date of Formation of Constructive Trust — Question of Fact — Summary Judgment Based on Statute of Limitations Reversed: Since 1884, the Roman Catholic Church has operated the St. Labre School for children of the Northern Cheyenne Tribe. Since 1952, St. Labre School has raised millions of dollars through a direct mail campaign. The tribe filed suit against the church related to the school's fundraising efforts, alleging constructive trust and unjust enrichment claims. Applying the 1989 Trust Code (now repealed), the District Court concluded that if a constructive trust had formed, it was created by law in 1952 when the school started the fundraising campaign, and that any claims arising 3 years before the filing of the lawsuit were barred by the statute of limitations. On appeal, the Supreme Court concluded that the creation of a constructive trust was a disputed material fact and therefore not appropriate for summary judgment. The court remanded the matter for the District Court to determine when the tribe's claims accrued. N. Cheyenne Tribe v. Roman Catholic Church, et al., 2013 MT 24, 368 Mont. 330, 296 P.3d 450.

Evidence of Bad Acts — No Prerequisite to Imposing Constructive Trust Under 1989 Trust Code — Summary Judgment Reversed: Since 1884, the Roman Catholic Church has operated the St. Labre School for children of the Northern Cheyenne Tribe. Since 1952, the school has raised millions of dollars through a direct mail campaign. The tribe filed suit against the church related to the school's fundraising efforts, alleging constructive trust and unjust enrichment claims. The District Court granted the church summary judgment based on its conclusion that imposition of a constructive trust required the tribe to show misconduct by the school, which the tribe had not done. Following the tribe's appeal, the Supreme Court concluded that misconduct is not a prerequisite to imposing a constructive trust. Accordingly, it reversed the District Court's grant of summary judgment and remanded the case to allow the tribe to develop its claims. N. Cheyenne Tribe v. Roman Catholic Church, et al., 2013 MT 24, 368 Mont. 330, 296 P.3d 450.

Living Trust — Definitions — Classification of Property Subject to Trust: Clifford and his wife Mary established a living trust for the benefit of their family. The trust classified property as either "marital" or "separate". Marital property transferred to the trust would become part of the marital trust estate and would go to the surviving spouse on the death of either Clifford or Mary. Separate property of either Clifford or Mary would become part of the separate trust estate and would be distributed according to the trust, with the residue going to the family bypass trust. The trust required the trustee to distribute $10,000 from Clifford's separate trust to each of his children. In order to determine whether joint bank account and certain certificates of deposit were available for distribution by the separate trust, the Supreme Court examined the terms of the trust and definitions used in the trust. Because the trust was silent as to the treatment of jointly held personal property and the definitions in the trust were ambiguous as to the terms "marital property" and "separate property", the Supreme Court relied upon external evidence to determine the intent of Clifford and Mary. The Supreme Court found that the circumstances concerning the creation and use of the accounts and certificates during their lifetime indicated an intent that the accounts and certificates were joint and not separate property, in that Clifford and Mary placed money generated by their mutual efforts into the accounts and certificates and, for at least one of the accounts, the bank had issued the passbook and statements of account in both their names. The Supreme Court held that the District Court had properly characterized Clifford and Mary's joint bank account and certificates of deposit as part of the marital trust estate and therefore not available for distribution from Clifford's separate trust estate. In re Estate of Dern, 279 M 138, 928 P2d 123, 53 St. Rep. 1087 (1996).

Living Trust — Judicial Construction of Amendment so as to Give Effect to All Provisions: Clifford and his wife Mary established a living trust for the benefit of their family. The trust documents provided that major modifications to the trust should be made through the formal amendment process but that minor modifications could be made through trust minutes. Other trust documents provided that amendments had to be made by Clifford and Mary acting together, and the first page of the trust minutes provided that instructions to successor trustees must be signed and dated by the trust settlors. The District Court found that the fourth trust minute, amending other trust documents so as to convey the 120-acre farm on which Clifford and Mary lived to Mary, to be valid and binding. The Supreme Court held that the fourth trust minute, which was signed only by Clifford, was invalid because a construction of all of the other provisions of the trust dealing with amendments and the provisions of 1-4-101 required that the fourth trust minute be signed by both Clifford and Mary. Consequently, the Supreme Court held that the farm remained in the separate property trust and was conveyed to the children of Clifford and Mary and not to Mary alone. In re Estate of Dern, 279 M 138, 928 P2d 123, 53 St. Rep. 1087 (1996).

Living Trust — Judicial Construction of Trust Documents — Determination of Share in Cotenancy: Clifford and his wife Mary established a living trust for the benefit of their family. The trust documents established a family bypass trust to be funded by the remainder of Clifford's separate trust and the remainder of Clifford's interest in the marital trust estate. All of the property in Clifford's separate trust had been bequeathed, so it was necessary to determine Clifford's interest in the marital trust estate in order to determine the amount in the family bypass trust. Expenses for Clifford's funeral were to be paid from the "trust estate", and because the only money in the "trust estate" was in the marital trust estate, the Supreme Court concluded that the funeral expenses had to be deducted from the marital trust estate. The District Court determined and the Supreme Court agreed that Clifford's interest as a cotenant in the remaining money in the marital trust estate was the interest of a joint tenant entitled under 70-1-307 to an equal share in certain accounts in a bank because there was no proof to the contrary. The Supreme Court concluded that Clifford was a joint tenant in an account at the credit union and, although there is a presumption that the shares of either a joint tenant or tenant in common are equal, Clifford's children had presented sufficient proof, through proof of unequal contributions by Clifford and Mary to the account, to rebut the presumption. The Supreme Court held that Clifford did not intend to give his unequal contribution to the credit union account to Mary as a gift but intended that his unequal contribution to the credit union account be used to fund the marital trust estate and that the marital trust estate, minus funeral expenses, costs, and attorney fees, be used as the principal of the family bypass trust for the benefit of Clifford's children. In re Estate of Dern, 279 M 138, 928 P2d 123, 53 St. Rep. 1087 (1996), followed in Tipp v. Skjelset, 285 M 274, 947 P2d 480, 54 St. Rep. 1147 (1997), and Flood v. Kalinyaprak, 2004 MT 15, 319 M 280, 84 P3d 27 (2004).

72-38-102. Scope.

Official Comments

The Uniform Trust Code, while comprehensive, applies only to express trusts. Excluded from the Code's coverage are resulting and constructive trusts, which are not express trusts but remedial devices imposed by law. For the requirements for creating an express trust and the methods by which express trusts are created, see Sections 401-402 [72-38-401 and 72-38-402]. The Code does not attempt to distinguish express trusts from other legal relationships with respect to property, such as agencies and contracts for the benefit of third parties. For the distinctions, see Restatement (Third) of Trusts §§2, 5 (Tentative Draft No. 1, approved 1996); Restatement (Second) of Trusts §§2, 5-16C (1959).

The Uniform Trust Code is directed primarily at trusts that arise in an estate planning or other donative context, but express trusts can arise in other contexts. For example, a trust created pursuant to a divorce action would be included, even though such a trust is not donative but is created pursuant to a bargained-for exchange. Commercial trusts come in numerous forms, including trusts created pursuant to a state business trust act and trusts created to administer specified funds, such as to pay a pension or to manage pooled investments. Commercial trusts are often subject to special-purpose legislation and case law, which in some respects displace the usual rules stated in this Code. See John H. Langbein, The Secret Life of the Trust: The Trust as an Instrument of Commerce, 107 Yale L.J. 165 (1997).

Express trusts also may be created by means of court judgment or decree. Examples include trusts created to hold the proceeds of personal injury recoveries and trusts created to hold the assets of a protected person in a conservatorship proceeding. See, e.g., Uniform Probate Code §5-411(a)(4).

72-38-103. Definitions.

Official Comments

A definition of "action" (paragraph (1)) [72-38-103(1)] is included for drafting convenience, to avoid having to clarify in the numerous places in the Uniform Trust Code where reference is made to an "action" by the trustee that the term includes a failure to act.

The definition of "ascertainable standard" (paragraph (2)) [72-38-103(2)] was added to the Code by a 2004 amendment. The term was previously used only in and defined in Section 814 [72-38-814]. Other 2004 amendments add the term to Sections 103(11) [72-38-103(13)] and 504 [72-38-504], necessitating the need to move the definition in Section 814 [72-38-814] to the list of defined terms in Section 103 [72-38-103] and thereby make it applicable throughout the Code.

"Beneficiary" (paragraph (3)) [72-38-103(3)] refers only to a beneficiary of a trust as defined in the Uniform Trust Code. In addition to living and ascertained individuals, beneficiaries may be unborn or unascertained. Pursuant to Section 402(b) [72-38-402(2)], a trust is valid only if a beneficiary can be ascertained now or in the future. The term "beneficiary" includes not only beneficiaries who received their interests under the terms of the trust but also beneficiaries who received their interests by other means, including by assignment, exercise of a power of appointment, resulting trust upon the failure of an interest, gap in a disposition, operation of an antilapse statute upon the predecease of a named beneficiary, or upon termination of the trust. The fact that a person incidentally benefits from the trust does not mean that the person is a beneficiary. For example, neither a trustee nor persons hired by the trustee become beneficiaries merely because they receive compensation from the trust. See Restatement (Third) of Trusts Section 48 cmt. c (Tentative Draft No. 2, approved 1999); Restatement (Second) of Trusts Section 126 cmt. c (1959).

While the holder of a power of appointment is not considered a trust beneficiary under the common law of trusts, holders of powers are classified as beneficiaries under the Uniform Trust Code. Holders of powers are included on the assumption that their interests are significant enough that they should be afforded the rights of beneficiaries. A power of appointment as used in state trust law and this Code is as defined in state property law and not federal tax law although there is considerable overlap between the two definitions.

A power of appointment is authority to designate the recipients of beneficial interests in property. See Restatement (Second) of Property: Donative Transfers Section 11.1 (1986). A power is either general or nongeneral and either presently exercisable or not presently exercisable. A general power of appointment is a power exercisable in favor of the holder of the power, the power holder's creditors, the power holder's estate, or the creditors of the power holder's estate. See Restatement (Second) of Property: Donative Transfers Section 11.4 (1986). All other powers are nongeneral. A power is presently exercisable if the power holder can currently create an interest, present or future, in an object of the power. A power of appointment is not presently exercisable if exercisable only by the power holder's will or if its exercise is not effective for a specified period of time or until occurrence of some event. See Restatement (Second) of Property: Donative Transfers Section 11.5 (1986). Powers of appointment may be held in either a fiduciary or nonfiduciary capacity. The definition of "beneficiary" excludes powers held by a trustee but not powers held by others in a fiduciary capacity.

While all categories of powers of appointment are included within the definition of "beneficiary," the Uniform Trust Code elsewhere makes distinctions among types of powers. Under Section 302 [72-38-302], the holder of a testamentary general power of appointment may represent and bind persons whose interests are subject to the power. A "power of withdrawal" (paragraph (11)) [72-38-103(13)] is defined as a presently exercisable general power of appointment other than a power exercisable by a trustee and limited by an ascertainable standard, or a power which is exercisable by another person only upon consent of the trustee or a person holding an adverse interest. The exception for a power exercisable by a trustee that is limited by an ascertainable standard was added in 2004. For a discussion of this amendment, see the comment on the 2004 Amendment to Section 504 [72-38-504], which made a related change.

The definition of "beneficiary" includes only those who hold beneficial interests in the trust. Because a charitable trust is not created to benefit ascertainable beneficiaries but to benefit the community at large (see Section 405(a)) [72-38-405(1)], persons receiving distributions from a charitable trust are not beneficiaries as that term is defined in this Code. However, pursuant to Section 110(b) [72-38-110(2)], also granted rights of a qualified beneficiary under the Code are charitable organizations expressly designated to receive distributions under the terms of a charitable trust but only if there [are] beneficial interests sufficient to satisfy the definition of qualified beneficiary for a noncharitable trust.

The Uniform Trust Code leaves certain issues concerning beneficiaries to the common law. Any person with capacity to take and hold legal title to intended trust property has capacity to be a beneficiary. See Restatement (Third) of Trusts Section 43 (Tentative Draft No. 2, approved 1999); Restatement (Second) of Trusts Sections 116-119 (1959). Except as limited by public policy, the extent of a beneficiary's interest is determined solely by the settlor's intent. See Restatement (Third) of Trusts Section 49 (Tentative Draft No. 2, approved 1999); Restatement (Second) of Trusts Sections 127-128 (1959). While most beneficial interests terminate upon a beneficiary's death, the interest of a beneficiary may devolve by will or intestate succession the same as a corresponding legal interest. See Restatement (Third) of Trusts Section 55(1) (Tentative Draft No. 2, approved 1999); Restatement (Second) of Trusts Sections 140, 142 (1959).

Under the Uniform Trust Code, when a trust has both charitable and noncharitable beneficiaries only the charitable portion qualifies as a "charitable trust" (paragraph (4)) [72-38-103(4)]. The great majority of the Code's provisions apply to both charitable and noncharitable trusts without distinction. The distinctions between the two types of trusts are found in the requirements relating to trust creation and modification. Pursuant to Sections 405 [72-38-405] and 413 [72-38-413], a charitable trust must have a charitable purpose and charitable trusts may be modified or terminated under the doctrine of cy pres. Also, Section 411 [72-38-411] allows a noncharitable trust to in certain instances be terminated by its beneficiaries while charitable trusts do not have beneficiaries in the usual sense. To the extent of these distinctions, a split-interest trust is subject to two sets of provisions, one applicable to the charitable interests, the other the noncharitable.

For discussion of the definition of "conservator" (paragraph (5)) [72-38-103(5)], see the definition of "guardian" (paragraph (7)) [72-38-103(7)].

To encourage trustees to accept and administer trusts containing real property, the Uniform Trust Code contains several provisions designed to limit exposure to possible liability for violation of "environmental law" (paragraph (6)) [72-38-103(6)]. Section 701(c)(2) [72-38-701(3)(b)] authorizes a nominated trustee to investigate trust property to determine potential liability for violation of environmental law or other law without accepting the trusteeship. Section 816(13) [72-38-816(13)] grants a trustee comprehensive and detailed powers to deal with property involving environmental risks. Section 1010(b) [72-38-1010(2)] immunizes a trustee from personal liability for violation of environmental law arising from the ownership and control of trust property.

Under the Uniform Trust Code, a "guardian" (paragraph (7)) [72-38-103(7)] makes decisions with respect to personal care; a "conservator" (paragraph (5)) [72-38-103(5)] manages property. The terminology used is that employed in Article V of the Uniform Probate Code, and in its free-standing Uniform Guardianship and Protective Proceedings Act. Enacting jurisdictions not using these terms in the defined sense should substitute their own terminology. For this reason, both terms have been placed in brackets. The definition of "guardian" accommodates those jurisdictions which allow appointment of a guardian by a parent or spouse in addition to appointment by a court. Enacting jurisdictions which allow appointment of a guardian solely by a court should delete the bracketed language "a parent, or a spouse."

The phrase "interests of the beneficiaries" (paragraph (8)) [72-38-103(9)] is used with some frequency in the Uniform Trust Code. The definition clarifies that the interests are as provided in the terms of the trust and not as determined by the beneficiaries. Absent authority to do so in the terms of the trust, Section 108 prohibits a trustee from changing a trust's principal place of administration if the transfer would violate the trustee's duty to administer the trust at a place appropriate to the interests of the beneficiaries. Section 706(b) [72-38-706(2)] conditions certain of the grounds for removing a trustee on the court's finding that removal of the trustee will best serve the interests of the beneficiaries. Section 801 [72-38-801] requires the trustee to administer the trust in the interests of the beneficiaries, and Section 802 [72-38-802] makes clear that a trustee may not place its own interests above those of the beneficiaries. Section 808(d) [72-38-808(4)] requires the holder of a power to direct who is subject to a fiduciary obligation to act with regard to the interests of the beneficiaries. Section 1002(b) [72-38-1002(2)] may impose greater liability on a cotrustee who commits a breach of trust with reckless indifference to the interests of the beneficiaries. Section 1008 invalidates an exculpatory term to the extent it relieves a trustee of liability for breach of trust committed with reckless indifference to the interests of the beneficiaries.

"Jurisdiction" (paragraph (9)) [72-38-103(10)], when used with reference to a geographic area, includes a state or country but is not necessarily so limited. Its precise scope will depend on the context in which it is used. "Jurisdiction" is used in Sections 107 [72-38-107] and 403 [72-38-403] to refer to the place whose law will govern the trust. The term is used in Section 108 [72-38-108] to refer to the trust's principal place of administration. The term is used in Section 816 [72-38-816] to refer to the place where the trustee may appoint an ancillary trustee and to the place in whose courts the trustee can bring and defend legal proceedings.

The definition of "property" (paragraph (12)) [72-38-103(15)] is intended to be as expansive as possible and to encompass anything that may be the subject of ownership. Included are choses in action, claims, and interests created by beneficiary designations under policies of insurance, financial instruments, and deferred compensation and other retirement arrangements, whether revocable or irrevocable. Any such property interest is sufficient to support creation of a trust. See Section 401 [72-38-401] comment.

Due to the difficulty of identifying beneficiaries whose interests are remote and contingent, and because such beneficiaries are not likely to have much interest in the day-to-day affairs of the trust, the Uniform Trust Code uses the concept of "qualified beneficiary" (paragraph (13)) [72-38-103(16)] to limit the class of beneficiaries to whom certain notices must be given or consents received. The definition of qualified beneficiaries is used in Section 705 [72-38-705] to define the class to whom notice must be given of a trustee resignation. The term is used in Section 813 [72-38-813] to define the class to be kept informed of the trust's administration. Section 417 [72-38-417] requires that notice be given to the qualified beneficiaries before a trust may be combined or divided. Actions which may be accomplished by the consent of the qualified beneficiaries include the appointment of a successor trustee as provided in Section 704 [72-38-704]. Prior to transferring a trust's principal place of administration, Section 108(d) [72-38-108(4)] requires that the trustee give at least 60 days notice to the qualified beneficiaries.

The qualified beneficiaries consist of the beneficiaries currently eligible to receive a distribution from the trust together with those who might be termed the first-line remaindermen. These are the beneficiaries who would become eligible to receive distributions were the event triggering the termination of a beneficiary's interest or of the trust itself to occur on the date in question. Such a terminating event will typically be the death or deaths of the beneficiaries currently eligible to receive the income. Should a qualified beneficiary be a minor, incapacitated, or unknown, or a beneficiary whose identity or location is not reasonably ascertainable, the representation and virtual representation principles of Article 3 [Title 72, ch. 38, pt. 3] may be employed, including the possible appointment by the court of a representative to represent the beneficiary's interest.

The qualified beneficiaries who take upon termination of the beneficiary's interest or of the trust can include takers in default of the exercise of a power of appointment. The term can also include the persons entitled to receive the trust property pursuant to the exercise of a power of appointment. Because the exercise of a testamentary power of appointment is not effective until the testator's death and probate of the will, the qualified beneficiaries do not include appointees under the will of a living person. Nor would the term include the objects of an unexercised inter vivos power.

Charitable trusts and trusts for a valid noncharitable purpose do not have beneficiaries in the usual sense. However, certain persons, while not technically beneficiaries, do have an interest in seeing that the trust is enforced. Section 110 [72-38-110] expands the definition of qualified beneficiaries to encompass this wider group. Section 110(b) [72-38-110(2)] grants the rights of qualified beneficiaries to charitable organizations expressly designated under the terms of a charitable trust and whose beneficial interests are sufficient to satisfy the definition of qualified beneficiary for a noncharitable trust. Section 110(c) [72-38-110(3)] also grants the rights of qualified beneficiaries to a person appointed by the terms of the trust or by the court to enforce a trust created for an animal or other noncharitable purpose. Section 110(d) [72-38-110(4)] is an optional provision granting the rights of a qualified beneficiary with respect to a charitable trust to the attorney general of the enacting jurisdiction.

The definition of "revocable" (paragraph (14)) [72-38-103(17)] clarifies that revocable trusts include only trusts whose revocation is substantially within the settlor's control. The fact that the settlor becomes incapacitated does not convert a revocable trust into an irrevocable trust. The trust remains revocable until the settlor's death or the power of revocation is released. The consequences of classifying a trust as revocable are many. The Uniform Trust Code contains provisions relating to liability of a revocable trust for payment of the settlor's debts (Section 505) [72-38-505], the standard of capacity for creating a revocable trust (Section 601) [72-38-601], the procedure for revocation (Section 602) [72-38-602], the subjecting of the beneficiaries' rights to the settlor's control (Section 603) [72-38-603], the period for contesting a revocable trust (Section 604) [72-38-604], the power of the settlor of a revocable trust to direct the actions of a trustee (Section 808(a)) [72-38-808(1)], notice to the qualified beneficiaries upon the settlor's death (Section 813(b)) [72-38-813(2)], and the liability of a trustee of a revocable trust for the obligations of a partnership of which the trustee is a general partner (Section 1011(d)) [72-38-1011(3)].

Because under Section 603(b) [72-38-603(2)] the holder of a power of withdrawal has the rights of a settlor of a revocable trust, the definition of "power of withdrawal" (paragraph (11)) [72-38-103(13)], and "revocable" (paragraph (14)) [72-38-103(17)] are similar. Both exclude individuals who can exercise their power only with the consent of the trustee or person having an adverse interest although the definition of "power of withdrawal" excludes powers subject to an ascertainable standard, a limitation which is not present in the definition of "revocable."

The definition of "settlor" (paragraph (15)) [72-38-103(18)] refers to the person who creates, or contributes property to, a trust, whether by will, self-declaration, transfer of property to another person as trustee, or exercise of a power of appointment. For the requirements for creating a trust, see Section 401 [72-38-401]. Determining the identity of the "settlor" is usually not an issue. The same person will both sign the trust instrument and fund the trust. Ascertaining the identity of the settlor becomes more difficult when more than one person signs the trust instrument or funds the trust. The fact that a person is designated as the "settlor" by the terms of the trust is not necessarily determinative. For example, the person who executes the trust instrument may be acting as the agent for the person who will be funding the trust. In that case, the person funding the trust, and not the person signing the trust instrument, will be the settlor. Should more than one person contribute to a trust, all of the contributors will ordinarily be treated as settlors in proportion to their respective contributions, regardless of which one signed the trust instrument. See Section 602(b) [72-38-602(2)].

In the case of a revocable trust employed as a will substitute, gifts to the trust's creator are sometimes made by placing the gifted property directly into the trust. To recognize that such a donor is not intended to be treated as a settlor, the definition of "settlor" excludes a contributor to a trust that is revocable by another person or over which another person has a power of withdrawal. Thus, a parent who contributes to a child's revocable trust would not be treated as one of the trust's settlors. The definition of settlor would treat the child as the sole settlor of the trust to the extent of the child's proportionate contribution. Pursuant to Section 603(b) [72-38-603(2)], the child's power of withdrawal over the trust would also result in the child being treated as the settlor with respect to the portion of the trust attributable to the parent's contribution.

Ascertaining the identity of the settlor is important for a variety of reasons. It is important for determining rights in revocable trusts. See Sections 505(a)(1), (3) [72-38-505(1)(a), (1)(c)] (creditor claims against settlor of revocable trust), 602 [72-38-602] (revocation or modification of revocable trust), and 604 [72-38-604] (limitation on contest of revocable trust). It is also important for determining rights of creditors in irrevocable trusts. See Section 505(a)(2) [72-38-505(1)(b)] (creditors of settlor can reach maximum amount trustee can distribute to settlor). While the settlor of an irrevocable trust traditionally has no continuing rights over the trust except for the right under Section 411 [72-38-411] to terminate the trust with the beneficiaries' consent, the Uniform Trust Code also authorizes the settlor of an irrevocable trust to petition for removal of the trustee and to enforce or modify a charitable trust. See Sections 405(c) [72-38-405(3)] (standing to enforce charitable trust), 413 [72-38-413] (doctrine of cy pres), and 706 [72-38-706] (removal of trustee).

"Spendthrift provision" (paragraph (16)) [72-38-103(19)] means a term of a trust which restrains the transfer of a beneficiary's interest, whether by a voluntary act of the beneficiary or by an action of a beneficiary's creditor or assignee, which at least as far as the beneficiary is concerned, would be involuntary. A spendthrift provision is valid under the Uniform Trust Code only if it restrains both voluntary and involuntary transfer. For a discussion of this requirement and the effect of a spendthrift provision in general, see Section 502 [72-38-502]. The insertion of a spendthrift provision in the terms of the trust may also constitute a material purpose sufficient to prevent termination of the trust by agreement of the beneficiaries under Section 411 [72-38-411], although the Code does not presume this result.

"Terms of a trust" (paragraph (18)) [72-38-103(21)] is a defined term used frequently in the Uniform Trust Code. While the wording of a written trust instrument is almost always the most important determinant of a trust's terms, the definition is not so limited. Oral statements, the situation of the beneficiaries, the purposes of the trust, the circumstances under which the trust is to be administered, and, to the extent the settlor was otherwise silent, rules of construction, all may have a bearing on determining a trust's meaning. See Restatement (Third) of Trusts Section 4 cmt. a (Tentative Draft No. 1, approved 1996); Restatement (Second) of Trusts Section 4 cmt. a (1959). If a trust established by order of court is to be administered as an express trust, the terms of the trust are determined from the court order as interpreted in light of the general rules governing interpretation of judgments. See Restatement (Third) of Trusts Section 4 cmt. f (Tentative Draft No. 1, approved 1996).

A manifestation of a settlor's intention does not constitute evidence of a trust's terms if it would be inadmissible in a judicial proceeding in which the trust's terms are in question. See Restatement (Third) of Trusts Section 4 cmt. b (Tentative Draft No. 1, approved 1996); Restatement (Second) of Trusts Section 4 cmt. b (1959). See also Restatement (Third) Property: Donative Transfers Sections 10.2, 11.1-11.3 (Tentative Draft No. 1, approved 1995). For example, in many states a trust of real property is unenforceable unless evidenced by a writing, although Section 407 of this Code does not so require, leaving this issue to be covered by separate statute if the enacting jurisdiction so elects. Evidence otherwise relevant to determining the terms of a trust may also be excluded under other principles of law, such as the parol evidence rule.

"Trust instrument" (paragraph (19)) [72-38-103(22)] is a subset of the definition of "terms of a trust" (paragraph (18)) [72-38-103(21)], referring to only such terms as are found in an instrument executed by the settlor. Section 403 [72-38-403] provides that a trust is validly created if created in compliance with the law of the place where the trust instrument was executed. Pursuant to Section 604(a)(2) [72-38-604(1)(b)], the contest period for a revocable trust can be shortened by providing the potential contestant with a copy of the trust instrument plus other information. Section 813(b)(1) [72-38-813(2)(a)] requires that the trustee upon request furnish a beneficiary with a copy of the trust instrument. To allow a trustee to administer a trust with some dispatch without concern about liability if the terms of a trust instrument are contradicted by evidence outside of the instrument, Section 1006 [72-38-1006] protects a trustee from liability to the extent a breach of trust resulted from reasonable reliance on those terms. Section 1013 [72-38-1013] allows a trustee to substitute a certification of trust in lieu of providing a third person with a copy of the trust instrument. Section 1106(a)(4) [Title 72, ch. 38 Chapter Compiler's Comments] provides that unless there is a clear indication of a contrary intent, rules of construction and presumptions provided in the Uniform Trust Code apply to trust instruments executed before the effective date of the Code.

The definition of "trustee" (paragraph (20)) [72-38-103(23)] includes not only the original trustee but also an additional and successor trustee as well as a cotrustee. Because the definition of trustee includes trustees of all types, any trustee, whether original or succeeding, single or cotrustee, has the powers of a trustee and is subject to the duties imposed on trustees under the Uniform Trust Code. Any natural person, including a settlor or beneficiary, has capacity to act as trustee if the person has capacity to hold title to property free of trust. See Restatement (Third) of Trusts Section 32 (Tentative Draft No. 2, approved 1999); Restatement (Second) of Trusts

Section 89 (1959). State banking statutes normally impose additional requirements before a corporation can act as trustee.

2004 Amendment. Section 103(2) [72-38-103(2)] adds a definition of "ascertainable standard." The term was formerly used only in Section 814 [72-38-814]. Other 2004 amendments add the term to Sections 103(11) [72-38-103(13)] and 504 [72-38-504]. The amendment moves into this section the definition previously found in Section 814 [72-38-814], thereby making it apply generally throughout the Code. Adding this definition required the renumbering of all subsequent definitions in the Section and corrections to cross-references to this Section throughout the Code and comments.

Section 103(11) [72-38-103(13)], the definition of "power of withdrawal," is amended to exclude a possible inference that the term includes a discretionary power in a trustee to make distributions for the trustee's own benefit which is limited by an ascertainable standard. For an explanation of the reason for this amendment, see the comment to the 2004 amendment to Section 504 [72-38-504], which addresses a related issue.

Clarifying language is added to Section 103(13) [72-38-103(16)], the definition of "qualified beneficiary," to make clear that the second category in the definition refers to termination of an interest that is not associated with termination of the trust.

CASES DECIDED AFTER ADOPTION OF 1989 TRUST CODE

Business Trust Providing for Issuance of Certificates to Beneficiaries Not Considered Legitimate Trust: A husband and wife attended a financial planning seminar, paid $2,400 for a "trust establishment kit", and created the Ruby Mountain Trust, consisting of their 500-plus-acre farm, various buildings, livestock, and personal property. Upon transfer of the property to the trust, they then issued 100 certificates of beneficial interest to themselves and their three children. They maintained a 2% interest, 98% went to the children, and the children were named beneficiaries. The trust was not irrevocable and contained no distribution clause. Following its creation, the trust hired the husband as a caretaker, paying him $20 an hour for farming and management services, and the husband and wife were authorized as comanagers to write checks against the trust account without prior approval of the trustees. The couple also entered into a lease and rental agreement with the trust under which they leased farming equipment to the trust and paid rent for continuing to live in the farmhouse. The trust paid the debt obligations of the farm, much of which was subsequently subdivided, generating over $1 million for the trust. The couple paid no gift tax when the farm was put in trust and no self-employment taxes. They adopted the fair market value of the subdivided land as the basis of the trust, later claiming that only $5,000 for each beneficiary had been distributed while the remainder of the subdivision proceeds had been reinvested in the trust by means of improvements to it, and asserted that income from the lot sales was not taxable until paid to the beneficiaries. Following an audit, the Department of Revenue took issue with the couple's land development activities, including: (1) the issuance of certificates of beneficial interest in exchange for the land; (2) the degree of control maintained by the couple over the trust corpus; and (3) the transfer of the property at a "stepped-up" basis by conducting the fair market value appraisal after the subdivision improvements when the property should have been valued at the carryover book value, i.e., the historical cost of the farmland prior to the value-added improvements, which was considered an attempt to avoid capital gains taxes. The Department disallowed the trust for tax purposes and imputed trust income and expenses to the couple's individual tax returns. STAB agreed with the Department, and the District Court affirmed. On appeal, the Supreme Court also affirmed, holding that a legitimate trust under Montana law does not include a business trust that provides for certificates to be issued to beneficiaries. Because the trust was void, transfer of property to the trust was void as well, and the trust must be disregarded for tax purposes. The couple was correctly assessed individual taxes on the trust income. Ruby Mtn. Trust v. Dept. of Revenue, 2000 MT 166, 300 M 297, 3 P3d 654, 57 St. Rep. 688 (2000).

Characteristics of Illegitimate Business Trust: A business trust that provides for certificates to be issued to beneficiaries does not constitute a legitimate trust under Montana law. Although a business trust may not have directors or officers like a corporation, the trustees may function in nearly the same manner as a corporation for business purposes. Earmarks of a business trust that are not usually found in an ordinary trust include: (1) centralized management; (2) continuity of life more typical of a business entity; (3) transferability of interests; and (4) limited personal liability. In a business trust, the relationship of the grantor to the property transferred does not differ in any material way before and after the creation of the trust. Although a taxpayer has a legal right to minimize or avoid taxes by any legal means, when the form of a transaction has not altered any cognizable economic relationships, that form will be disregarded and the tax law applied according to the substance of the transaction. In this case, plaintiffs' establishment of a business trust in an effort to avoid paying taxes by transferring personal property to the trust and issuance of units or certificates of beneficial interest, resulting in little material change in economic ownership or reality before and after creation of the trust, were properly disregarded for tax purposes, and plaintiffs were correctly held individually responsible for trust income and expenses. Ruby Mtn. Trust v. Dept. of Revenue, 2000 MT 166, 300 M 297, 3 P3d 654, 57 St. Rep. 688 (2000). See also Morrissey v. Comm'r of Internal Revenue, 296 US 344, 80 L Ed 2d 263, 56 S Ct 289 (1935), and 26 CFR 301.7701-4(b), which classifies a business trust as an abusive trust for tax purposes.

72-38-104. Knowledge.

Official Comments

This section specifies when a person is deemed to know a fact. Subsection (a) [72-38-104(1)] states the general rule. Subsection (b) [72-38-104(2)] provides a special rule dealing with notice to organizations. Pursuant to subsection (a) [72-38-104(1)], a fact is known to a person if the person had actual knowledge of the fact, received notification of it, or had reason to know of the fact's existence based on all of the circumstances and other facts known to the person at the time. Under subsection (b) [72-38-104(2)], notice to an organization is not necessarily achieved by giving notice to a branch office. Nor does the organization necessarily acquire knowledge at the moment the notice arrives in the organization's mailroom. Rather, the organization has notice or knowledge of a fact only when the information is received by an employee having responsibility to act for the trust, or would have been brought to the employee's attention had the organization exercised reasonable diligence.

"Know" is used in its defined sense in Sections 109 [72-38-109] (methods and waiver of notice), 305 [72-38-305] (appointment of representative), 604(b) [72-38-604(2)] (limitation on contest of revocable trust), 812 [72-38-812] (collecting trust property), 1009 [72-38-1009] (nonliability of trustee upon beneficiary's consent, release, or ratification), and 1012 [72-38-1012] (protection of person dealing with trustee). But as to certain actions, a person is charged with knowledge of facts the person would have discovered upon reasonable inquiry. See Section 1005 [72-38-1005] (limitation of action against trustee following report of trustee).

72-38-105. Default and mandatory rules.

Official Comments

Subsection (a) [72-38-105(1)] emphasizes that the Uniform Trust Code is primarily a default statute.

While this Code provides numerous procedural rules on which a settlor may wish to rely, the settlor is generally free to override these rules and to prescribe the conditions under which the trust is to be administered. With only limited exceptions, the duties and powers of a trustee, relations among trustees, and the rights and interests of a beneficiary are as specified in the terms of the trust. Subsection (b) [72-38-105(2)] lists the items not subject to override in the terms of the trust. Because subsection (b) [72-38-105(2)] refers specifically to other sections of the Code, enacting jurisdictions modifying these other sections may also need to modify subsection (b) [72-38-105(2)].

Subsection (b)(1) [72-38-105(2)(a)] confirms that the requirements for a trust's creation, such as the necessary level of capacity and the requirement that a trust have a legal purpose, are controlled by statute and common law, not by the settlor. For the requirements for creating a trust, see Sections 401-409 [72-38-401 through 72-38-409]. Subsection (b)(12) [72-38-105(2)(j)] makes clear that the settlor may not reduce any otherwise applicable period of limitations for commencing a judicial proceeding. See Sections 604 [72-38-604] (period of limitations for contesting validity of revocable trust), and 1005 [72-38-1005] (period of limitation on action for breach of trust). Similarly, a settlor may not so negate the responsibilities of a trustee that the trustee would no longer be acting in a fiduciary capacity. Subsection (b)(2) [72-38-105(2)(b)] provides that the terms may not eliminate a trustee's duty to act in good faith and in accordance with the purposes of the trust and the interests of the beneficiaries. For this duty, see Sections 801 [72-38-801] and 814(a) [72-38-814(1)]. Subsection (b)(3) [72-38-105(2)(c)] provides that the terms may not eliminate the requirement that a trust and its terms must be for the benefit of the beneficiaries. Subsection (b)(3) [72-38-105(2)(c)] also provides that the terms may not eliminate the requirement that the trust have a purpose that is lawful, not contrary to public policy, and possible to achieve. Subsections (b)(2)-(3) [72-38-105(2)(b) and (2)(c)] are echoed in Sections 404 [72-38-404] (trust and its terms must be for benefit of beneficiaries; trust must have a purpose that is lawful, not contrary to public policy, and possible to achieve), 801 [72-38-801] (trustee must administer trust in good faith, in accordance with its terms and purposes and the interests of the beneficiaries), 802(a) [72-38-802(1)] (trustee must administer trust solely in interests of the beneficiaries), 814 [72-38-814] (trustee must exercise discretionary power in good faith and in accordance with its terms and purposes and the interests of the beneficiaries), and 1008 [72-38-1008] (exculpatory term unenforceable to extent it relieves trustee of liability for breach of trust committed in bad faith or with reckless indifference to the purposes of the trust and the interests of the beneficiaries).

The terms of a trust may not deny a court authority to take such action as necessary in the interests of justice, including requiring that a trustee furnish bond. Subsection (b)(6), (13) [72-38-105(2)(f), (2)(k)]. Additionally, should the jurisdiction adopting this Code enact the optional provisions on subject-matter jurisdiction and venue, subsection (b)(14) [72-38-105(2)(l)] similarly provides that such provisions cannot be altered in the terms of the trust. The power of the court to modify or terminate a trust under Sections 410 through 416 [72-38-410 through 72-38-416] is not subject to variation in the terms of the trust. Subsection (b)(4) [72-38-105(2)(d)]. However, all of these Code sections involve situations which the settlor could have addressed had the settlor had sufficient foresight. These include situations where the purpose of the trust has been achieved, a mistake was made in the trust's creation, or circumstances have arisen that were not anticipated by the settlor.

Section 813 [72-38-813] imposes a general obligation to keep the beneficiaries informed as well as several specific notice requirements. Subsections (b)(8) and (b)(9) [not adopted], which were placed in brackets and made optional provisions by a 2004 amendment, specify limits on the settlor's ability to waive these information requirements. With respect to beneficiaries age 25 or older, a settlor may dispense with all of the requirements of Section 813 [72-38-813] except for the duties to inform the beneficiaries of the existence of the trust, of the identity of the trustee, and to provide a beneficiary upon request with such reports as the trustee may have prepared. Among the specific requirements that a settlor may waive include the duty to provide a beneficiary upon request with a copy of the trust instrument (Section 813(b)(1)) [72-38-813(2)(a)], and the requirement that the trustee provide annual reports to the qualified beneficiaries (Section 813(c)) [72-38-813(3)]. The furnishing of a copy of the entire trust instrument and preparation of annual reports may be required in a particular case, however, if such information is requested by a beneficiary and is reasonably related to the trust's administration.

Responding to the desire of some settlors that younger beneficiaries not know of the trust's bounty until they have reached an age of maturity and self-sufficiency, subsection (b)(8) [not adopted] allows a settlor to provide that the trustee need not even inform beneficiaries under age 25 of the existence of the trust. However, pursuant to subsection (b)(9) [not adopted], if the younger beneficiary learns of the trust and requests information, the trustee must respond. More generally, subsection (b)(9) [not adopted] prohibits a settlor from overriding the right provided to a beneficiary in Section 813(a) [72-38-813(1)] to request from the trustee of an irrevocable trust copies of trustee reports and other information reasonably related to the trust's administration.

During the drafting of the Uniform Trust Code, the drafting committee discussed and rejected a proposal that the ability of the settlor to waive required notice be based on the nature of the beneficiaries' interest and not on the beneficiaries' age. Advocates of this alternative approach concluded that a settlor should be able to waive required notices to the remainder beneficiaries, regardless of their age. Enacting jurisdictions preferring this alternative should substitute the language "adult and current or permissible distributees of trust income or principal" for the reference to "qualified beneficiaries" in subsection (b)(8) [not adopted]. They should also delete the reference to beneficiaries "who have attained the age of 25 years."

Waiver by a settlor of the trustee's duty to keep the beneficiaries informed of the trust's administration does not otherwise affect the trustee's duties. The trustee remains accountable to the beneficiaries for the trustee's actions.

Neither subsection (b)(8) nor (b)(9) [not adopted] apply to revocable trusts. The settlor of a revocable trust may waive all reporting to the beneficiaries, even in the event the settlor loses capacity. If the settlor is silent about the subject, reporting to the beneficiaries will be required upon the settlor's loss of capacity. See Section 603 [72-38-603].

In conformity with traditional doctrine, the Uniform Trust Code limits the ability of a settlor to exculpate a trustee from liability for breach of trust. The limits are specified in Section 1008 [72-38-1008]. Subsection (b)(10) [72-38-105(2)(h)] of this section provides a cross-reference. Similarly, subsection (b)(7) [72-38-105(2)(g)] provides a cross-reference to Section 708(b) [72-38-708(2)], which limits the binding effect of a provision specifying the trustee's compensation.

Finally, subsection (b)(11) [72-38-105(2)(i)] clarifies that a settlor is not free to limit the rights of third persons, such as purchasers of trust property. Subsection (b)(5) [72-38-105(2)(e)] clarifies that a settlor may not restrict the rights of a beneficiary's creditors except to the extent a spendthrift restriction is allowed as provided in Article 5 [Title 72, ch. 38, pt. 5].

2001 Amendment. By amendment in 2001, subsections (b) (3), (8) and (9) [72-38-105(2)(c); not adopted] were revised. The language in subsection (b)(3) [72-38-105(2)(c)] "that the trust have a purpose that is lawful, not contrary to public policy, and possible to achieve" is new. This addition clarifies that the settlor may not waive this common law requirement, which is codified in the Code at Section 404 [72-38-404].

Subsections (b)(8) and (9) [not adopted] formerly provided:

(8) the duty to notify the qualified beneficiaries of an irrevocable trust who have attained 25 years of age of the existence of the trust, and of their right to request trustee's reports and other information reasonably related to the administration of the trust;

(9) the duty to respond to the request of a beneficiary of an irrevocable trust for trustee's reports and other information reasonably related to the administration of a trust.

The amendment clarifies that the information requirements not subject to waiver are requirements specified in Section 813 [72-38-813] of the Code.

2003 Amendment. By amendment in 2003, subsection (b)(8) [not adopted] was revised. Under the previous provision, as amended in 2001, the presence of two "excepts" in the same sentence, the first in the introductory language to subsection (b) [not adopted] and the second at the beginning of subsection (b)(8) [not adopted], has caused considerable confusion. The revision eliminates the second "except" in (b)(8) [not adopted] without changing the meaning of the provision.

2004 Amendment. Sections 105(b)(8) and 105(b)(9) [not adopted] address the extent to which a settlor may waive trustee notices and other disclosures to beneficiaries that would otherwise be required under the Code. These subsections have generated more discussion in jurisdictions considering enactment of the UTC than have any other provisions of the Code. A majority of the enacting jurisdictions have modified these provisions but not in a consistent way. This lack of agreement and resulting variety of approaches is expected to continue as additional states enact the Code.

Placing these sections in brackets signals that uniformity is not expected. States may elect to enact these provisions without change, delete these provisions, or enact them with modifications. In Section 105(b)(9) [not adopted], an internal bracket has been added to make clear that an enacting jurisdiction may limit to the qualified beneficiaries the obligation to respond to a beneficiary's request for information.

The placing of these provisions in brackets does not mean that the Drafting Committee recommends that an enacting jurisdiction delete Sections 105(b)(8) and 105(b)(9) [not adopted]. The Committee continues to believe that Sections 105(b)(8) and (b)(9) [not adopted], enacted as is, represent the best balance of competing policy considerations. Rather, the provisions were placed in brackets out of a recognition that there is a lack of consensus on the extent to which a settlor ought to be able to waive reporting to beneficiaries, and that there is little chance that the states will enact Sections 105(b)(8) and (b)(9) [not adopted] with any uniformity.

The policy debate is succinctly stated in Joseph Kartiganer & Raymond H. Young, The UTC: Help for Beneficiaries and Their Attorneys, Prob. & Prop., Mar./April 2003, at 18, 20:

The beneficiaries' rights to information and reports are among the most important provisions in the UTC. They also are among the provisions that have attracted the most attention. The UTC provisions reflect a compromise position between opposing viewpoints.

Objections raised to beneficiaries' rights to information include the wishes of some settlors who believe that knowledge of trust benefits would not be good for younger beneficiaries, encouraging them to take up a life of ease rather than work and be productive citizens. Sometimes trustees themselves desire secrecy and freedom from interference by beneficiaries.

The policy arguments on the other side are: that the essence of the trust relationship is accounting to the beneficiaries; that it is wise administration to account and inform beneficiaries, to avoid the greater danger of the beneficiary learning of a breach or possible breach long after the event; and that there are practical difficulties with secrecy (for example, the trustee must tell a child that he or she is not eligible for financial aid at college because the trust will pay, and must determine whether to accumulate income at high income tax rates or pay it out for inclusion in the beneficiary's own return). Furthermore, there is the practical advantage of a one-year statute of limitations when the beneficiary is informed of the trust transactions and advised of the bar if no claim is made within the year. UTC §§1005. In the absence of notice, the trustee is exposed to liability until five years after the trustee ceases to serve, the interests of beneficiaries end, or the trust terminates. UTC §§1005(c).

2005 Amendment. Subsection (b)(2) [72-38-105(2)(b)] is revised to make the language consistent with the corresponding duties in Sections 801 [72-38-801] and 814(a) [72-38-814(1)], which require that a trustee act in good faith and in accordance with the terms and purposes of the trust and the interests of the beneficiaries. Previously, subsection (b)(2) [72-38-105(2)(b)] provided that the settlor could not waive the duty of a trustee to act in good faith and in accordance with the purposes of the trust. The amendment adds that also cannot waive the obligation to act in accordance with the terms of the trust and the interests of the beneficiaries.

The purpose of the amendment is to make the language consistent, not to change the substance of the section. Absent some other restriction, a settlor is always free to specify the trust's terms to which the trustee must comply. Also, "interests of the beneficiaries" is a defined term in Section 103(8) [72-38-103(9)] meaning the beneficial interests as provided in the terms of the trust, which the settlor is also free to specify.

72-38-106. Common law of trusts — principles of equity.

Official Comments

The Uniform Trust Code codifies those portions of the law of express trusts that are most amenable to codification. The Code is supplemented by the common law of trusts, including principles of equity. To determine the common law and principles of equity in a particular state, a court should look first to prior case law in the state and then to more general sources, such as the Restatement of Trusts, Restatement (Third) of Property: Wills and Other Donative Transfers, and the Restatement of Restitution. The common law of trusts is not static but includes the contemporary and evolving rules of decision developed by the courts in exercise of their power to adapt the law to new situations and changing conditions. It also includes the traditional and broad equitable jurisdiction of the court, which the Code in no way restricts.

The statutory text of the Uniform Trust Code is also supplemented by these Comments, which, like the Comments to any Uniform Act, may be relied on as a guide for interpretation. *See Acierno v. 72-38-107. Governing law.

Official Comments

This section provides rules for determining the law that will govern the meaning and effect of particular trust terms. The law to apply to determine whether a trust has been validly created is determined under Section 403 [72-38-403].

Paragraph (1) [72-38-107(1)] allows a settlor to select the law that will govern the meaning and effect of the terms of the trust. The jurisdiction selected need not have any other connection to the trust. The settlor is free to select the governing law regardless of where the trust property may be physically located, whether it consists of real or personal property, and whether the trust was created by will or during the settlor's lifetime. This section does not attempt to specify the strong public policies sufficient to invalidate a settlor's choice of governing law. These public policies will vary depending upon the locale and may change over time.

Paragraph (2) [72-38-107(2)] provides a rule for trusts without governing law provisions - the meaning and effect of the trust's terms are to be determined by the law of the jurisdiction having the most significant relationship to the matter at issue. Factors to consider in determining the governing law include the place of the trust's creation, the location of the trust property, and the domicile of the settlor, the trustee, and the beneficiaries. See Restatement (Second) of Conflict of Laws §§270 cmt. c and 272 cmt. d (1971). Other more general factors that may be pertinent in particular cases include the relevant policies of the forum, the relevant policies of other interested jurisdictions and degree of their interest, the protection of justified expectations and certainty, and predictability and uniformity of result. See Restatement (Second) of Conflict of Laws §6 (1971). Usually, the law of the trust's principal place of administration will govern administrative matters and the law of the place having the most significant relationship to the trust's creation will govern the dispositive provisions.

This section is consistent with and was partially patterned on the Hague Convention on the Law Applicable to Trusts and on their Recognition, signed on July 1, 1985. Like this section, the Hague Convention allows the settlor to designate the governing law. Hague Convention art. 6. Absent a designation, the Convention provides that the trust is to be governed by the law of the place having the closest connection to the trust. Hague Convention art. 7. The Convention also lists particular public policies for which the forum may decide to override the choice of law that would otherwise apply. These policies are protection of minors and incapable parties, personal and proprietary effects of marriage, succession rights, transfer of title and security interests in property, protection of creditors in matters of insolvency, and, more generally, protection of third parties acting in good faith. Hague Convention art. 15.

For the authority of a settlor to designate a trust's principal place of administration, see Section 108(a) [72-38-108(1)].

72-38-108. Principal place of administration.

Official Comments

This section prescribes rules relating to a trust's principal place of administration. Locating a trust's principal place of administration will ordinarily determine which court has primary if not exclusive jurisdiction over the trust. It may also be important for other matters, such as payment of state income tax or determining the jurisdiction whose laws will govern the trust. See Section 107 [72-38-107] comment.

Because of the difficult and variable situations sometimes involved, the Uniform Trust Code does not attempt to further define principal place of administration. A trust's principal place of administration ordinarily will be the place where the trustee is located. Determining the principal place of administration becomes more difficult, however, when cotrustees are located in different states or when a single institutional trustee has trust operations in more than one state. In such cases, other factors may become relevant, including the place where the trust records are kept or trust assets held, or in the case of an institutional trustee, the place where the trust officer responsible for supervising the account is located.

A concept akin to principal place of administration is used by the Office of the Comptroller of the Currency. Reserves that national banks are required to deposit with state authorities is based on the location of the office where trust assets are primarily administered. See 12 C.F.R. Section 9.14(b).

Under the Uniform Trust Code, the fixing of a trust's principal place of administration will determine where the trustee and beneficiaries have consented to suit (Section 202) [72-38-203], and the rules for locating venue within a particular state (Section 204) [72-38-205]. It may also be considered by a court in another jurisdiction in determining whether it has jurisdiction, and if so, whether it is a convenient forum.

A settlor expecting to name a trustee or cotrustees with significant contacts in more than one state may eliminate possible uncertainty about the location of the trust's principal place of administration by specifying the jurisdiction in the terms of the trust. Under subsection (a) [72-38-108(1)], a designation in the terms of the trust is controlling if (1) a trustee is a resident of or has its principal place of business in the designated jurisdiction, or (2) all or part of the administration occurs in the designated jurisdiction. Designating the principal place of administration should be distinguished from designating the law to determine the meaning and effect of the trust's terms, as authorized by Section 107 [72-38-107]. A settlor is free to designate one jurisdiction as the principal place of administration and another to govern the meaning and effect of the trust's provisions.

Subsection (b) [72-38-108(2)] provides that a trustee is under a continuing duty to administer the trust at a place appropriate to its purposes, its administration, and the interests of the beneficiaries. "Interests of the beneficiaries," defined in Section 103(8) [72-38-103(9)], means the beneficial interests provided in the terms of the trust. Ordinarily, absent a substantial change or circumstances, the trustee may assume that the original place of administration is also the appropriate place of administration. The duty to administer the trust at an appropriate place may also dictate that the trustee not move the trust.

Subsections (c)-(f) [72-38-108(3)-(6)] provide a procedure for changing the principal place of administration to another state or country. Such changes are often beneficial. A change may be desirable to secure a lower state income tax rate, or because of relocation of the trustee or beneficiaries, the appointment of a new trustee, or a change in the location of the trust investments. The procedure for transfer specified in this section applies only in the absence of a contrary provision in the terms of the trust. See Section 105 [72-38-105]. To facilitate transfer in the typical case, where all concur that a transfer is either desirable or is at least not harmful, a transfer can be accomplished without court approval unless a qualified beneficiary objects. To allow the qualified beneficiaries sufficient time to review a proposed transfer, the trustee must give the qualified beneficiaries at least 60 days prior notice of the transfer. Notice must be given not only to qualified beneficiaries as defined in Section 103(13) [72-38-103(16)] but also to those granted the rights of qualified beneficiaries under Section 110 [72-38-110]. To assure that those receiving notice have sufficient information upon which to make a decision, minimum contents of the notice are specified. If a qualified beneficiary objects, a trustee wishing to proceed with the transfer must seek court approval.

In connection with a transfer of the principal place of administration, the trustee may transfer some or all of the trust property to a new trustee located outside of the state. The appointment of a new trustee may also be essential if the current trustee is ineligible to administer the trust in the new place. Subsection (f) [72-38-108(6)] clarifies that the appointment of the new trustee must comply with the provisions on appointment of successor trustees as provided in the terms of the trust or under Section 704 [72-38-704]. Absent an order of succession in the terms of the trust, Section 704(c) [72-38-704(3)] provides the procedure for appointment of a successor trustee of a noncharitable trust, and Section 704(d) [not adopted] the procedure for appointment of a successor trustee of a charitable trust.

While transfer of the principal place of administration will normally change the governing law with respect to administrative matters, a transfer does not normally alter the controlling law with respect to the validity of the trust and the construction of its dispositive provisions. See 5A Austin W. Scott & William F. Fratcher, The Law of Trusts Section 615 (4th ed. 1989).

72-38-109. Methods and waiver of notice.

Official Comments

Subsection (a) [72-38-109(1)] clarifies that notices under the Uniform Trust Code may be given by any method likely to result in its receipt by the person to be notified. The specific methods listed in the subsection are illustrative, not exhaustive. Subsection (b) [72-38-109(2)] relieves a trustee of responsibility for what would otherwise be an impossible task, the giving of notice to a person whose identity or location is unknown and not reasonably ascertainable by the trustee. The section does not define when a notice is deemed to have been sent or delivered or person deemed to be unknown or not reasonably ascertainable, the drafters preferring to leave this issue to the enacting jurisdiction's rules of civil procedure.

Under the Uniform Trust Code, certain actions can be taken upon unanimous consent of the beneficiaries or qualified beneficiaries. See Sections 411[72-38-411] (termination of noncharitable irrevocable trust) and 704 [72-38-704] (appointment of successor trustee). Subsection (b) [72-38-109(2)] of this section only authorizes waiver of notice. A consent required from a beneficiary in order to achieve unanimity is not waived because the beneficiary is missing. But the fact a beneficiary cannot be located may be a sufficient basis for a substitute consent to be given by another person on the beneficiary's behalf under the representation principles of Article 3 [Title 72, ch. 38, pt. 3].

To facilitate administration, subsection (c) [72-38-109(3)] allows waiver of notice by the person to be notified or sent the document. Among the notices and documents to which this subsection can be applied are notice of a proposed transfer of principal place of administration (Section 108(d)) [72-38-108(4)] or of a trustee's report (Section 813(c))[72-38-813(3)]. This subsection also applies to notice to qualified beneficiaries of a proposed trust combination or division (Section 417) [72-38-417], of a temporary assumption of duties without accepting trusteeship (Section 701(c)(1)) [72-38-701(3)(a)], and of a trustee's resignation (Section 705(a)(1)) [72-38-705(1)(a)].

Notices under the Uniform Trust Code are nonjudicial. Pursuant to subsection (d) [72-38-109(4), adopted as modified], notice of a judicial proceeding must be given as provided in the applicable rules of civil procedure [72-38-208 through 72-38-212].

72-38-110. Others treated as qualified beneficiaries.

Official Comments

Under the Uniform Trust Code, certain notices need be given only to the "qualified" beneficiaries. For the definition of "qualified beneficiary," see Section 103(13) [72-38-103(16)]. Among these notices are notice of a transfer of the trust's principal place of administration (Section 108(d)) [72-38-108(4)], notice of a trust division or combination (Section 417) [72-38-417], notice of a trustee resignation (Section 705(a)(1)) [72-38-705(1)(a)], and notice of a trustee's annual report (Section 813(c)) [72-38-813(3)]. Subsection (a) [72-38-110(1)] of this section authorizes other beneficiaries to receive one or more of these notices by filing a request for notice with the trustee.

Under the Code, certain actions, such as the appointment of a successor trustee, can be accomplished by the consent of the qualified beneficiaries. See, e.g., Section 704 [72-38-704] (filling vacancy in trusteeship). Subsection (a) [72-38-110(1)] only addresses notice, not required consent. A person who requests notice under subsection (a) [72-38-110(1)] does not thereby acquire a right to participate in actions that can be taken only upon consent of the qualified beneficiaries.

Charitable trusts do not have beneficiaries in the usual sense. However, certain persons, while not technically beneficiaries, do have an interest in seeing that the trust is enforced. In the case of a charitable trust, this includes the state's attorney general and charitable organizations expressly designated to receive distributions under the terms of the trust. Under subsection (b) [72-38-110(2)], charitable organizations expressly designated in the terms of the trust to receive distributions and who would qualify as a qualified beneficiary were the trust noncharitable, are granted the rights of qualified beneficiaries under the Code. Because the charitable organization must be expressly named in the terms of the trust and must be designated to receive distributions, excluded are organizations that might receive distributions in the trustee's discretion but that are not named in the trust's terms. Requiring that the organization have an interest similar to that of a beneficiary of a private trust also denies the rights of a qualified beneficiary to organizations holding remote remainder interests. For further discussion of the definition of "qualified beneficiary," see Section 103 [72-38-103] comment.

Subsection (c) [72-38-110(3)] similarly grants the rights of qualified beneficiaries to persons appointed by the terms of the trust or by the court to enforce a trust created for an animal or other trust with a valid purpose but no ascertainable beneficiary. For the requirements for creating such trusts, see Sections 408 and 409 [72-38-408 and 72-38-409].

"Attorney general" is placed in brackets in subsection (d) [72-38-110(4), adopted as modified] to accommodate jurisdictions which grant enforcement authority over charitable trusts to another designated official. Because states take various approaches to enforcement of charitable trusts, by a 2004 amendment subsection (d) [72-38-110(4), adopted as modified] was placed in brackets in its entirety. For a discussion, see 2004 Amendment below.

Subsection (d) [72-38-110(4), adopted as modified] does not limit other means by which the attorney general or other designated official can enforce a charitable trust.

2001 Amendment. By amendment in 2001, "charitable organization expressly designated to receive distributions" was substituted for "charitable organization expressly entitled to receive benefits" in subsection (b) [72-38-110(2)]. The amendment conforms the language of this section to terminology used elsewhere in the Code.

2004 Amendment. Subsection (b) [72-38-110(2)] is amended to better conform this provision to the Drafting Committee's intent. Charitable trusts do not have beneficiaries in the usual sense. Yet, such trusts are often created to benefit named charitable organizations. Under this amendment, which is based on the definition of qualified beneficiary in Section 103 [72-38-103], a designated charitable organization has the rights of a qualified beneficiary only if it holds an interest similar to that of a qualified beneficiary in a noncharitable trust. The effect of the amendment is to exclude charitable organizations that might receive distributions in the trustee's discretion even though not expressly mentioned in the trust's terms. Also denied the rights of qualified beneficiaries are charitable organizations that hold only remote remainder interests. The previous version of subsection (b) [72-38-110(2)] had a similar intent but the language could be read more broadly.

The placing of subsection (d) [72-38-110(4), adopted as modified] in brackets recognizes that the role of the attorney general in the enforcement of charitable trusts varies greatly in the states. In some states, the legislature may prefer that the attorney general be granted the rights of a qualified beneficiary. In other states, the attorney general may play a lesser role in enforcement. The expectation is that states considering enactment will adapt this provision to the particular role that the attorney general plays in the enforcement of charitable trusts in their state. Some states may prefer to delete this provision. Other states might provide that the attorney general has the rights of a qualified beneficiary only for trusts in which no charitable organization has been designated to receive distributions. Yet other states may prefer to enact the provision without change.

72-38-111. Nonjudicial settlement agreements.

Official Comments

While the Uniform Trust Code recognizes that a court may intervene in the administration of a trust to the extent its jurisdiction is invoked by interested persons or otherwise provided by law (see Section 201(a)) [not adopted], resolution of disputes by nonjudicial means is encouraged. This section facilitates the making of such agreements by giving them the same effect as if approved by the court. To achieve such certainty, however, subsection (c) [72-38-111(3)] requires that the nonjudicial settlement must contain terms and conditions that a court could properly approve. Under this section, a nonjudicial settlement cannot be used to produce a result not authorized by law, such as to terminate a trust in an impermissible manner.

Trusts ordinarily have beneficiaries who are minors, incapacitated, unborn or unascertained. Because such beneficiaries cannot signify their consent to an agreement, binding settlements can ordinarily be achieved only through the application of doctrines such as virtual representation or appointment of a guardian ad litem, doctrines traditionally available only in the case of judicial settlements. The effect of this section and the Uniform Trust Code more generally is to allow for such binding representation even if the agreement is not submitted for approval to a court. For the rules on representation, including appointments of representatives by the court to approve particular settlements, see Article 3 [Title 72, ch. 38, pt. 3].

Subsection (d) [72-38-111(4)] is a nonexclusive list of matters to which a nonjudicial settlement may pertain. Other matters which may be made the subject of a nonjudicial settlement are listed in the Article 3 [Title 72, ch. 38, pt. 3] General Comment. The fact that the trustee and beneficiaries may resolve a matter nonjudicially does not mean that beneficiary approval is required. For example, a trustee may resign pursuant to Section 705 [72-38-705] solely by giving notice to the qualified beneficiaries and any cotrustees. But a nonjudicial settlement between the trustee and beneficiaries will frequently prove helpful in working out the terms of the resignation.

Because of the great variety of matters to which a nonjudicial settlement may be applied, this section does not attempt to precisely define the "interested persons" whose consent is required to obtain a binding settlement as provided in subsection (a). However, the consent of the trustee would ordinarily be required to obtain a binding settlement with respect to matters involving a trustee's administration, such as approval of a trustee's report or resignation.

72-38-112. Rules of construction.

Official Comments

This section is patterned after Restatement (Third) of Trusts §25(2) and comment e (Tentative Draft No. 1, approved 1996), although this section, unlike the Restatement, also applies to irrevocable trusts. The revocable trust is used primarily as a will substitute, with its key provision being the determination of the persons to receive the trust property upon the settlor's death. Given this functional equivalence between the revocable trust and a will, the rules for interpreting the disposition of property at death should be the same whether the individual has chosen a will or revocable trust as the individual's primary estate planning instrument. Over the years, the legislatures of the States and the courts have developed a series of rules of construction reflecting the legislative or judicial understanding of how the average testator would wish to dispose of property in cases where the will is silent or insufficiently clear. Few legislatures have yet to extend these rules of construction to revocable trusts, and even fewer to irrevocable trusts, although a number of courts have done so as a matter of judicial construction. See Restatement (Third) of Trusts §25, Reporter's Notes to cmt. d and e (Tentative Draft No. 1, approved 1996).

Because of the wide variation among the States on the rules of construction applicable to wills, this Code does not attempt to prescribe the exact rules to be applied to trusts but instead adopts the philosophy of the Restatement that the rules applicable to trusts ought to be the same, whatever those rules might be. Rules of construction are not the same as constructional preferences. A constructional preference is general in nature, providing general guidance for resolving a wide variety of ambiguities. An example is a preference for a construction that results in a complete disposition and avoid illegality. Rules of construction, on the other hand, are specific in nature, providing guidance for resolving specific situations or construing specific terms. Unlike a constructional preference, a rule of construction, when applicable, can lead to only one result. See Restatement (Third) of Property: Donative Transfers §11.3 and cmt. b (Tentative Draft No. 1, approved 1995).

Rules of construction attribute intention to individual donors based on assumptions of common intention. Rules of construction are found both in enacted statutes and in judicial decisions. Rules of construction can involve the meaning to be given to particular language in the document, such as the meaning to be given to "heirs" or "issue." Rules of construction also address situations the donor failed to anticipate. These include the failure to anticipate the predecease of a beneficiary or to specify the source from which expenses are to be paid. Rules of construction can also concern assumptions as to how a donor would have revised donative documents in light of certain events occurring after execution. These include rules dealing with the effect of a divorce and whether a specific devisee will receive a substitute gift if the subject matter of the devise is disposed of during the testator's lifetime.

Instead of enacting this section, a jurisdiction enacting this Code may wish to enact detailed rules on the construction of trusts, either in addition to its rules on the construction of wills or as part of one comprehensive statute applicable to both wills and trusts. For this reason and to encourage this alternative, the section has been made optional. For possible models, see Uniform Probate Code, Article 2, Parts 7 and 8, which was added to the UPC in 1990, and California Probate Code §§21101-21630, enacted in 1994.

CASES DECIDED AFTER ADOPTION OF 1989 TRUST CODE

Interpretation of Trust Agreement — Plain Language Controls: After the death of the sole beneficiary of an irrevocable inter vivos trust, the daughter of the sole beneficiary, whom the sole beneficiary had given up for adoption, claimed that she was a descendent of the sole beneficiary as defined under the trust and was entitled to distribution of the trust proceeds. The District Court determined that the daughter should be included in the trust distribution. On appeal, the Supreme Court reversed, concluding that the trust language, which defined an adopted child as the descendant of the adopting parents, made no distinction between children adopted into and adopted out of a family. The daughter was not a descendant of the sole beneficiary because she was adopted and was therefore regarded under the plain language of the trust as the descendant of her adoptive parents. In re Kincaid Gift Trust, 2012 MT 119, 365 Mont. 179, 278 P.3d 1026.

Conflict Between Bankruptcy Discharge and Intent of Revocable Trust — Intent Controls: In 1989, the respondent executed a promissory note for $100,000 plus interest in favor of his stepsister but never made any payment on the promissory note. Later, the respondent's mother, Ms. Ward, amended her revocable trust to provide that before the respondent received any distribution from her trust, his share would be decreased, and the stepsister's share increased, by any amounts he owed the stepsister at the time of Ms. Ward's death. In 2005, the respondent filed for Chapter 7 bankruptcy. Four years later, Ms. Ward passed away and the trustee filed a petition in District Court to determine the appropriate amounts to distribute. The District Court concluded that the respondent's share should be reduced by the amount he owed his stepsister on the date of Ms. Ward's death, $298,356.16. The respondent appealed, contending that the debt had been discharged in his 2005 bankruptcy. The Supreme Court disagreed, holding that the plain language of the trust document controlled and that the bankruptcy provisions were inapplicable. In re Ward Revocable Trust, 2011 MT 308, 363 Mont. 72, 265 P.3d 1260.

Establishment of Museum From Charitable Trust Proceeds Not Considered Precatory Language Secondary to General Philanthropic Trust Purposes: Alberta Bair's will established a charitable trust and directed the board overseeing the trust proceeds to establish, improve, and maintain a museum to display the family's historical artifacts. The District Court concluded that the will language directing establishment of a museum was authorized in a precatory clause and that the board had the discretion whether to create a museum. The Supreme Court disagreed. The clear language of the trust agreement established that although the trust was created for general philanthropic purposes, the creation of a museum was the primary purpose of the trust, and the District Court committed reversible error in holding that the trust agreement did not require establishment of a museum. In re Bair Family Trust, 2008 MT 144, 343 M 138, 183 P3d 61 (2008), followed in Lane v. Caler, 2013 MT 108, 370 Mont. 30, 299 P.3d 827. 72-38-113. Insurable interest of trustee.

Official Comments

Every state requires, either as a matter of statutory or common law, that a purchaser of life insurance on another individual have an insurable interest in the life of the insured. See generally Robert H. Jerry, II & Douglas R. Richmond, Understanding Insurance Law, §§40, 43 (LexisNexis Publishing, 4 ed., 2007), at 273-77, 293-98. The definition of insurable interest became a matter of widespread concern among trust and estate planners after Chawla ex rel Giesinger v. Transamerica Occidental Life Insurance Co., 2005 WL 405405 (E.D. Va. 2005), aff'd in part, vac'd in part, 440 F.3d 639 (4th Cir. 2006), where a Virginia federal district court applying Maryland law held that a trust did not have an insurable interest in the life of the insured who was the settlor and the creator of the trust. This portion of the district court's decision was subsequently vacated by the Fourth Circuit when holding that the district court's decision should be affirmed on other grounds, but the appellate decision did not question or criticize the district court's insurable interest analysis. The Maryland legislature subsequently enacted a statute in the state's insurance code clarifying the circumstances when a trustee or trust has an insurable interest in another's life, and several other states have enacted various forms of statutory clarification designed to address the "Chawla problem." During this process, the American College of Trust and Estate Counsel, among others, expressed the opinion that it would be best if a uniform approach could be fashioned in resolving the matter.

Consequently, the Uniform Law Commission, after studying the issue, decided to clarify the issue with respect to the Uniform Trust Code (UTC) and established a drafting committee for that purpose. The drafting committee, consisting of knowledgeable Conference members, was assisted by representatives from the American Bar Association, the American College of Trust and Estate Counsel, and the American Council of Life Insurers, consumer advocates, and other interested parties. This amendment resulted from their efforts and is designed to be inserted at the end of Article 1 of the UTC as Section 113 [72-38-113]. In keeping with the charge to the committee, the purpose of the amendment is to clarify when, for purposes of the Code, a trustee has an insurable interest in an individual whose life is to be the subject of an insurance policy to fund the trust. Clarification of this area of law that was subjected to uncertainty by the Chawla decision will provide a reliable basis upon which trust and estate planning practitioners may draft trust instruments that involve the eventual payment of expected death benefits.

It should be noted that the entire amendment is placed in brackets to indicate that each state should consider whether it is needed or its adoption would be appropriate. In some states

Chawla may not present serious problems under pre-existing insurable interest law because it may be clear that a trustee already has an appropriate insurable interest for estate planning purposes. In other states, Chawla would present problems but, as indicated above, the state may have already addressed the issue so that the amendment may not be needed. Currently there are at least ten states that have enacted legislation on the subject (Delaware, Florida, Illinois, Georgia, Maine, Maryland, Minnesota, South Dakota, Virginia, and Washington). In those states that do need to respond to Chawla (plus those that may want to revisit the matter) the amendment offers a reasonable solution that has the support of many in the estate planning field, as well as the life insurance industry.

With regard to language of the amendment, subsection (a) provides that the term "settlor" is limited to a person who executes the trust instrument. This is narrower than the UTC definition of "settlor," which, in addition to the person who executes the trust instrument, would include a person who merely contributes property to the trust. See UTC Section 103(15) [72-38-103(18)]. As explained in the comment to Section 103(15) [72-38-103(18)], the broader definition serves a useful purpose in connection with the UTC generally; however, none of those situations relates to the issue of whose life should properly be the subject of a life insurance policy that is used to fund a trust. Moreover, to use the broader definition would needlessly complicate the issue of whose life should be the subject of insurance because it would be rare, if ever, that a life insurance policy used to fund a trust for estate planning purposes would be on the life of someone other than the settlor signing the trust or someone in whose life that settlor would have an insurable interest. Because there are situations in which a trust instrument will be executed by a fiduciary or agent for the creator of the trust, subsection (a) [72-38-113(1)] also makes clear that in such circumstances the fiduciary or agent is deemed to be the equivalent of the settlor.

Subsection (b) [72-38-113(2)] carries forward the widely approved rule that the time at which insurable interest in a life insurance policy is determined is the date the policy is issued, otherwise understood as the inception of the policy. Thus, if on the date the policy is issued the trustee has an insurable interest in the individual whose life is insured, the policy is not subject to being declared void for lack of such an interest. Under the reasoning that an individual has an unlimited insurable interest in his or her own life, subsection (b) [72-38-113(2)] provides that a trustee has an insurable interest in the settlor's own life. If an individual, as settlor, has created a trust to hold a life insurance policy on his or her own life, has funded that trust with the policy or with money to pay its premiums, and has selected the trustee of the trust, it follows that the trustee should have the same insurable interest that the settlor has in his or her own life. Similarly, recognizing that an individual may purchase insurance on the life of anyone in whom that individual has an insurable interest up to, generally speaking, the amount of that interest, subsection (b) [72-38-113(2)] provides that the trustee has an insurable interest in an individual in whom the settlor has, or would have had if living at the time the policy was issued, an insurable interest.

Moreover, paragraph (1) of subsection (b) [72-38-113(2)(a)] addresses the Chawla issue by referring to the jurisdiction's insurance code or other law regarding insurable interest as a separate, independent source of law for determining whether a trustee has an insurable interest in the life of an individual on whose life the trust has purchased insurance. This means that the trustee would be entitled to apply for and purchase an insurance policy not only on the life of a settlor but also on the life of any other individual in whom the settlor has an insurable interest, e.g., the spouse or children of the settlor, in the enacting jurisdiction. Exactly whose lives may be insured depends on the law of the enacting jurisdiction. In short, the amendment does not change the enacting jurisdiction's pre-existing law of insurable interest.

Paragraph (2) of subsection (b) [72-38-113(2)(b)] addresses a somewhat different issue, although it also references the insurable interest law of the enacting jurisdiction. It is designed to ensure that irrevocable life insurance trusts (ILITs) are created to serve bona fide estate planning purposes by restricting who may be a beneficiary of insurance proceeds from a policy purchased to fund an ILIT. It establishes the requirement that the proceeds of such a life insurance policy used to fund the trust be payable primarily to certain types of trust beneficiaries. As to the latter, paragraph (2) [72-38-113(2)(b)] contains bracketed language designed to provide states with a choice with regard to who those beneficiaries might be.

One choice may be exercised by deleting all the brackets, and all the language contained within the brackets, in paragraph (2) of subsection (b) [this is the version adopted in Montana]. By doing so, the class of beneficiaries for whom the insurance proceeds must primarily benefit is limited to those who, in the enacting state, have an insurable interest in the life of the settlor. Depending on the law of the jurisdiction, this could mean that only those individuals traditionally recognized as having an insurable interest, such as spouses and their children, would qualify, or it could mean that additional family members, such as siblings, grandchildren, grandparents, and perhaps others, have an insurable interest in the life of the settlor. In some other jurisdictions, the law may not be clear on this point. In these jurisdictions, estate planners generally may be concerned that strictly tying the class of beneficiaries to the state's insurable interest law might unduly restrict their ability to provide appropriate legal services to their clients. To help alleviate this concern, an alternative is offered to clarify the law in these jurisdictions. To exercise this choice, the enacting jurisdiction need only remove the brackets while retaining the language contained therein, thereby adopting the language as part of the amendment.

Removing the brackets and retaining the bracketed language in paragraph (2) of subsection (b) [not adopted] clarifies and broadens to a limited extent the class of individuals for whom the insurance must primarily benefit. By including anyone who is related to the settlor or other insured by blood or law within the third degree, the amendment makes clear that not only parents and their children would fall in the required beneficiary category, but also that siblings, grandparents, grandchildren, great-grandparents, great-grandchildren, aunts, uncles, nephews, and nieces would also qualify. Lineal consanguinity, to use the more technical term for relation by blood, is the relationship between individuals when one directly descends from the other. Each generation in this direct line constitutes a degree. Collateral consanguinity refers to the relationship between individuals who descend from a common ancestor but not from each other. The civil law method of calculating degree of collateral consanguinity, which is used in most states, counts the number of generations from one individual, e.g., the insured, up to the common ancestor and then down to the other individual. See 1 RESTATEMENT (THIRD) OF PROPERTY (Wills and Other Donative Transfers) §2.4 cmt. k (1999).

The following table identifies the relatives of an insured within three degrees of lineal and collateral consanguinity using the civil law method, with each row representing a generation.

		Grandparents (2)
	Parents (1)	Aunts and Uncles (3)
INSURED	Sisters and Brothers (2)
Children (1)	Nieces and Nephews (3)
Grandchildren (2)
Great-Grandchildren (3)

The reference in subparagraph (B)(i) [not adopted] to relation by "law"—if that term is interpreted to have the same legal meaning as the term "affinity"—may extend the category of beneficiaries that must be primarily benefited to in-laws. If that is the case, degrees of relationship by law or affinity should be computed in the same manner as degrees of relationship by consanguinity. See State v. Hooper, 140 Kan. 481, 37 P.2d 52 (1934) (explaining, for example, that a husband has the same relation, by affinity, to his wife's blood relatives as she has to them by consanguinity, and vice versa). This would mean that a son- or daughter-in-law of the insured would be related in the first degree and a brother- or sister-in-law of the insured would be related in the second degree. A father- or mother-in-law would be related to the insured in the first degree, whereas an aunt- or uncle-in-law would be related to the insured in the third degree. See State v. Allen, 304 N.W.2d 203, at 207 (Iowa 1981) (listing authorities on how to compute degrees of relation).

At the very least, the term "law" should be interpreted to include the relation between spouses and the relation between an adoptive parent and adopted child, if they were not already included under subparagraph (A) [72-38-113(2)(b)]. Additionally, in case there is any doubt as to whether an adopted grandchild, i.e., a child adopted by an insured's child, is sufficiently related to the insured, as a biological grandchild might be, to have an insurable interest under subparagraph (A) [72-38-113(2)(b)], the reference in (B)(i) [not adopted] may ensure that the adopted grandchild falls within the required category of beneficiaries. This is because the adopted grandchild arguably would, at the very least, be related by affinity to the insured in the second degree, just as a biological child of the insured's child would be related by blood in the second degree to the insured. In other words, the adopted grandchild would be treated in the same manner as a biological grandchild for purposes of the amendment.

Stepchildren, who may not otherwise have an insurable interest in the life of the settlor or other insured under subparagraph (A) [72-38-113(2)(b)] or who may not be included under subparagraph (B)(i) [not adopted], depending on the interpretation given to the term "law," are specifically included in subparagraph (B)(ii) [not adopted] to ensure that they occupy the same status as any other child of the settlor, biological or adopted.

The reason for the modifying language "if not already included under subparagraph (A)" found in subparagraph (B) of paragraph (2) of subsection (b) [not adopted] is to make it clear that there is no negative implication with regard to anyone related within the third degree to the insured and who would be included by virtue of the adopting jurisdiction's insurable interest law referred to in subparagraph (A) [72-38-113(2)(b)]. In other words, some of the people, but not all, included under subparagraph (A) [72-38-113(2)(b)] will be related to the person whose life is insured within the third degree and the modifying language is designed to make it clear that subparagraph (B)(i) [not adopted] merely adds any others so related. The same reasoning applies to stepchildren. The adopting jurisdiction may already include them under its insurable interest law referred to in subparagraph (A) [72-38-113(2)(b)]. If not, however, subparagraph (B)(ii) [not adopted] makes sure they are included in the category of people for whom the insurance policy proceeds must primarily benefit.

Although estate planners expressed concern were a jurisdiction to delete subparagraph (B) [not adopted] because they felt doing so would unduly limit their ability to serve their clients' needs, there was a general consensus that including those identified in subparagraph (B) [not adopted] should suffice for the great majority of estate plans. Thus, estate planners strongly support the adoption of the language in subparagraph (B) [not adopted].

It should also be noted that, regardless of the decision relating to the choices presented by the bracketed language in paragraph (2) of subsection (b) [not adopted], the test concerning whether the beneficiaries designated in paragraph (2) [72-38-113(2)(b)] are the primary beneficiaries of the policy proceeds takes place at the inception of the life insurance policy, i.e., when the policy is issued. The fact that there may be contingent trust beneficiaries or that the proceeds would be payable to different beneficiaries based on subsequent events or conditions is not relevant to the determination. One need only identify those trust beneficiaries that would receive the policy proceeds were the insured life to expire immediately after the policy is issued and the trust were to terminate at the same time. Among these beneficiaries, the proceeds must be payable primarily to those specified in paragraph (2) of subsection (b) [72-38-113(2)(b)]. If that is so, the condition is satisfied and may not be challenged thereafter or on the basis that subsequent events might change who would receive the proceeds.

As for the term "primarily," it will often be the case that one is able to calculate that more than fifty percent of the policy proceeds will be payable to the required class of beneficiaries under paragraph (2) [72-38-113(2)(b)], but this may not always be the situation. For example, if the purpose of the trust is to provide a lifetime benefit to a spouse or funds for children to obtain an education, the amount may be indeterminate. This, however, does not mean that the policy proceeds are not primarily for the benefit of these individuals if upon the inception of the policy they are the people who will immediately and mainly benefit from the trust, even though there are others not designated in paragraph (2) [72-38-113(2)(b)] who may also benefit concurrently or benefit subsequently upon the satisfaction of some condition in the future. In short, the term is intended to be applied in a common sense manner rather than in a hyper-technical manner that would require that a precise dollar amount be payable to certain beneficiaries.

Finally, the amendment is drafted as it would appear in the UTC were it to be part of the Code when the latter is enacted or as it would appear as an amendment to a previously enacted version of the Code. In either case, since Section 1106 [Title 72, ch. 38 Chapter Compiler's Comments] of the UTC, as originally drafted, already deals with the applicability of the UTC to trusts existing at the time of enactment, there may be no need to address that issue in this amendment.

However, if an issue should arise regarding which trusts and life insurance policies are subject to the amendment, the following language [not adopted] may be helpful in resolving that issue:

This section applies to any trust existing before, on, or after the effective date of this section, regardless of the effective date of the governing instrument under which the trust was created, but only as to a life insurance policy that is in force and for which an insured is alive on or after the effective date of this section.

CASES DECIDED AFTER ADOPTION OF 1989 TRUST CODE

Handwritten "Irrevocable Trust Reserving Income for Life" — Failure for Lack of Transfer of Property — No Resulting Trust or Constructive Trust Imposed: In anticipation of remarriage, the decedent, an attorney, drafted a handwritten document purporting to "sell, assign and convey" various mineral interests to a trust for the benefit of his daughters from his first marriage. The decedent never transferred or conveyed the named mineral interests to the trust or otherwise delivered the trust property to the named trustee. At the time of death, his wife, as personal representative of the estate, refused to convey the alleged trust property upon request of the daughters. The daughters sued, maintaining that the handwritten trust document was testamentary in nature and that therefore the personal representative must fund the testamentary trust with the mineral interests owned by the decedent at the time of his death. The personal representative argued that the document was not a valid testamentary trust and was intended to create an inter vivos trust, which was never executed by conveying or otherwise transferring the interests to the trust or the trustee. The District Court granted summary judgment for the daughters, concluding that the handwritten trust document was testamentary. The Supreme Court reversed, holding that the inter vivos trust document failed because of the lack of a transfer of property to the trust during the decedent's lifetime. The document was not testamentary because the document did not first and foremost express a clear and unmistakable intent that the trust would not take effect until the testator's death. Rather, the document convincingly displays all attributes of an inter vivos transaction that the trustor intended would take place at the time that the document was drafted or soon thereafter. Even if a resulting trust was imposed, the result would be the same, with the mineral interests returning to the trustor's estate. The other type of involuntary trust, a constructive trust, was not argued by the daughters and is therefore not available as an equitable remedy. Cate-Schweyen v. Cate, 2000 MT 345, 303 M 232, 15 P3d 467, 57 St. Rep. 1478 (2000).

CASES DECIDED PRIOR TO ADOPTION OF 1989 TRUST CODE

No Affirmative Duty to Disclose Unfunded Trust — Trustee Obligations Inapplicable When No Trust Exists: Brevig contended that the District Court should have imposed a constructive trust to remedy McCormick's alleged violation of various statutes relating to the duties of a trustee, including failing the duty to notify Brevig that the trust was unfunded, thereby allowing McCormick to wrongfully acquire a ranch and partnership interest under a will. However, McCormick took possession of the ranch and partnership interest pursuant to a validly executed will, so there was no duty to notify Brevig of the invalidity of the trust. Further, it would be inappropriate to subject McCormick to the statutory obligations of a trustee when no trust ever came into existence. There was simply no evidence to justify submitting the issues for jury consideration, so the District Court properly granted summary judgment to McCormick on both issues. McCormick v. Brevig, 1999 MT 86, 294 M 144, 980 P2d 603, 56 St. Rep. 355 (1999), followed in Cate-Schweyen v. Cate, 2000 MT 345, 303 M 232, 15 P3d 467, 57 St. Rep. 1478 (2000).

Award of Trust Property in Dissolution Action: Items of personal property were placed in trust for the husband and children of the marriage, but the house and land were not made part of the trust, and there is no evidence that they were held in the resulting trust. The language of the trust agreement was unambiguous and clearly stated which property was placed in the trust. The District Court correctly held that the husband voluntarily gave up interest in the trust and that therefore the award of the trust property to the wife was proper. In re Marriage of Malquist, 234 M 419, 763 P2d 1116, 45 St. Rep. 2020 (1988).

Determination of Resulting Trust on Intestate Succession: In this case it was possible for the District Court to have declared a resulting trust on behalf of defendants and/or plaintiffs. An intent to create a trust could have been implied from the circumstances surrounding the conveyances. Hubbard's statement that he wanted the property to go to his "children" could also have been regarded as sufficiently definite to include his children as a class or his children at the time of the conveyances. However, the Trial Court held instead that it was immaterial whether a trust was created because, under a resulting trust, the property would vest in the estate. The result would be the same regardless of whether a trust was found, so that it was not an abuse of discretion to pass the property by intestacy. Eckart v. Hubbard, 184 M 320, 602 P2d 988 (1979).

Elements of Proof to Establish Resulting Trust: Evidence supported establishment of a resulting trust where the consideration was paid at the time or before the time that legal title passed to the alleged trustee, in that the funds and the pickup truck traded in, used for the initial downpayment on a new truck, belonged to the defendant. Firemen's Ins. Co. of Newark, N.J. v. Show, 110 F. Supp. 523 (D.C. Mont. 1953).

Parol Express Trusts — Sufficiency of Moral Obligation as Consideration: As applied to a parol express trust, unenforceable under 72-24-102 (now repealed), a moral obligation is a sufficient consideration for the transfer of realty to prevent creditors who have not acquired a valid lien thereon prior to the transfer from having it set aside. McLaughlin v. Corcoran, 104 M 590, 69 P2d 597 (1937).

Intention Immaterial: The constructive trust declared by 72-20-111 (now repealed) is based upon the fundamental idea of fraud or wrongdoing in the trustee, independently of any actual or presumed intention to create a trust, while in all species of resulting trusts, intention is an essential element. Meagher v. Harrington, 78 M 457, 254 P 432 (1927).

CASES DECIDED AFTER ADOPTION OF 1989 TRUST CODE

Claim of Resulting or Constructive Trust Barred by Judicial Estoppel and Clean Hands Doctrine: The parents created a family corporation and made their four children equal, sole shareholders through transfers and gifts. When two medical malpractice suits were filed against the father, he claimed that he had no right to or control over the corporation's assets. In a separate action, two sisters instituted a shareholder derivative action and petitioned for judicial review of their brother's fiduciary duties. The brother called a special meeting to issue additional stock to himself and to transfer property back to the parents, but the sisters objected and the brother was enjoined from doing so. The parents then claimed that the property was held in a resulting or constructive trust, and the District Court ordered that the assets and stock be conveyed to the parents. The sisters appealed, and the Supreme Court reversed. Both the sisters and the plaintiffs in the medical malpractice action relied to their detriment on the father's judicial declaration that he had no right to or control over the corporate assets, and the father was thus barred by judicial estoppel and the clean hands doctrine from raising equitable claims that a resulting or constructive trust existed. Judicial estoppel binds a party to that party's judicial declarations and precludes the party from taking a position inconsistent with the previous declaration in a subsequent action or proceeding. The clean hands doctrine provides that a party must not expect relief in equity unless the party comes into court with clean hands. The evidence here showed that the parents knowingly transferred assets to the family corporation to circumvent creditors and avoid estate taxes, and the Supreme Court will not aid a party whose claim had its inception in the party's wrongdoing, whether the victim of the wrongdoing is the other party or a third party. Kauffman-Harmon v. Kauffman, 2001 MT 238, 307 M 45, 36 P3d 408 (2001).

Resulting Trust Proportionate to Amount of Purchase Price Paid and Payments May Not Be Intended as Gift: The lower court granted Fifer's motion for summary judgment and awarded him certain real property under a resulting trust, finding that he had paid most of the purchase price. The Supreme Court held that a question of fact existed as to whether Fifer intended that a resulting trust not be created and whether his payments were made on behalf of the plaintiff Neset as a gift. In addition, the Supreme Court held that a resulting trust could be created only in proportion to the amount of Fifer's payments to the total purchase price. Neset v. Fifer, 283 M 527, 942 P2d 712, 54 St. Rep. 777 (1997). See also U.S. v. Nava, 404 F3d 1119 (9th Cir. 2005).

Supreme Court Indicates Clean Hands Doctrine Not Part of Balancing Test of Weighing Unjust Enrichment Against Relief to One Attempting to Avoid Child Support: Fifer argued that the lower court was correct in awarding him certain real property under the theory of resulting trust because although he had placed the property in Neset's name to avoid child support obligations, she knew of his intent and therefore did not have clean hands. The Supreme Court indicated that on remand if the lower court decided that a resulting trust existed, it should not consider whether or not Neset had clean hands in using the statutorily required balancing test of weighing unjust enrichment to Neset by awarding her the property that was purportedly paid for by Fifer. If, after resolving fact issues, the lower court determined that a purchase money resulting trust was created, it was to weigh the proper factors in determining if the exception in subsection (2)(c) of 72-33-218 (now repealed) applied. Neset v. Fifer, 283 M 527, 942 P2d 712, 54 St. Rep. 777 (1997).

Purchase Money Resulting Trust Not Created: Johnson entered into two agreements with the Collins Agency, one to build an apartment complex for the agency using a FmHA loan obtained by the agency and to then buy the complex from the agency and the second to hold the agency harmless from any claim by the original architect on the project. Johnson operated the complex and expended some money on the complex for several years while the parties tried to have the loan transferred to Johnson. The loan transfer was never approved and Johnson sued to have a part of the property conveyed to him or, in the alternative, for damages. A purchase money resulting trust is created when a transfer of property is made to one person and the purchase price is paid by another. The Supreme Court held that the facts did not support the creation of a purchase money resulting trust because, despite Johnson's contribution, the agency remained the debtor on the loan. Johnson v. Kenneth D. Collins Agency, Inc., 263 M 137, 865 P2d 312, 50 St. Rep. 1749 (1993), distinguished in Neset v. Fifer, 283 M 527, 942 P2d 712, 54 St. Rep. 777 (1997). See also U.S. v. Nava, 404 F3d 1119 (9th Cir. 2005).

Creation of Purchase Money Resulting Trust — Intent: Father and son established a practice whereby father placed his property in son's name and son quitclaimed it back to father when father sold it. Father located the property, negotiated for its purchase, paid for the property and all improvements, collected rents, paid all insurance and property taxes, maintained the property, and treated it as his own by taking exclusive possession, excepting renters, and using it for his business while son bore none of the expenses associated with the property. These facts established clearly and convincingly that a purchase money resulting trust was intended and created. Hilliard v. Hilliard, 255 M 487, 844 P2d 54, 49 St. Rep. 1080 (1992).

CASES DECIDED PRIOR TO ADOPTION OF 1989 TRUST CODE

Presumption of Resulting Trust — When Overcome by Presumption of Gift Between Parties Closely Related: The plaintiff transferred money to her nephew and his wife, who used the sums to purchase real estate. The plaintiff contended the money tendered was a loan to her nephew, but after his death, his wife refused to repay any of the sums or relinquish title to the real estate, claiming the property came to her as the result of a gift from the plaintiff to her nephew. In this action by the plaintiff to secure title to the real property, the defendant, who is the wife of the plaintiff's nephew, contended that the transfer of funds from aunt to nephew raised a presumption that the transfer was intended as a gift because of the familial relationship between the two. Section 72-24-104 (now repealed) provides that when a transfer of real property is made to one person but consideration is paid by another, a trust is presumed to result in favor of the person by or for whom the payment is made. However, this presumption is supplanted by the rebuttable presumption of gift in cases where the parties stand in close relation to one another, such as husband and wife or parent and child. The Supreme Court has refused to extend this presumption to more distant relationships than those mentioned; therefore, the presumption of gift does not apply to the present transfer from aunt to nephew. Since no presumption of gift arose under the facts of this case and because the plaintiff advanced the entire purchase price of the real property while title passed to her nephew and his wife, a resulting trust in favor of the plaintiff is presumed. Peterson v. Kabrich, 213 M 401, 691 P2d 1360, 41 St. Rep. 2196 (1984), followed, with respect to degree of relationship implying presumption of gift, in Niemen v. Howell, 234 M 471, 764 P2d 854, 45 St. Rep. 2058 (1988).

Resulting Trust in Favor of Debtor No Protection From Federal Tax Liability: In a federal tax liability case, the U.S. District Court had occasion to consider Montana law on resulting trusts. Under the law of Montana, when a transfer of property is made to one person but the consideration is paid by another, a resulting trust may arise and there is a presumption to that effect. Noting that the law was unclear whether or not there is a Montana presumption of a gift arising out of the parent-child relationship of the parties involved, the court held that the evidence rebutted any such presumption of a son-to-parents gift in this case. The son's absolute dominion over the property, coupled with the lack of assertion by the parents of any adverse claim prior to the attachment of the lien, plus the affirmative evidence of an intent on the part of the son to conceal from creditors, was sufficient. The property in question was subject to a resulting trust in favor of the son. The resulting trust did not shield the son from tax liability. Bretz v. U.S., 37 St. Rep. 1457 (D.C. Mont. 1980) (apparently not reported in Federal Supplement).

Mother and Son: Where son conveyed real property to his mother who had advanced large sums of money to him over many years, a constructive trust will not be imposed because the confidential relationship between grantor and grantee who are relatives is not sufficient by itself to create a resulting trust making the mother a constructive trustee of the property absent clear and convincing proof of fraud or undue influence. Mahaffey v. DeLeeuw, 168 M 274, 542 P2d 103 (1975).

Laches:

The plaintiff's claim of a resulting trust in real property, raised after a period of 24 years and after the principal parties were dead, warrants the application of the doctrine of laches. Adair v. Capital Inv. Co., 165 M 26, 525 P2d 548 (1974).

In an action in ejectment in which defendant sought to establish a resulting trust in property conveyed to his wife, the consideration for which was paid by him, held that, by waiting 10 years before asserting his claim, the wife in the interim having secured a divorce, remarried and died, she in her lifetime paying the taxes, rented it, and in every way treated it as her own, he was guilty of such laches as precluded his right to appeal to a Court of Equity for relief. Clary v. Fleming, 60 M 246, 198 P 546 (1921). See also First St. Bank v. Mussigbrod, 83 M 68, 271 P 695 (1928).

Conveyances Between Persons in Confidential Relationships: In suit by beneficiaries to recover from deceased's brother stock allegedly belonging to estate, exception to the general rule raising the presumption of gift in favor of the person to whom property is transferred when the person making payment and transferee stand in confidential relation did not apply to transfer from deceased to brother. Detra v. Bartoletti, 150 M 210, 433 P2d 485 (1967).

Presumption of Trust:

A trust is presumed to result in favor of the person by or for whom such payment is made. Poepping v. Monson, 138 M 38, 353 P2d 325, 354 P2d 183 (1960).

Where consideration for a transfer of property was paid and title taken in the name of another, a trust is presumed to result in favor of the person advancing the money. Campanello v. Mercer, 124 M 528, 227 P2d 312 (1951).

Elements of Proof to Establish Resulting Trust: In an action by a judgment creditor to enforce a judgment lien against real property recorded in the name of the wife of the judgment debtor, in order for plaintiff to establish a prima facie case under the theory expressed in 72-24-104 (now repealed), it must be proved that funds belonging to the husband judgment debtor were used for the purchase of the property. Beard v. Myers, 136 M 350, 347 P2d 719 (1959).

Notice of Trust: When a transfer of realty is made to one person and the consideration is paid by another, a trust is presumed to arise in favor of the person making the payment, but trust property cannot be followed and impressed with a trust against one who is a bona fide purchaser for value without notice. Zier v. Osten, 135 M 484, 342 P2d 1076 (1959).

Presumption of Gift From Parent to Child: Where the presumption of a resulting trust, arising from 72-24-104 (now repealed), is contradicted by the presumption of a gift arising from the purchase of real property by a parent with title placed in the child's name, the latter overrides the former and a gift is conclusively presumed. Platts v. Platts, 134 M 474, 334 P2d 722 (1959).

Resulting or Constructive Trusts:

When a resulting trust is claimed in less than all the land conveyed, it must be shown that the cestui que trust furnished an aliquot part of the consideration for the purchase of a definite part of or interest in the property. Platts v. Platts, 134 M 474, 334 P2d 722 (1959).

Involuntary trusts are either resulting or constructive trusts. Under 72-24-104 (now repealed), when a transfer of real property is made to one person and the consideration thereof is paid by another, the trust presumed to result in favor of the person by whom such payment is made is called a resulting trust. Such presumption is not indulged where, as in the instant case, the conveyance is made by the husband to the wife. In such case the presumption, disputable in character, is that the transfer was intended as a gift. Lewis v. Bowman, 113 M 68, 121 P2d 162 (1942).

Presumption of Gift From Husband to Wife:

In an action by an ex-husband to impose a trust on property purchased together with ex-wife during coverture, the ex-husband failed to prove facts to overcome the presumption of a gift to the ex-wife, and the rule in Montana is that a transfer of property from one spouse to the other is presumed to be a gift. (Associate Justices Bottomly and Angstman dissenting.) Dial v. Dial, 131 M 310, 310 P2d 610 (1957).

In an action by a judgment creditor to set aside an alleged fraudulent transfer of real property made by husband to wife the day before judgment was rendered, where it appeared that, ever since purchase thereof 15 years before with the wife's money, she had the equitable title thereto, bare legal title having been placed by mistake in the husband, the gift presumption was rebuttable and property purchased with the wife's money became part of her separate estate and her separate equitable estate was not subject to execution under levy by the husband's creditors. (No showing that creditor was misled and injured by title remaining so long.) Kranjcec v. Belinak, 114 M 26, 132 P2d 150 (1942).

Voluntary Advancement: Where the husband already owned a fee simple title and the wife voluntarily made an advancement to him for the express purpose of enabling him to pay off a mortgage, it does not give rise to a trust under 72-24-104 (now repealed). Baird v. Baird, 125 M 122, 232 P2d 348 (1951).

Created by Operation of Law:

Under 72-24-104 (now repealed) where a transfer of realty is made by one person and the consideration therefor is paid by or for another, a trust is presumed to result in favor of the person by or for whom such payment is made, the trust being created by operation of law; hence the contention that a trust estate in real property can be created only by an instrument in writing under Statute of Frauds is not meritorious. Whitcomb v. Koechel, 117 M 329, 158 P2d 496 (1945).

A resulting trust arises by operation of law from the fact that the consideration for the purchase of property was paid by, or on behalf of, one person and the title thereto taken in the name of another. Eisenberg v. Goldsmith, 42 M 563, 113 P 1127 (1911).

Presumption of Gift From Husband to Wife:

Where defendant husband in a divorce action prayed that the family home be adjudged to him on the ground that, although standing in his wife's name, he had paid for it, thus seeking to establish a trust, it was incumbent upon him to overcome the presumption that where the husband pays the consideration and title is taken in his wife's name, the transaction constitutes a gift. Since he delayed for 26 years to make serious claim of title, the Court's finding for the wife may not be held abuse of discretion. Lewis v. Lewis, 109 M 42, 94 P2d 211 (1939), followed in In re Estate of Lettengarver, 249 M 92, 813 P2d 468, 48 St. Rep. 593 (1991).

Where the parties to a transaction of the nature adverted to by 72-24-104 (now repealed) stand in close relationship, such as husband and wife, the presumption of a trust is supplanted by that of a gift. Bingham v. Nat'l Bank of Mont., 105 M 159, 72 P2d 90, 113 ALR 315 (1937).

Conveyances Between Persons in Confidential Relationships:

The rule expressed in 72-24-104 (now repealed) is subject to the exception that if the consideration is paid by one in close relationship to the transferee, such as husband and wife, parent and child, the rebuttable presumption that the transaction was a gift arises, such exception applying where the grantee is the grantor's son-in-law. McLaughlin v. Corcoran, 104 M 590, 69 P2d 597 (1937).

The rule declared by 72-24-104 (now repealed) that where real property is conveyed to one person and the consideration therefor is paid by another, a trust is presumed to result in favor of the person paying the consideration is subject to the exception that where the property is purchased by one with his own money and the title is placed by him in another to whom he stands in a confidential relation, such as husband, wife, parent, child, etc., the presumption, rebuttable in character, is that the conveyance is made as a gift. Humbird v. Arnet, 99 M 499, 44 P2d 756 (1935); Clary v. Fleming, 60 M 246, 198 P 546 (1921).

Where property is purchased by one with his own money and the title is placed by him in another with whom he stands in confidential relation, such as husband, wife, parent, child, or such other relation that the grantee may naturally have a claim upon the bounty of the grantor, the presumption, rebuttable in character, is that the conveyance is made as a gift. McQuay v. McQuay, 81 M 311, 263 P 683 (1928). See also Roman v. Albert, 81 M 393, 264 P 115 (1928).

Payment Must Be Made From Money of Beneficiary:

The one fundamental idea running through 72-24-104 (now repealed) is that the money paid was in fact the money of the person who claims the existence and benefit of the trust. It is immaterial whether the payment was made by him personally or for him by another, but in either instance the payment must have been made with his money. Humbird v. Arnet, 99 M 499, 44 P2d 756 (1935); Stauffacher v. Great Falls Pub. Serv. Co., 99 M 324, 43 P2d 647 (1935); Eisenberg v. Goldsmith, 42 M 563, 113 P 1127 (1911).

To create a resulting trust in real property under 72-24-104 (now repealed) it is not necessary that the person for whose benefit a conveyance (assignment of Sheriff's certificate of sale) is made must pay the money; if it is advanced by another for or on his behalf it is sufficient. McKenzie v. Evans, 96 M 1, 29 P2d 657 (1934).

Where, after the death of a mortgagor of real property, the cashier of a bank advised his widow to permit the property to be sold on foreclosure sale, and that he, acting for the bank, would buy it for her benefit, the money so advanced to be deemed a loan to her, and she acted upon such advice, a resulting trust was created in her favor. Marcellus v. Wright, 51 M 559, 154 P 714 (1916).

Time of Payment of Consideration as Affecting Trust:

The rule that to establish a resulting trust in real property the consideration must have been paid at or before the time that the legal title passes was met where foreign co-owners who had executed powers of attorney to their resident co-owner claimed a resulting trust in their favor in lands exchanged by their trustee for others included in a mortgage with knowledge of their trust character, equity and good conscience demanding that, under the circumstances, such consideration as they furnished should be considered as furnished in time to create a trust. First St. Bank v. Mussigbrod, 83 M 68, 271 P 695 (1928).

While in order to raise a resulting trust, the payment of money as consideration for the purchase of the property must have been made at the time or before the legal title to it passes to the party to be charged in the trust capacity, the fact that the contract of purchase entered into by defendant antedated the passing of title some weeks was immaterial. Feeley v. Feeley, 72 M 84, 231 P 908 (1924).

To create a resulting trust, the payment of money as consideration for the purchase of the property must have been made at the time or before the legal title passed to the party sought to be charged in the trust capacity. Eisenberg v. Goldsmith, 42 M 563, 113 P 1127 (1911); Lynch v. Herrig, 32 M 267, 80 P 240 (1905).

Doctrine Applicable to Personal Property: The provision of 72-24-104 (now repealed) declaring that a trust is presumed to result in favor of a person by or for whom the consideration for the transfer of real property is paid by another, being but declaratory of the common law under which the rule applied as well as the purchase of personal property, is controlling also where the property in question is personal. Meagher v. Harrington, 78 M 457, 254 P 432 (1927).

Resulting Trust:

Where in an action to quiet title to land defendant assignee of a mortgage thereon claimed that the land was held by plaintiff in trust for his benefit, but did not allege that the consideration which plaintiff paid to the mortgagor was paid in behalf of defendant and the title thus acquired taken in the name of plaintiff for defendant's use and benefit, his pleading did not state cause of action as for a resulting trust. Word v. Moore, 66 M 550, 214 P 79 (1923).

To raise a resulting trust in land the consideration for its purchase must have been paid at the time or before the legal title to it passed to the party sought to be charged in the trust capacity, payments made thereafter being insufficient for that purpose. MacGinniss Realty Co. v. Hinderager, 63 M 172, 206 P 436 (1922).

Declaratory of Common Law: This statute is but declaratory of the common law. Lynch v. Herrig, 32 M 267, 80 P 240 (1905). See Eisenberg v. Goldsmith, 42 M 563, 113 P 1127 (1911).

CASES DECIDED AFTER ADOPTION OF 1989 TRUST CODE

Principles of Equity Properly Applied in Distribution of Property of Unmarried Cohabitants: LeFeber and Johnson acquired property during their long-term, intimate, exclusive relationship. The parties cohabited, but neither party claimed a common-law marriage. When the parties separated, LeFeber requested that the District Court declare a constructive trust in LeFeber's favor and order Johnson to convey real property to LeFeber. The court denied the request but also denied Johnson's claim that all the property had been gifted to Johnson. Instead, the court held that each party had an equitable right as tenants in common and granted each party an undivided half interest. LeFeber appealed, but the Supreme Court affirmed. LeFeber was unable to show that a constructive trust existed because establishment of a constructive trust depends only on a showing that the titleholder would be unjustly enriched if permitted to retain the title, and LeFeber could show no unjust enrichment on Johnson's part, including that Johnson would benefit from a wrongful act or had engaged in misconduct or fault to recover. The District Court correctly determined that neither party owned the property in its entirety and that each party had an equitable right to the property as tenants in common. Thus, the District Court properly exercised its power to make compensatory adjustments and to fashion appropriate relief according to ordinary principles of equity. LeFeber v. Johnson, 2009 MT 188, 351 M 75, 209 P3d 254 (2009). See also Flood v. Kalinyaprak, 2004 MT 15, 319 M 280, 84 P3d 27 (2004), and Anderson v. Woodward, 2009 MT 144, 350 M 343, 207 P3d 329 (2009).

Sufficient Finding of Undue Influence Over Parent — Constructive Trusts Properly Imposed and Damages Awarded: When Josephine became too ill to manage herself and her affairs, her daughter Melissa agreed to move in with Josephine and care for her. In the process, as Josephine's health steadily declined, Melissa used her confidential relationship with Josephine to manipulate Josephine and her finances, controlling Josephine's checking account, mail, and payment of bills and expenses. By the time Josephine died, Melissa had obtained title to all of Josephine's real property, sold Josephine's property in Ovando and Florida, encumbered the remaining property with over $175,000 in loans taken out in Josephine's name, used part of the loan proceeds to buy property in Missoula and Las Vegas, exhausted all cash in Josephine's house, repeatedly overdrawn Josephine's checking account, fraudulently cashed one of Josephine's certificates of deposit by forging Josephine's name to it, used and obtained credit cards in Josephine's name and charged the account to the credit limit, exhausted all of Josephine's savings, Social Security, retirement, and annuity income, retained rental income from Josephine's rental units without accounting for it, destroyed years of Josephine's financial records while keeping very few records after assuming control of Josephine's affairs, fabricated lease documents and forged signatures on them to obtain loans in Josephine's name, used Josephine's money to pay all personal bills and obligations, never informed her siblings or provided an accounting of expenditures of Josephine's income and assets, and refused to provide a copy of Josephine's will, answer questions, or provide any other information. Melissa's brother Robert obtained a copy of the will and commenced an action to recover assets of Josephine's estate from Melissa. The District Court held Melissa accountable for a money judgment of $177,000 and for other items, totaling nearly $400,000. The court imposed a constructive trust on all real property that Melissa had obtained from Josephine or purchased with loan proceeds obtained in Josephine's name and awarded Robert costs and attorney fees. Melissa appealed. The Supreme Court applied the criteria in In re Estate of Bradshaw, 2001 MT 92, 305 M 178, 24 P3d 211 (2001), and determined that Melissa had exercised undue influence over Josephine. It concluded that there were ample reasons for imposition of the constructive trusts because the properties were obtained through undue influence and would have unjustly enriched Melissa if she were allowed to retain title to the properties. The damage award was based on substantial evidence and did not constitute error. The award of attorney fees and costs was within the equitable powers of the District Court based on the extraordinary efforts by Melissa to conceal her use of Josephine's property and money, which required Robert to make substantial efforts to successfully uncover and prove Melissa's wrongful conduct. The District Court was affirmed on all issues. Monroe v. Marsden, 2009 MT 137, 350 M 327, 207 P3d 320 (2009).

Constructive Trust Created for Proceeds of Sale of Residence — Unjust Enrichment: A father conveyed a residence to one of his sons. When sale of the property was later contemplated, two daughters contested the retention of the sale proceeds by the son, asserting that the property had been conveyed to the son in order to provide an estate for another child who had suffered a serious brain injury in an automobile accident about 1 year prior to the conveyance of the property. The District Court imposed a constructive trust on the proceeds of the residence, and the son appealed. The Supreme Court affirmed. Although a constructive trust may be imposed because the titleholder obtained the title by fraud, accident, mistake, undue influence, violation of a trust, or other wrongful act, a constructive trust may also be imposed in cases in which a titleholder innocently obtained title to property but would be unjustly enriched if allowed to retain the title. Here, conveyance of the property to the son supported the creation of a constructive trust because there was never a transfer of an ownership interest in the property from father to son, and the father retained ownership of the property and paid taxes on the property until his death. Further, the son would have been unjustly enriched if allowed to keep the proceeds from sale of the residence. In re Estate of McDermott, 2002 MT 164, 310 M 435, 51 P3d 486 (2002).

Claim of Resulting or Constructive Trust Barred by Judicial Estoppel and Clean Hands Doctrine: The parents created a family corporation and made their four children equal, sole shareholders through transfers and gifts. When two medical malpractice suits were filed against the father, he claimed that he had no right to or control over the corporation's assets. In a separate action, two sisters instituted a shareholder derivative action and petitioned for judicial review of their brother's fiduciary duties. The brother called a special meeting to issue additional stock to himself and to transfer property back to the parents, but the sisters objected and the brother was enjoined from doing so. The parents then claimed that the property was held in a resulting or constructive trust, and the District Court ordered that the assets and stock be conveyed to the parents. The sisters appealed, and the Supreme Court reversed. Both the sisters and the plaintiffs in the medical malpractice action relied to their detriment on the father's judicial declaration that he had no right to or control over the corporate assets, and the father was thus barred by judicial estoppel and the clean hands doctrine from raising equitable claims that a resulting or constructive trust existed. Judicial estoppel binds a party to that party's judicial declarations and precludes the party from taking a position inconsistent with the previous declaration in a subsequent action or proceeding. The clean hands doctrine provides that a party must not expect relief in equity unless the party comes into court with clean hands. The evidence here showed that the parents knowingly transferred assets to the family corporation to circumvent creditors and avoid estate taxes, and the Supreme Court will not aid a party whose claim had its inception in the party's wrongdoing, whether the victim of the wrongdoing is the other party or a third party. Kauffman-Harmon v. Kauffman, 2001 MT 238, 307 M 45, 36 P3d 408 (2001).

Findings That Constructive Trust Improperly Administered Not Erroneous: Bradshaw placed an annuity in his mother's name to hold in trust for the benefit of others. Bradshaw later died intestate, leaving two minor children and no surviving spouse. The District Court concluded that the trust should have been expended on behalf of the minor children and found that the mother violated her fiduciary obligation by originally taking the position that the annuity was to be distributed among various members of Bradshaw's family and only later deciding that each of the minor children was also entitled to a share. Bradshaw's children were properly the beneficiaries of the trust, and the District Court did not err in finding the mother in violation of her duty as trust administrator. In re Estate of Bradshaw, 2001 MT 92, 305 M 178, 24 P3d 211 (2001).

Handwritten "Irrevocable Trust Reserving Income for Life" — Failure for Lack of Transfer of Property — No Resulting Trust or Constructive Trust Imposed: In anticipation of remarriage, the decedent, an attorney, drafted a handwritten document purporting to "sell, assign and convey" various mineral interests to a trust for the benefit of his daughters from his first marriage. The decedent never transferred or conveyed the named mineral interests to the trust or otherwise delivered the trust property to the named trustee. At the time of death, his wife, as personal representative of the estate, refused to convey the alleged trust property upon request of the daughters. The daughters sued, maintaining that the handwritten trust document was testamentary in nature and that therefore the personal representative must fund the testamentary trust with the mineral interests owned by the decedent at the time of his death. The personal representative argued that the document was not a valid testamentary trust and was intended to create an inter vivos trust, which was never executed by conveying or otherwise transferring the interests to the trust or the trustee. The District Court granted summary judgment for the daughters, concluding that the handwritten trust document was testamentary. The Supreme Court reversed, holding that the inter vivos trust document failed because of the lack of a transfer of property to the trust during the decedent's lifetime. The document was not testamentary because the document did not first and foremost express a clear and unmistakable intent that the trust would not take effect until the testator's death. Rather, the document convincingly displays all attributes of an inter vivos transaction that the trustor intended would take place at the time that the document was drafted or soon thereafter. Even if a resulting trust was imposed, the result would be the same, with the mineral interests returning to the trustor's estate. The other type of involuntary trust, a constructive trust, was not argued by the daughters and is therefore not available as an equitable remedy. Cate-Schweyen v. Cate, 2000 MT 345, 303 M 232, 15 P3d 467, 57 St. Rep. 1478 (2000).

Error in Failure of District Court to Impose Constructive Trust When Unjust Enrichment Would Result: Steve's parents advanced his wife Julie and him money to purchase marital property, and even though the advance was repaid, the parents retained title to the property and paid taxes and insurance on it. When the question arose as to division of the marital estate, the District Court concluded that a constructive trust should not be imposed because there was no evidence of fraud or other wrongful acts to support such a remedy. Although a constructive trust may be imposed because the titleholder obtained title by fraud, accident, mistake, undue influence, violation of a trust, or other wrongful act, these factors are not necessarily a prerequisite to imposing a constructive trust pursuant to 72-33-219 (now repealed). A constructive trust may also be imposed in cases when a titleholder innocently obtained title to property but would be unjustly enriched if allowed to retain title. In light of the fact that the initial purchase price was repaid, that Steve paid for improvements on the property, and that the parties acted as though Steve and Julie owned the property, the parents would have been unjustly enriched if they retained title. The District Court erred in not imposing a constructive trust in favor of Steve and Julie. The District Court was instructed to impose an equitable duty on Steve's parents to convey the property to Steve and Julie and to fully apportion the full value of the property when distributing the marital estate. In re Marriage of Moss, 1999 MT 62, 293 M 500, 977 P2d 322, 56 St. Rep. 257 (1999), followed in U.S. v. Nava, 404 F3d 1119 (9th Cir. 2005).

Statute of Frauds and Statute of Limitations Not Applicable to Constructive Trust: The husband argued that the statute of frauds and the statute of limitations for agreements not in writing barred his wife's claim to marital property. However, in this case, a constructive trust should have been created for the property. Constructive trusts arise by operation of law, so 70-20-101 did not bar the wife's claim because under 70-20-102, 70-20-101 may not be construed to prevent creation of a trust. Further, because the wife was not attempting to directly enforce a verbal agreement, the requirement in 27-2-202 that an action based on a contract, account, or promise not founded on an instrument in writing be brought within 5 years also did not apply. In re Marriage of Moss, 1999 MT 62, 293 M 500, 977 P2d 322, 56 St. Rep. 257 (1999).

Acts and Omissions of Plaintiff — Claim of Constructive Trust Negated: Johnson entered into two agreements with the Collins Agency, one to build an apartment complex for the agency using a FmHA loan obtained by the agency and to then buy the complex from the agency and the second to hold the agency harmless from any claim by the original architect on the project. Johnson operated the complex and expended some money on the complex for several years while the parties tried to have the loan transferred to Johnson. Johnson failed to hold the agency harmless from a claim by the former architect that resulted in a judgment against the agency. In addition, complex funds were taken by the IRS for income taxes owed by Johnson. The loan transfer was never approved, and Johnson sued to have a part of the property conveyed to him or, in the alternative, for damages. The Supreme Court held that in light of the acts and failures to act on Johnson's part, he had not established by clear and convincing evidence that the agency had an equitable duty to convey an interest in the complex to him. Johnson v. Kenneth D. Collins Agency, Inc., 263 M 137, 865 P2d 312, 50 St. Rep. 1749 (1993).

Constructive Trust — Third Party Receiving Property for Value to Have Notice of Transferor's Fraudulent Activity: The Taylors had invested over $126,000 with Holm, a Californian, and, when they became worried about their investment, contacted Holm and requested the return of their money. Subsequently, Holm contacted Lawrence and had her obtain a second mortgage on her home for $198,000 and give the money to him to be invested on her behalf. The next day, Holm instructed the bank where he had deposited the money to send two checks to the Taylors for the amount that they had invested with him. When Lawrence later tried to recover her money, she could not find Holm. She then sued the Taylors' estate on the basis that the money they received from Holm came from her check to Holm and should be returned to her because of the existence of a constructive trust. Lawrence argued that the money should be returned under the constructive trust theory because the Taylors had notice of Holm's fraudulent behavior and that the Taylors were not innocent transferees for value because the money given to them was for an antecedent debt. The Supreme Court held that the evidence did not support a finding that the Taylors were aware of Holm's activities and adopted the rule that "value" with respect to constructive trusts and innocent transferees includes a transfer to satisfy an antecedent obligation. Lawrence v. Clepper, 263 M 45, 865 P2d 1150, 50 St. Rep. 1699 (1993).

Proper Imposition of Constructive Trust for Person Not Party to Action: May bought six certificates of deposit (CDs) on which she and her three sisters were named as joint depositors. In 1985, sister Marie moved to Montana to take care of May. Without telling the other sisters, Marie cashed four CDs before May died and two the day after. A large part of the money was put into Marie's account or was unaccounted for. Sister Hazel sued Marie, and the court held that Marie: (1) committed fraud, undue influence, and a breach of trust; (2) was subject to a constructive trust; and (3) owed sister Cecelia, who was not a party to the action, and Hazel each one-third of the total value of the CDs. Though Cecelia was not a party, the court had jurisdiction to award Cecelia judgment for her one-third share. Cecelia's rights were identical to Hazel's, Cecelia's interests were adequately protected, and Marie's interests were not adversely affected by the fact Cecelia was not a party. Although jurisdiction over the person upon whom a trust is imposed is pivotal, not all potential beneficiaries need be parties. Howard v. Dalio, 249 M 316, 815 P2d 1150, 48 St. Rep. 755 (1991).

House Not Part of Marital Estate Under Constructive Trust Theory: The wife argued that the family home, purchased by the husband's parents, should be included in the marital estate on the basis of a constructive trust. The Supreme Court held that although the husband and wife had chosen the house and made the arrangements for the purchase, the husband's parents had title to the home and had assumed the rights and responsibilities of ownership. Under the facts, a constructive trust did not exist. In re Marriage of Owen, 244 M 306, 797 P2d 226, 47 St. Rep. 1634 (1990).

CASES DECIDED PRIOR TO ADOPTION OF 1989 TRUST CODE

No Affirmative Duty to Disclose Unfunded Trust — Trustee Obligations Inapplicable When No Trust Exists: Brevig contended that the District Court should have imposed a constructive trust to remedy McCormick's alleged violation of various statutes relating to the duties of a trustee, including failing the duty to notify Brevig that the trust was unfunded, thereby allowing McCormick to wrongfully acquire a ranch and partnership interest under a will. However, McCormick took possession of the ranch and partnership interest pursuant to a validly executed will, so there was no duty to notify Brevig of the invalidity of the trust. Further, it would be inappropriate to subject McCormick to the statutory obligations of a trustee when no trust ever came into existence. There was simply no evidence to justify submitting the issues for jury consideration, so the District Court properly granted summary judgment to McCormick on both issues. McCormick v. Brevig, 1999 MT 86, 294 M 144, 980 P2d 603, 56 St. Rep. 355 (1999), followed in Cate-Schweyen v. Cate, 2000 MT 345, 303 M 232, 15 P3d 467, 57 St. Rep. 1478 (2000).

No Constructive Trust When Wife Awarded Home Purchased With Loan From Husband's Mother: In a divorce case, the wife was awarded the family home that had been purchased with money loaned to the husband by his mother. The lower court's decision that no constructive trust existed in the mother's favor was affirmed on appeal. The Supreme Court ruled that there had been no fraud on the wife's part and that the mother continued to lend money to her son after he had failed to secure the loans with the real estate, as she had requested. Gitto v. Gitto, 239 M 47, 778 P2d 906, 46 St. Rep. 1502 (1989).

Breach of Joint Venture Fiduciary Trust — Award of Investment Plus Interest Affirmed: Kelly and Rust agreed to purchase land, subdivide it, and sell it at a profit. Rust advanced Kelly $4,000 as one-half the purchase price. Kelly paid the $4,000 balance and recorded the deed, but did not include Rust on the recorded deed. Rust moved from the area and later attempted, through his agent, to purchase Kelly's interest in the land. The agent was told the land was already sold, so Rust brought an action to recover his investment plus interest. The trial court properly held that: (1) the parties had entered into a joint venture; (2) Kelly was required in equity to hold the property in a constructive trust; (3) Kelly breached the joint venture fiduciary duty and attempted to deprive Rust of his interest in the property; and (4) Rust was entitled to return of his $4,000 investment plus interest. Rust v. Kelly, 228 M 220, 741 P2d 786, 44 St. Rep. 1471 (1987).

Execution of Assignments of Notes and Deeds Under Wife's Power of Attorney — Husband's Desire to Make Assignments: On appeal by decedent's children from an order awarding certain estate property to decedent's wife when wife used power of attorney for husband to execute assignments of notes and deeds of trust to herself prior to husband's death, the Supreme Court held that there was sufficient evidence to uphold the transfer to the wife because she was acting as her husband's alter ego and it was undisputed that the husband desired to make assignments of the notes and deeds to his wife. In re Estate of Rogers, 223 M 78, 725 P2d 544, 43 St. Rep. 1545 (1986).

Execution and Delivery of Quitclaim Deed Supported in Evidence — Effect: The District Court found that a quitclaim deed was executed and delivered by the Morins to the Mapstons before a typewritten note was signed by Mapstons to convey the subject property to Morins. This central finding of fact was held to be clearly supported in the evidence. The legal effect of the finding is that the quitclaim deed constituted a gift to Mapstons, no consideration being necessary. The transfer vested all actual title which Morins then had, since no different intention was expressed or necessarily implied. The typewritten note cannot be specifically enforced by Morins because they had not received an adequate consideration for the contract and because the contract lacks mutuality. Moreover, no involuntary trust was created. Morin v. Mapston, 217 M 403, 705 P2d 118, 42 St. Rep. 1283 (1985).

Husband and Wife Joint Tenancy — Intentional Killing — Constructive Trust: A husband and wife were owners of real property as joint tenants with rights of survivorship. The intentional killing of the husband by the wife effected a severance of the joint tenancy with a one-half interest being retained by the wife and the remaining one-half interest passing to the estate of the decedent husband. Because the wife's interest vested at the creation of the joint tenancy, her retention of a one-half interest was not a benefit resulting from her killing of her husband. The court was not required to impose a constructive trust on the wife's interest, only upon the decedent husband's interest. With respect to the husband's estate, the wife was not entitled to any portion. In re Estate of Matye, 198 M 371, 645 P2d 955, 39 St. Rep. 1009 (1982).

Reliance on Trustee — Creation of Corporation — Gaining Advantage Through Fraud: Plaintiff's husband and defendant were brothers and partners in a ranching operation, although each owned the land individually. Plaintiff's husband died and defendant was named executor. A corporation was formed to operate the ranch on May 1, 1973. Both parties transferred all assets to the corporation. Defendant's family got 364 more shares than plaintiff, and defendant was named president of the corporation. Restrictions were placed on the valuation and transfer of stock. On May 29, 1975, plaintiff consulted her own attorney and for the first time fully realized her position. All corporate votes became deadlocked. On April 29, 1977, plaintiff filed suit to dissolve the corporation, alleging fraud and oppressive conduct by defendant and mistake at the formation. The court found that defendant occupied a position of trust and confidence in relation to plaintiff. He was executor of her husband's estate and partner to her husband at the date of death; that status imposed on defendant the duties of a trustee. At the time of incorporation, the unequal stock division was not believed to be of any particular legal or practical significance, so that the parties were mistaken as to legal effect. Defendant contended no mistake could be claimed, because plaintiff failed in her duty to fully read the documents before signing. However, the duty was not so much on plaintiff to discover as on defendant as trustee to fully disclose. In view of the fact that no disclosure was made, the mistake under which the parties were acting was evident. Because the result of incorporation was to give defendant control over plaintiff's assets, the trustee statutes were clearly violated. Defendant used his position to gain an advantage over plaintiff without fully disclosing the consequences and was guilty of fraud. Skierka v. Skierka Bros., Inc., 192 M 505, 629 P2d 214, 38 St. Rep. 754 (1981).

No Express or Constructive Trust: Testimony that decedent conveyed certain land to Lohrke and later made an oral statement that decedent wanted the land to go to his children was insufficient to create a voluntary or express trust involving real property. No constructive trust existed because Lohrke and decedent were close friends and the property was voluntarily transferred to Lohrke without his knowledge. A constructive trust requires fraud, mistake, undue influence, violation of a trust, or other wrongful acts. Eckart v. Hubbard, 184 M 320, 602 P2d 988 (1979).

What Constitutes Undue Influence: In determining the issue of undue influence, the Court may consider the confidential relationship of the person attempting to influence the donor, the physical and mental condition of the donor as it affects his ability to withstand the influence, the unnaturalness of the disposition as it relates to showing an unbalanced mind or a mind easily susceptible to undue influence, and demands and importunities as they may affect the particular donor, taking into consideration the time, place, and all surrounding circumstances. Cameron v. Cameron, 179 M 219, 587 P2d 939 (1978), followed in In re Estate of Bradshaw, 2001 MT 92, 305 M 178, 24 P3d 211 (2001).

Pastoral Relationship: Evidence supported findings of fraud and undue influence constituting pastor an involuntary trustee of land conveyed to him where the grantor had made substantial contributions to grantee's ministry, had financed a missionary trip for him, and had conveyed the land, intending it for use in the church work, on grantee's promise to reconvey a portion of it. However, the grantee had failed to keep promises to take grantor on the missionary trip and to reconvey a portion of the land, and the conveyance of land, prepared by grantee's attorney, had been to grantee and himself personally rather than to his church. Under these circumstances, cancellation of the conveyance was proper. Hensley v. Stevens, 156 M 486, 481 P2d 694 (1971).

Parent and Child:

Constructive trust would not be imposed on lands deeded son by aged mother in absence of evidence that son gained land by accident, mistake, undue influence, violation of trust, or other wrongful act or by constructive fraud. Bodine v. Bodine, 149 M 29, 422 P2d 650 (1967).

When daughter conveyed real property to her mother with the understanding that it was to be held in trust for her and the mother then deeded the property to another daughter with the understanding that it was to be held in trust for the first daughter, but there was no written trust agreement, a constructive trust would result. Opp v. Boggs, 121 M 131, 193 P2d 379 (1948), distinguished in Barrett v. Zenisek, 132 M 229, 315 P2d 1001 (1957).

Transfer in Contemplation of Death: When deceased, engaged in cattle partnership with his sister and her husband, during his last illness transferred bank account and interest in cattle to his sister and her husband, obligating them to pay all bills and expenses surrounding his illness and transfer some money to deceased's son, the sister and her husband were involuntary trustees of the property transferred from which they had paid expenses of deceased's last illness. Marshall v. Minlschmidt, 148 M 263, 419 P2d 486 (1966).

Joint Option to Purchase: Neighboring ranchers signed a writing, agreeing to become equal partners in purchase of adjoining grazing leases and ranch lands. Each contributed $1,000 to bind a 1-year purchase option covering lands and leases. The option and option payment were forfeited but they continued their joint activities. Nine months after forfeiture one partner purchased all for himself. A constructive trust was raised which purchaser could not revoke. He was required to convey an undivided one-half interest in the lands and leases to other partner subject to down-to-date accounting and reimbursement in net amount of purchase price found to be due from plaintiff to purchaser after accounting was completed from date of original agreement. Bradbury v. Nagelhus, 132 M 417, 319 P2d 503 (1957).

Burden of Proof to Establish Trust: The rule that to establish a trust the evidence must be clear, convincing, and practically free from doubt, a question determinable by the Trial Court, is especially applicable where plaintiff must establish his case largely by his own testimony as to conversations had between himself and a decedent (here his divorced wife) after the lapse of many years, or where parol evidence alone is relied upon. The burden of proving by clear and convincing evidence that a deed absolute on its face was intended as a mortgage is upon him who alleges the fact. Lewis v. Bowman, 113 M 68, 121 P2d 162 (1942), followed in In re Estate of Lettengarver, 249 M 92, 813 P2d 468, 48 St. Rep. 593 (1991).

Only Beneficiaries of Fiduciary Relationship Allowed to Object to Transaction: When a director of a corporate holder of an option to purchase mining property for $32,857.71 purchased the property for $12,000, subject to the option, through another corporation which he controlled, the corporate holder, its stockholders, and creditors could prevent him from making a profit and compel him to convey his rights to the corporate holder, but a third person purchasing the property from one who as a stockholder of the corporate holder redeemed it after a sale on execution is not one of the beneficiaries and had no standing or cause of action to question the director's purchase. N. Min. Corp. v. Cooke Min. Co., 123 F2d 9 (9th Cir. 1941).

Director of Corporation Occupies Fiduciary Relation: In an action to compel conveyance of property allegedly held in trust for plaintiff corporation by a director who had located several mining claims adjacent to the property of the company and needed for dumping waste rock, even though he claimed to be a "dummy" director, a figurehead who discharges no duties, he still owed it the duty not to act against its interests without prior warning for it to protect itself, and though he is not strictly a trustee, he occupies a fiduciary relation to the company, and cannot enrich himself at the expense of the stockholders. Golden Rod Min. Co. v. Bukvich, 108 M 569, 92 P2d 316 (1939).

Mandamus to Compel Payment by Official: Complaint for Writ of Mandate by a county high school against the County Treasurer to compel payment of money realized from the sale of a building purchased with high school funds and sold by County Commissioners as trustee when no longer needed for school purposes stated a cause of action on the theory of a resulting trust, although the pleading did not ask that such a trust be declared and was sufficient to authorize issuance of the Writ directing defendant to deposit the sale price to the credit of plaintiff.

Incorporation as a county high school district after purchase of building did not affect its right. State ex rel. Gallatin County High School v. Brandenburg, 107 M 199, 82 P2d 593 (1938).

Constructive Trust:

Where property had been transferred and retransferred between members of the same family and by a partnership to a corporation composed of the same persons, all without any consideration being paid, and purchased by plaintiff at a bankruptcy sale, and on which defendant had a prior judgment lien, contention that one of the grantees was a trustee of a constructive trust was held not sustained by the evidence, it showing neither actual nor constructive fraud on the part of the alleged trustee. McLaughlin v. Corcoran, 104 M 590, 69 P2d 597 (1937).

Where a contract between the assignee of a mortgage on land and a lessee under a lease from the heirs of the mortgagors imposed no legal obligation whatever upon the lessee owing to the assignee but simply gave him an option to purchase the land during the term of the lease upon foreclosure, provided the lessee would pay the taxes and interest due and the mortgage was not foreclosed, and the lessee paid neither taxes nor interest but bought the property on tax sale, a constructive trust in the land in favor of the assignee did not arise, the lessee not having violated any duty owing by him to defendant. Word v. Moore, 66 M 550, 214 P 79 (1923).

The basis of a constructive trust is fraud, and such a trust arises when the legal title to property is obtained by a person in violation of some duty owed to the one who is equally entitled thereto, the property being held in hostility to his beneficial rights of ownership. Word v. Moore, 66 M 550, 214 P 79 (1923).

A constructive trust is created by operation of law, upon breach of a fiduciary relation by the person sought to be held, its basis being fraud, actual or constructive. MacGinniss Realty Co. v. Hinderager, 63 M 172, 206 P 436 (1922).

The evidence was held insufficient to show a constructive trust. Eisenberg v. Goldsmith, 42 M 563, 113 P 1127 (1911).

A constructive trust is created by operation of law, upon breach of a fiduciary relation by the person sought to be held. Eisenberg v. Goldsmith, 42 M 563, 113 P 1127 (1911).

Conveyances Between Persons in Confidential Relationships: The owner of lands mortgaged for a large amount conveyed them to a bank which subsequently became insolvent. Its receiver deeded them to his mother-in-law for an indeterminate amount of between $200 and $500 handed him by his wife, ostensibly in behalf of her mother. In an action to foreclose the mortgage, to have the grantee declared a trustee of a resulting trust and several later conveyances set aside as fraudulent, it was held that the money paid was that of the grantor and that, therefore, the grantee at once upon consummation of the transaction became such trustee, her only interest in the property until she made conveyance thereof being that of a holder of the legal title for the benefit of the grantor. Humbird v. Arnet, 99 M 499, 44 P2d 756 (1935).

Attaching Creditor: An attaching creditor is neither a purchaser nor an encumbrancer of real property for value within the meaning of 72-24-208 (now repealed), declaring that no resulting trust can prejudice the rights of such purchaser or encumbrancer; he succeeds to and acquires only the rights of the debtor at the time of the levy, subject to all the rights and equities of third persons which are capable of being enforced against the judgment debtor; the rule of caveat emptor applies. Stauffacher v. Great Falls Pub. Serv. Co., 99 M 324, 43 P2d 647 (1935).

Gift in Violation of Trust: One who takes personal property from a trustee by way of a gift made in violation of the latter's trust becomes an involuntary trustee thereof (72-20-301, now repealed), stands in the shoes of the trustee, and cannot assert the bar of the Statute of Limitations unless he repudiates the trust, and knowledge of such repudiation is gained by the cestui que trust. Davidson v. Stagg, 94 M 272, 22 P2d 152 (1933).

Pledge Mingled With Funds of Estate: The money pledged by tenant to protect estate against abatement of property rented for violations of law constituted a trust fund. Since it had been mingled with the funds of the estate without any attempt at segregation, the entire funds of the estate were impressed with the trust in favor of the tenant, and since the residuary legatees and devisees had received the trust fund on distribution, they were liable to him for the money pledged as involuntary trustees. Ryan v. Stagg, 89 M 390, 298 P 353 (1931).

No Application to Wrongful Occupation of Land: Sections 72-20-110 and 72-20-111 (now repealed), general in their nature, declaring who are involuntary trustees of things wrongfully detained from their owner or gained through fraud, etc., for the benefit of the person entitled thereto, have no application to a wrongful occupation of land after demand by its owner, except as to such occupation the provisions of 27-1-318 control. Kester v. Amon, 81 M 1, 261 P 288 (1927).

Fraud: The act of a tenant of mortgaged land in refusing to deliver possession thereof to the mortgagee on demand based on a provision in the mortgage entitling him to possession on failure of the mortgagor to pay one of the mortgage notes, resulting in ouster proceedings, did not fall within the statutory definition of either actual or constructive fraud. Hence, the contention of the mortgagee that the tenant by his wrongful act in withholding possession became a constructive trustee and that his possession after demand was the possession of the mortgagee cannot be sustained. Morton v. Union Cent. Life Ins. Co., 80 M 593, 261 P 278 (1927).

Intention Immaterial: The constructive trust declared by 72-20-111 (now repealed) is based upon the fundamental idea of fraud or wrongdoing in the trustee, independently of any actual or presumed intention to create a trust, while in all species of resulting trusts, intention is an essential element. Meagher v. Harrington, 78 M 457, 254 P 432 (1927).

Unlawful Bank Deposit: Where a deposit of trust funds is unlawfully made with the active participation of the bank, it becomes an involuntary trustee under the trust and may be compelled to place the trust estate in statu quo. Pethybridge v. First St. Bank of Livingston, 75 M 173, 243 P 569 (1926).

Bankrupt Settling Suit: While a bankrupt person, during the pendency of bankruptcy proceedings against him, may settle a suit brought by him, he holds any proceeds so received as trustee for his creditors, and, if the settlement is made with the present intent to misapply the proceeds, for any such misapplication the parties making payment must make reparation, if at the time of the settlement they had reasonable grounds for believing that the bankrupt person intended such a conversion, in view of 72-20-111, 72-20-301, and 72-20-302 (now repealed). Gunther v. Home Ins. Co., 286 F 396 (D.C. Mont. 1923), reversed on other grounds, 298 F 593 (1924).

Property Acquired With Partnership Funds Creates Trust: Where one of three partners engaged in the livestock business acquired patent to desert land used in the business and paid for it with partnership funds, the land was impressed with a resulting trust in favor of the three partners. Wilson v. Wilson, 64 M 533, 210 P 896 (1922), distinguished in Brownback v. Nelson, 122 M 525, 206 P2d 1017 (1949).

Husband and Wife: When a married woman owning separate property was desirous during a dangerous illness of conveying to her daughter, but consented to convey to her husband instead, on his promise to devise both this property and his own to the daughter and a son, the husband, on the death of the wife and the repudiation of his promise, occupies the position of an involuntary trustee for the benefit of the daughter, and the latter is the real party in interest on whom devolves the privilege of maintaining the appropriate action. Huffine v. Lincoln, 52 M 585, 160 P 820 (1916).

Unauthorized Sale: Where the receiver of a corporation sold certain of its property and thereafter the order appointing the receiver and authorizing a sale was reversed on appeal, the purchasers held the property and the proceeds of their sale thereof as involuntary trustees for the corporation, and the receiver held the purchase price as an involuntary trustee for the purchasers. Lutey v. Clark, 31 M 45, 77 P 305, 84 P 73 (1904).

Directors of Corporation: A resolution of four directors of a corporation voting three of their number salaries and giving them backpay, predicated on bylaws previously passed by five directors, including the first-mentioned four, was void under Title 72, ch. 20, part 2 (now repealed). McConnell v. Combination Min. & Mill. Co., 30 M 239, 76 P 194 (1904), modified on other grounds, McConnell v. Combination Min. & Mill. Co., 31 M 563, 79 P 248 (1905), and distinguished in Bentall v. Koenig Bros., Inc., 140 M 339, 372 P2d 91 (1962).

Resulting Trust: Since a resulting trust in realty arises not out of a contract but by operation of law, it may be proved by parol evidence, the Statute of Frauds not applying. Campanello v. Mercer, 124 M 528, 227 P2d 312 (1951); Wilson v. Wilson, 64 M 533, 210 P 896 (1922).

Judicial Proceedings

Part Official Comments

General Comment This article addresses selected issues involving judicial proceedings concerning trusts, particularly trusts with contacts in more than one State or country. This article is not intended to provide comprehensive coverage of court jurisdiction or procedure with respect to trusts. These issues are better addressed elsewhere, for example in the State's rules of civil procedure or as provided by court rule. Section 201 [not adopted] makes clear that the jurisdiction of the court is available as invoked by interested persons or as otherwise provided by law. Proceedings involving the administration of a trust normally will be brought in the court at the trust's principal place of administration. Section 202 [72-38-203] provides that the trustee and beneficiaries are deemed to have consented to the jurisdiction of the court at the principal place of administration as to any matter relating to the trust. Sections 203 [72-38-201, adopted as modified] and 204 [72-38-205] are optional, bracketed provisions relating to subject-matter jurisdiction and venue.

Comment Section 201 of the Uniform Trust Code was not adopted and the Official Comment to Section 201 is included here:

While the Uniform Trust Code encourages the resolution of disputes without resort to the courts by providing such options as the nonjudicial settlement authorized by Section 111 [72-38-111], the court is always available to the extent its jurisdiction is invoked by interested persons. The jurisdiction of the court with respect to trust matters is inherent and historical and also includes the ability to act on its own initiative, to appoint a special master to investigate the facts of a case, and to provide a trustee with instructions even in the absence of an actual dispute.

Contrary to the trust statutes in some States, the Uniform Trust Code does not create a system of routine or mandatory court supervision. While subsection (b) [not adopted] authorizes a court to direct that a particular trust be subject to continuing court supervision, the court's intervention will normally be confined to the particular matter brought before it.

Subsection (c) [not adopted] makes clear that the court's jurisdiction may be invoked even absent an actual dispute. Traditionally, courts in equity have heard petitions for instructions and have issued declaratory judgments if there is a reasonable doubt as to the extent of the trustee's powers or duties. The court will not ordinarily instruct trustees on how to exercise discretion, however. See Restatement (Second) of Trusts §§187, 259 (1959). This section does not limit the court's equity jurisdiction. Beyond mentioning petitions for instructions and actions to declare rights, subsection (c) [not adopted] does not attempt to list the types of judicial proceedings involving trust administration that might be brought by a trustee or beneficiary. Such an effort is made in California Probate Code §17200. Excluding matters not germane to the Uniform Trust Code, the California statute lists the following as items relating to the "internal affairs" of a trust: determining questions of construction; determining the existence or nonexistence of any immunity, power, privilege, duty, or right; determining the validity of a trust provision; ascertaining beneficiaries and determining to whom property will pass upon final or partial termination of the trust; settling accounts and passing upon the acts of a trustee, including the exercise of discretionary powers; instructing the trustee; compelling the trustee to report information about the trust or account to the beneficiary; granting powers to the trustee; fixing or allowing payment of the trustee's compensation or reviewing the reasonableness of the compensation; appointing or removing a trustee; accepting the resignation of a trustee; compelling redress of a breach of trust by any available remedy; approving or directing the modification or termination of a trust; approving or directing the combination or division of trusts; and authorizing or directing transfer of a trust or trust property to or from another jurisdiction.

Living Trust — Costs and Attorney Fees Awarded to Trustee From Trust — Judicial Construction of Trust Documents: Clifford Dern and his wife Mary established a living trust for the benefit of their family. Derril Dern, a cotrustee, refused to sign a quitclaim deed conveying various properties left to the trust beneficiaries, and Mary brought an action to determine the beneficiaries' rights. The District Court relied upon 25-10-103 for its determination that payment of costs was discretionary with the court. The Supreme Court held that 25-10-103 applies only in those situations in which costs are not otherwise provided for. In this case, article 3 of the trust documents states that the trustee may pay "expenses of administration" from the trust. In reliance on that language and on 72-33-631 (now repealed), the Supreme Court held that the fees were a necessary expense of the trust, given Derril's refusal to sign the deed. The Supreme Court also noted that 72-33-631 (now repealed) allows repayment of expenditures incurred by the trustee in administration of the trust, that that provision was patterned after a section of the California probate code, and that California decisions interpreting that section of the California probate code hold that reasonable attorney fees are considered necessary expenses of trust administration. The Supreme Court also pointed out that its decision to allow fees is further buttressed by decisions interpreting 72-12-206. Finally, because the trust documents provided that only expenses of the trust were to be paid from the "trust estate", without further delineation of what constitutes the "trust estate", the Supreme Court interpreted those words to mean the entire trust estate, and because the marital trust estate was the only remaining source of funding for the entire estate, the fees were to be paid from the marital trust estate. In re Estate of Dern, 279 M 138, 928 P2d 123, 53 St. Rep. 1087 (1996).

Trustees of Dissolved Corporation: One of five statutory trustees in charge of the affairs of a dissolved corporation may not prosecute an appeal to the Supreme Court from an order appointing a receiver for the corporation against the wishes of his cotrustees, irrespective of whether unit or majority rule of action controls under certain statutes. Union Bank & Trust Co. of Helena v. Penwell, 99 M 255, 42 P2d 457 (1935).

72-38-201. Subject matter jurisdiction.

Official Comments

This section provides a means for distinguishing the jurisdiction of the court having primary jurisdiction for trust matters, whether denominated the probate court, chancery court, or by some other name, from other courts in a State that may on occasion resolve disputes concerning trusts. The section has been placed in brackets because the enacting jurisdiction may already address subject-matter jurisdiction by other statute or court rule. The topic also need not be addressed in States having unified court systems. For an explanation of types of proceedings which may be brought concerning the administration of a trust, see the Comment to Section 201 [not adopted; see Title 72, ch. 38, pt. 2 Official Comments].

(b) The [designate] court has concurrent jurisdiction with other courts of this State of other proceedings involving a trust."

CASES DECIDED AFTER ADOPTION OF 1989 TRUST CODE

District Court Sitting in Probate — Lack of Subject Matter Jurisdiction Over Trust Code Issue: Two daughters sought to have the wife, Audrey, removed as trustee of their father's estate because of alleged mismanagement of the family trust. Before that action was addressed, Audrey petitioned the District Court under the closed probate proceedings to have herself removed as trustee and requested appointment of a corporate trustee successor. The two sisters moved to dismiss the petition on grounds that the court lacked subject matter jurisdiction. Without formally ruling on the motion to dismiss, the court concluded that Audrey's motion was properly filed under the original probate and proceeded to rule on other matters, including a motion for substitution of the judge. On appeal, the Supreme Court held that because Audrey was not attempting to reopen the probate proceedings or to relitigate any probate matter, Audrey's petition was a trust proceeding rather than a proceeding over the closed probate, and as such the District Court did not have subject matter jurisdiction to entertain Audrey's petition. The daughters' motion to dismiss should have been granted because a District Court sitting in probate has no jurisdiction over testamentary trusts that arise after probate is closed, so the case was remanded for further proceedings. In re Estate of Haugen, 2008 MT 304, 346 M 1, 192 P3d 1132 (2008). See also Stanley v. Lemire, 2006 MT 304, 334 M 489, 148 P3d 643 (2006).

Proper Imposition of Constructive Trust for Person Not Party to Action: May bought six certificates of deposit (CDs) on which she and her three sisters were named as joint depositors. In 1985, sister Marie moved to Montana to take care of May. Without telling the other sisters, Marie cashed four CDs before May died and two the day after. A large part of the money was put into Marie's account or was unaccounted for. Sister Hazel sued Marie, and the court held that Marie: (1) committed fraud, undue influence, and a breach of trust; (2) was subject to a constructive trust; and (3) owed sister Cecelia, who was not a party to the action, and Hazel each one-third of the total value of the CDs. Though Cecelia was not a party, the court had jurisdiction to award Cecelia judgment for her one-third share. Cecelia's rights were identical to Hazel's, Cecelia's interests were adequately protected, and Marie's interests were not adversely affected by the fact Cecelia was not a party. Although jurisdiction over the person upon whom a trust is imposed is pivotal, not all potential beneficiaries need be parties. Howard v. Dalio, 249 M 316, 815 P2d 1150, 48 St. Rep. 755 (1991).

CASES DECIDED PRIOR TO ADOPTION OF 1989 TRUST CODE

Testamentary Trustee's Duty to Make Account: Under 72-12-101 (now repealed), a testamentary trustee must account to the District Court sitting in probate, covering all his acts as trustee under the will, the method thereby provided being exclusive; the will governs the trusteeship and the time for its determination. Montgomery v. Gilbert, 111 M 250, 108 P2d 616 (1940).

Federal Court Without Jurisdiction: Federal Court was without jurisdiction to set aside decree of Probate Court of state when law provided ample means for revision and correction of probate decrees by Probate Courts themselves. Montgomery v. Gilbert, 77 F2d 39 (9th Cir. 1935).

Jurisdiction of District Court:

The District Court, sitting in probate in a proceeding by testamentary trustees seeking settlement of their accounts, has the same general jurisdiction and powers as are exercised by a Court of Equity over trusts. In re Harper's Estate, 98 M 356, 40 P2d 51 (1934).

Section 72-12-101 (now repealed) confers exclusive jurisdiction upon the District Court when sitting as a Probate Court to determine whether the purpose of the testamentary trust has been accomplished, wherever it has acquired jurisdiction of the estate by probate of the will which has created a trust to continue after final distribution. Philbrick v. Am. Bank & Trust Co., 58 M 376, 193 P 59 (1920).

72-38-203. Jurisdiction over trustees and beneficiaries.

Official Comments

This section clarifies that the courts of the principal place of administration have jurisdiction to enter orders relating to the trust that will be binding on both the trustee and beneficiaries. Consent to jurisdiction does not dispense with any required notice, however. With respect to jurisdiction over a beneficiary, the Comment to Uniform Probate Code §7-103, upon which portions of this section are based, is instructive: It also seems reasonable to require beneficiaries to go to the seat of the trust when litigation has been instituted there concerning a trust in which they claim beneficial interests, much as the rights of shareholders of a corporation can be determined at a corporate seat. The settlor has indicated a principal place of administration by its selection of a trustee or otherwise, and it is reasonable to subject rights under the trust to the jurisdiction of the Court where the trust is properly administered.

The jurisdiction conferred over the trustee and beneficiaries by this section does not preclude jurisdiction by courts elsewhere on some other basis. Furthermore, the fact that the courts in a new State acquire jurisdiction under this section following a change in a trust's principal place of administration does not necessarily mean that the courts of the former principal place of administration lose jurisdiction, particularly as to matters involving events occurring prior to the transfer.

The jurisdiction conferred by this section is limited. Pursuant to subsection (b) [72-38-203(2)], until a distribution is made, jurisdiction over a beneficiary is limited to the beneficiary's interests in the trust. Personal jurisdiction over a beneficiary is conferred only upon the making of a distribution. Subsection (b) [72-38-203(3)] also gives the court jurisdiction over other recipients of distributions. This would include individuals who receive distributions in the mistaken belief they are beneficiaries.

For a discussion of jurisdictional issues concerning trusts, see 5A Austin W. Scott & William F. Fratcher, The Law of Trusts §§556-573 (4th ed. 1989).

72-38-205. Venue.

Official Comments

This optional, bracketed section is made available for jurisdictions that conclude that venue for a judicial proceeding involving a trust is not adequately addressed in local rules of civil procedure. For jurisdictions enacting this section, general rules governing venue continue to apply in cases not covered by this section. This includes most proceedings where jurisdiction over a trust, trust property, or parties to a trust is based on a factor other than the trust's principal place of administration. The general rules governing venue also apply when the principal place of administration of a trust is in another locale, but jurisdiction is proper in the enacting State.

Order Not Final When Time to Appeal Not Expired — Rules of Civil Procedure Applicable to Formal Probate Proceedings: An order becomes final only when the time to appeal has expired. In this case, plaintiff bank asserted that the District Court's order approving a trust accounting was conclusive on all persons pursuant to 72-35-206 (now repealed), so the accounting could not be reopened on defendants' motion for a new trial. However, the time to appeal had not expired when defendants moved for a new trial, so the order was not final and the accounting was subject to a postjudgment motion for a new trial. Further, the Montana Rules of Civil Procedure supplied an appropriate mechanism for filing a motion after entry of a trust order because the rules apply to formal probate proceedings. Service of Notice of Entry of Order of Judgment on Trust Beneficiaries Required: Trust beneficiaries are indispensable parties to formal statutory proceedings who are considered to have "appeared" as a matter of law and are entitled to receive notice of the proceedings and notice of entry of the order of judgment. In this case, defendant trust beneficiaries did not move for a new trial until 11 years after entry of the order of judgment, but because defendants never received notice of the entry of the judgment as required by 72-35-306 (now repealed), the statute of limitations on filing postjudgment motions had not expired when their motion for a new trial was filed with the District Court and therefore was properly granted. CASES DECIDED AFTER ADOPTION OF 1989 TRUST CODE

Partial Revocation of Trust Rendered Ineffective by Warranty Deed Absent Required Written Notification to Cotrustees: Cole, a California resident, established a revocable trust, naming himself as trustee and naming cotrustees, and deeded property in Montana to himself, but did not record the deed. The trust document allowed Cole to amend or revoke the trust at any time by filing written notice with the trustees. Cole later executed and recorded a handwritten warranty deed granting the property to his wife and him as joint tenants with the right of survivorship. The trust was amended to revoke all prior amendments, grant a life estate in the property to his wife, and obligate the trust to pay expenses associated with the property, with the remaining net trust income to be paid to his wife during her lifetime. The cotrustees were never notified as required in the original trust document. After Cole died, his widow filed an inheritance tax return naming herself as sole owner of the property based on the warranty deed. The trustees filed a petition for construction of the trust, requesting that the warranty deed be voided and that the property be declared an asset of the previous revocable trust. The District Court granted summary judgment to the trust, and the widow appealed. The Supreme Court held that because the record contained no evidence that Cole or anyone on his behalf served the trustees with written notice of the revocation, under California law, the partial revocation, via the warranty deed, was rendered ineffective. Summary judgment was affirmed. Cole v. Cole, 2003 MT 229, 317 M 197, 75 P3d 1280 (2003). See also Conservatorship of Irvine, 47 Calif. Rep. 2d 587 (Calif. Ct. App. 1995).

Sale of Ranch Within Trustee's Discretion — Motion to Withdraw Petition Authorizing Sale Properly Denied: Trustee Bragg sought but was denied a motion to withdraw her previously granted petition for declaration of right and authority to sell real property held in trust, contending that a review of the will as a whole revealed testator's intent to preserve the real property, a ranch, intact unless sale was necessary to maintain the widow's health and maintenance. The Supreme Court concluded that under the express terms of the trust, it was clearly within Bragg's authority to sell the ranch or any other asset consistent with her fiduciary duties and that because the sale was fair and reasonable, the District Court properly denied the motion to change the character of the trust investment from land to cash. In re George Trust, 253 M 341, 834 P2d 1378, 49 St. Rep. 424 (1992).

Trial Necessary on Facts in Support of Relief Not Specifically Requested: Former Rule 54(c), M.R.Civ.P. (now superseded), allows a court to grant relief to which a party is entitled even if such relief was not demanded in the party's pleading. However, the court may not grant relief not specifically requested when the facts and issues necessary to support that relief have not been tried and proved at trial. Therefore, the District Court's order to proceed with a sale of trust property was in error when the validity of the sale agreement and the equitable question of specific performance were never properly raised and litigated. In re George Trust, 253 M 341, 834 P2d 1378, 49 St. Rep. 424 (1992), following the rationale in Smith v. Zepp, 173 M 358, 567 P2d 923 (1977).

Representation

Part Official Comments

This article deals with representation of beneficiaries, both representation by fiduciaries (personal representatives, trustees, guardians, and conservators), and what is known as virtual representation. Representation is a topic not adequately addressed under the trust law of most States. Representation is addressed in the Restatement (First) of Property §§180-186 (1936), but the coverage of this article is more complete.

Section 301 [72-38-301] is the introductory section, laying out the scope of the article. The representation principles of this article have numerous applications under this Code. The representation principles of the article apply for purposes of settlement of disputes, whether by a court or nonjudicially. They apply for the giving of required notices. They apply for the giving of consents to certain actions.

Sections 302-305 [72-38-302 through 72-38-305] cover the different types of representation. Section 302 [72-38-302] deals with representation by the holder of a general testamentary power of appointment. (Revocable trusts and presently exercisable general powers of appointment are covered by Section 603 [72-38-603], which grant the settlor or holder of the power all rights of the beneficiaries or persons whose interests are subject to the power). Section 303 [72-38-303] deals with representation by a fiduciary, whether of an estate, trust, conservatorship, or guardianship. The section also allows a parent without a conflict of interest to represent and bind a minor or unborn child. Section 304 [72-38-304] is the virtual representation provision. It provides for representation of and the giving of a binding consent by another person having a substantially identical interest with respect to the particular issue. Section 305 [72-38-305] authorizes the court to appoint a representative to represent the interests of unrepresented persons or persons for whom the court concludes the other available representation might be inadequate.

The provisions of this article are subject to modification in the terms of the trust. See Section 105 [72-38-105]. Settlors are free to specify their own methods for providing substituted notice and obtaining substituted consent.

72-38-301. Representation — basic effect.

Official Comments

This section is general and introductory, laying out the scope of the article.

Subsection (a) [72-38-301(1)] validates substitute notice to a person who may represent and bind another person as provided in the succeeding sections of this article. Notice to the substitute has the same effect as if given directly to the other person. Subsection (a) [72-38-301(1)] does not apply to notice of a judicial proceeding. Pursuant to Section 109(d) [72-38-109(4), adopted as modified], notice of a judicial proceeding must be given as provided in the applicable rules of civil procedure [72-38-208 through 72-38-212], which may require that notice not only be given to the representative but also to the person represented. For a model statute for the giving of notice in such cases, see Unif. Probate Code Section 1-403(3). Subsection (a) [72-38-301(1)] may be used to facilitate the giving of notice to the qualified beneficiaries of a proposed transfer of principal place of administration (Section 108(d)) [72-38-108(4)], of a proposed trust combination or division (Section 417) [72-38-417], of a temporary assumption of duties without accepting trusteeship (Section 701(c)(1)) [72-38-701(3)(a)], of a trustee's resignation (Section 705(a)(1)) [72-38-705(1)(a)], and of a trustee's report (Section 813(c)) [72-38-813(3)].

Subsection (b) [72-38-301(2)] deals with the effect of a consent, whether by actual or virtual representation. Subsection (b) [72-38-301(2)] may be used to facilitate consent of the beneficiaries to modification or termination of a trust, with or without the consent of the settlor (Section 411) [72-38-411], agreement of the qualified beneficiaries on appointment of a successor trustee of a noncharitable trust (Section 704(c)(2)) [72-38-704(3)(b)], and a beneficiary's consent to or release or affirmance of the actions of a trustee (Section 1009) [72-38-1009]. A consent by a representative bars a later objection by the person represented, but a consent is not binding if the person represented raises an objection prior to the date the consent would otherwise become effective. The possibility that a beneficiary might object to a consent given on the beneficiary's behalf will not be germane in many cases because the person represented will be unborn or unascertained. However, the representation principles of this article will sometimes apply to adult and competent beneficiaries. For example, while the trustee of a revocable trust entitled to a pourover devise has authority under Section 303 to approve the personal representative's account on behalf of the trust beneficiaries, such consent would not be binding on a trust beneficiary who registers an objection. Subsection (b) [72-38-301(2)] implements cases such as Barber v. Barber, 837 P.2d 714 (Alaska 1992), which held that the a refusal to allow an objection by an adult competent remainder beneficiary violated due process.

Subsection (c) [72-38-301(3)] implements the policy of Sections 411 [72-38-411] and 602 [72-38-602] requiring express authority in the power of attorney or approval of court before the settlor's agent, conservator or guardian may consent on behalf of the settlor to the termination or revocation of the settlor's revocable trust.

2004 Amendment. For an explanation of the new subsection (d) and of the bracketed language in subsection (c), see the comment to the amendment to Section 411 [72-38-411].

72-38-302. Representation by holder of general testamentary power of appointment.

Official Comments

This section specifies the circumstances under which a holder of a general testamentary power of appointment may receive notices on behalf of and otherwise represent and bind persons whose interests are subject to the power, whether as permissible appointees, takers in default, or otherwise. Such representation is allowed except to the extent there is a conflict of interest with respect to the particular matter or dispute. Typically, the holder of a general testamentary power of appointment is also a life income beneficiary of the trust, oftentimes of a trust intended to qualify for the federal estate tax marital deduction. See I.R.C. §2056(b)(5). Without the exception for conflict of interest, the holder of the power could act in a way that could enhance the holder's income interests to the detriment of the appointees or takers in default, whoever they may be.

72-38-303. Representation by fiduciaries and parents.

Official Comments

This section allows for representation of persons by their fiduciaries (conservators, guardians, agents, trustees, and personal representatives), a principle that has long been part of the law. Paragraph (6) [72-38-303(6)], which allows parents to represent their children, is more recent, having originated in 1969 upon approval of the Uniform Probate Code. This section is not limited to representation of beneficiaries. It also applies to representation of the settlor. Representation is not available if the fiduciary or parent is in a conflict position with respect to the particular matter or dispute, however. A typical conflict would be where the fiduciary or parent seeking to represent the beneficiary is either the trustee or holds an adverse beneficial interest.

Paragraph (2) [72-38-303(2)] authorizes a guardian to bind and represent a ward if a conservator of the ward's estate has not been appointed. Granting a guardian authority to represent the ward with respect to interests in the trust can avoid the need to seek appointment of a conservator. This grant of authority to act with respect to the ward's trust interest may broaden the authority of a guardian in some States although not in States that have adopted the Section 1-403 of the Uniform Probate Code, from which this section was derived. Under the Uniform Trust Code, a "conservator" is appointed by the court to manage the ward's property, a "guardian" to make decisions with respect to the ward's personal affairs. See Section 103 [72-38-103].

Paragraph (3) [72-38-303(3)] authorizes an agent to represent a principal only to the extent the agent has authority to act with respect to the particular question or dispute. Pursuant to Sections 411 [72-38-411] and 602 [72-38-602], an agent may represent a settlor with respect to the amendment, revocation or termination of the trust only to the extent this authority is expressly granted either in the trust or the power. Otherwise, depending on the particular question or dispute, a general grant of authority in the power may be sufficient to confer the necessary authority.

72-38-304. Representation by person having substantially identical interest.

Official Comments

This section authorizes a person with a substantially identically [identical] interest with respect to a particular question or dispute to represent and bind an otherwise unrepresented minor, incapacitated or unborn individual, or person whose location is unknown and not reasonably ascertainable. This section is derived from Section 1-403(2)(iii) of the Uniform Probate Code, but with several modifications. Unlike the UPC, this section does not expressly require that the representation be adequate, the drafters preferring to leave this issue to the courts. Furthermore, this section extends the doctrine of virtual representation to representation of minors and incapacitated individuals. Finally, this section does not apply to the extent there is a conflict of interest between the representative and the person represented.

Restatement (First) of Property §§181 and 185 (1936) provide that virtual representation is inapplicable if the interest represented was not sufficiently protected. Representation is deemed sufficiently protective as long as it does not appear that the representative acted in hostility to the interest of the person represented. Restatement (First) of Property §185 (1936). Evidence of inactivity or lack of skill is material only to the extent it establishes such hostility. Restatement (First) of Property §185 cmt. b (1936).

Typically, the interests of the representative and the person represented will be identical. A common example would be a trust providing for distribution to the settlor's children as a class, with an adult child being able to represent the interests of children who are either minors or unborn. Exact identity of interests is not required, only substantial identity with respect to the particular question or dispute. Whether such identity is present may depend on the nature of the interest. For example, a presumptive remaindermen may be able to represent alternative remaindermen with respect to approval of a trustee's report but not with respect to interpretation of the remainder provision or termination of the trust. Even if the beneficial interests of the representative and person represented are identical, representation is not allowed in the event of conflict of interest. The representative may have interests outside of the trust that are adverse to the interest of the person represented, such as a prior relationship with the trustee or other beneficiaries. See Restatement (First) of Property §185 cmt. d (1936).

72-38-305. Appointment of representative.

Official Comments

This section is derived from Section 1-403(4) of the Uniform Probate Code. However, this section substitutes "representative" for "guardian ad litem" to signal that a representative under this Code serves a different role. Unlike a guardian ad litem, under this section a representative can be appointed to act with respect to a nonjudicial settlement or to receive a notice on a beneficiary's behalf. Furthermore, in making decisions, a representative may consider general benefit accruing to living members of the family. "Representative" is placed in brackets in case the enacting jurisdiction prefers a different term. The court may appoint a representative to act for a person even if the person could be represented under another section of this article.

Part 4
Creation, Validity, Modification, and Termination of Trust

Part Official Comments

Sections 401 [72-38-401] through 409 [72-38-409], which specify the requirements for the creation of a trust, largely codify traditional doctrine. Section 401 [72-38-401] specifies the methods by which trusts are created, that is, by transfer of property, self-declaration, or exercise of a power of appointment. Whatever method may have been employed, other requirements, including intention, capacity and, for certain types of trusts, an ascertainable beneficiary, also must be satisfied before a trust is created. These requirements are listed in Section 402 [72-38-402]. Section 403 [72-38-403] addresses the validity in the enacting jurisdiction of trusts created in other jurisdictions. A trust not created by will is validly created if its creation complied with the law of specified jurisdictions in which the settlor or trustee had a significant contact. Section 404 [72-38-404] forbids trusts for illegal or impossible purposes, and requires that a trust and its terms must be for the benefit of its beneficiaries. Section 405 [72-38-405] recites the permitted purposes of a charitable trust. Section 406 [72-38-406] lists some of the grounds for contesting a trust. Section 407 [not adopted] validates oral trusts. The remaining sections address what are often referred to as "honorary" trusts, although such trusts are valid and enforceable under this Code. Section 408 [72-38-408] covers a trust for the care of an animal; Section 409 [72-38-409] allows creation of a trust for another noncharitable purpose such as maintenance of a cemetery lot.

Sections 410 [72-38-410] through 417 [72-38-417] provide a series of interrelated rules on when a trust may be terminated or modified other than by its express terms. The overall objective of these sections is to enhance flexibility consistent with the principle that preserving the settlor's intent is paramount. Termination or modification may be allowed upon beneficiary consent if the court concludes that the trust or a particular provision no longer achieves a material purpose or if the settlor concurs (Section 411) [72-38-411], by the court in response to unanticipated circumstances or due to ineffective administrative terms (Section 412) [72-38-412], or by the court or trustee if continued administration under the trust's existing terms would be uneconomical (Section 414) [72-38-414]. A trust may be reformed to correct a mistake of law or fact (Section 415) [72-38-415], or modified to achieve the settlor's tax objectives (Section 416) [72-38-416]. Trusts may be combined or divided (Section 417) [72-38-417]. A trustee or beneficiary has standing to petition the court with respect to a proposed termination or modification (Section 410) [72-38-410].

Section 413 [72-38-413] codifies and at the same time modifies the doctrine of cy pres, at least as applied in most States. The Uniform Trust Code authorizes the court to apply cy pres not only if the original means becomes impossible or unlawful but also if the means become impracticable or wasteful. Section 413 [72-38-413] also creates a presumption of general charitable intent. Upon failure of the settlor's original plan, the court cannot divert the trust property to a noncharity unless the terms of the trust expressly so provide. Furthermore, absent a contrary provision in the terms of the trust, limits are placed on when a gift over to a noncharity can take effect upon failure or impracticality of the original charitable purpose. The gift over is effective only if, when the provision takes effect, the trust property is to revert to the settlor and the settlor is still living, or fewer than 21 years have elapsed since the date of the trust's creation.

The requirements for a trust's creation, such as the necessary level of capacity and the requirement that a trust have a legal purpose, are controlled by statute and common law, not by the settlor. See Section 105(b)(1), (3) [72-38-105(2)(a), (2)(c)]. Nor may the settlor negate the court's ability to modify or terminate a trust as provided in Sections 410 [72-38-410] through 416 [72-38-416]. See Section 105(b)(4) [72-38-105(2)(d)]. However, a settlor is free to restrict or modify the trustee's power to terminate an uneconomic trust as provided in Sections 414 [72-38-414], and the trustee's power to combine and divide trusts as provided in Section 417 [72-38-417].

CASES DECIDED AFTER ADOPTION OF 1989 TRUST CODE

Dismissal Proper — Trustee of Invalid Trust Not Real Party in Interest: The plaintiff purchased real property from the defendants and requested that the defendants name him as a "trustee" in the deed based upon legal advice the plaintiff had received years ago in another state. Subsequently, the plaintiff, as a "trustee", sued the defendants for property damages and asserted numerous tort claims. The District Court granted summary judgment to the defendants under former Rule 17(a), M.R.Civ.P. (now superseded), on the basis that the plaintiff was not the trustee of any valid trust and, therefore, was not a real party in interest. The Supreme Court affirmed, concluding that the District Court properly determined that the plaintiff was not the trustee of a valid trust and that the plaintiff could have saved the lawsuit from dismissal simply by suing in the plaintiff's individual capacity, rather than as the "trustee" of an invalid trust. Boehm v. Cokedale, LLC, 2011 MT 224, 362 Mont. 65, 261 P.3d 994.

Living Trust — Judicial Construction of Amendment so as to Give Effect to All Provisions: Clifford and his wife Mary established a living trust for the benefit of their family. The trust documents provided that major modifications to the trust should be made through the formal amendment process but that minor modifications could be made through trust minutes. Other trust documents provided that amendments had to be made by Clifford and Mary acting together, and the first page of the trust minutes provided that instructions to successor trustees must be signed and dated by the trust settlors. The District Court found that the fourth trust minute, amending other trust documents so as to convey the 120-acre farm on which Clifford and Mary lived to Mary, to be valid and binding. The Supreme Court held that the fourth trust minute, which was signed only by Clifford, was invalid because a construction of all of the other provisions of the trust dealing with amendments and the provisions of 1-4-101 required that the fourth trust minute be signed by both Clifford and Mary. Consequently, the Supreme Court held that the farm remained in the separate property trust and was conveyed to the children of Clifford and Mary and not to Mary alone. In re Estate of Dern, 279 M 138, 928 P2d 123, 53 St. Rep. 1087 (1996).

CASES DECIDED PRIOR TO ADOPTION OF 1989 TRUST CODE

Property Transfer Required to Establish Trust — Trust Agreement Alone Insufficient: In a case applying the 1981 version of 72-20-107 and 72-20-108 (both now repealed) in determining whether a trust agreement itself would qualify as an instrument of conveyance to create a valid trust, the Supreme Court first noted that, absent a transfer of property, no trust of property is created. Here, the trust agreement in question did not properly describe the property within the document itself or attach a description as an exhibit when the document was signed; therefore, the trust failed to convey the property at its execution. An attachment could have validated the trust agreement as an instrument of conveyance only if the person executing the document were to have redelivered, confirmed, ratified, or adopted the transfer, but there was no evidence of that having occurred. The express trust at issue was invalid because there was no transfer of property into the trust. McCormick v. Brevig, 1999 MT 86, 294 M 144, 980 P2d 603, 56 St. Rep. 355 (1999), following In re Estate of Severson, 459 NW 2d 473 (Iowa 1990), and followed in Cate-Schweyen v. Cate, 2000 MT 345, 303 M 232, 15 P3d 467, 57 St. Rep. 1478 (2000).

Objection to Termination of Trust Barred by Laches: Where 4 years after appellant's appointment as trustee appellant objected to the termination of a trust on the grounds that the decree of distribution made 32 years earlier was based on fraud and offered no reasonable explanation for his failure to earlier file an objection, the appellant would be barred by laches from objecting to the petition for termination of the trust. In re Estate of Wallace v. McAlear, 186 M 18, 606 P2d 136 (1980).

Resulting Trust as Equitable Mortgage: When a conveyance is executed from the vendor direct to the lender to secure a loan of the purchase money made by him to the purchaser, the legal title is held not only for the lender as security but also in trust for the borrower for the purpose of finally having title go to him. Therefore, the transaction between the parties constitutes a resulting trust in the form of an equitable mortgage. Bermes v. Sylling, 179 M 448, 587 P2d 377 (1978).

Life Income Sole Purpose — Termination: Where sole purpose and object of trust was payment of income for life to testator's wife, mother, sister, and son, and such obligations were either fulfilled or no longer possible to fulfill, Trial Court properly terminated trust. Testamentary Trust of Child, 153 M 349, 457 P2d 447 (1969).

Reservation of Power of Revocation: The right to reserve the power to revoke and still establish a valid trust is well established in the law of trusts, and the right is recognized by 72-23-502 (now repealed). Investors Stock Fund, Inc. v. Roberts, 179 F. Supp. 185 (D.C. Mont. 1959), affirmed in 286 F2d 647 (9th Cir. 1961).

Forfeiture of Option: Neighboring ranchers signed a writing, agreeing to become equal partners in purchase of adjoining grazing leases and ranch lands. Each contributed $1,000 to bind a 1-year purchase option covering lands and leases. They forfeited the option and option payment but continued their joint activities. Nine months after forfeiture one partner purchased all for himself, taking title jointly with his wife, and they in turn deeded a portion to their son. The wife and son, as donees, were controlled by the donor's actions. Bradbury v. Nagelhus, 132 M 417, 319 P2d 503 (1957).

Involuntary Trust: An involuntary trust may be revoked only by agreement or by the Courts. Bradbury v. Nagelhus, 132 M 417, 319 P2d 503 (1957).

Revocation of Trust: Once there is acceptance, actual or presumed, a trust may be revoked only by agreement or by the Courts. Bradbury v. Nagelhus, 132 M 417, 319 P2d 503 (1957).

Breach of Law: A resulting trust does not spring from a contract between the parties but arises from a breach of law and the acts of the parties. State ex rel. Gallatin County High School v. Brandenburg, 107 M 199, 82 P2d 593 (1938).

Existence of Relationship: Section 72-20-208 (now repealed) by its express terms applies after the relation of trustee and beneficiary has been created, as distinguished from the operation of 28-2-804, in a case where the transactions under consideration were those whereby the relation of trustee and beneficiary was created. Hodgkiss v. Northland Petroleum Consol., 104 M 328, 67 P2d 811 (1937).

Statutes to Be Construed Together: In determining what constitutes a trust and the manner of its creation, 72-20-107 and 72-24-101 through 72-24-103 (now repealed) must be construed together. Hodgkiss v. Northland Petroleum Consol., 104 M 328, 67 P2d 811 (1937).

Security for Unpaid Balance: If a trust is created to secure to the beneficiary an unpaid balance due him, he can take advantage of it at any time before its rescission. Willoburn Ranch Co. v. Yegen, 45 M 254, 122 P 915 (1912).

Destruction of Contingent Interest by Termination of a Trust, Goff, 31 Mont. L. Rev. 83 (1969).

72-38-401. Methods of creating trust.

Official Comments

This section is based on Restatement (Third) of Trusts Section 10 (Tentative Draft No. 1, approved 1996), and Restatement (Second) of Trusts Section 17 (1959). Under the methods specified for creating a trust in this section, a trust is not created until it receives property. For what constitutes an adequate property interest, see Restatement (Third) of Trusts Sections 40-41 (Tentative Draft No. 2, approved 1999); Restatement (Second) of Trusts Sections 74-86 (1959). The property interest necessary to fund and create a trust need not be substantial. A revocable designation of the trustee as beneficiary of a life insurance policy or employee benefit plan has long been understood to be a property interest sufficient to create a trust. See Section 103(12) [72-38-103(15)] ("property" defined). Furthermore, the property interest need not be transferred contemporaneously with the signing of the trust instrument. A trust instrument signed during the settlor's lifetime is not rendered invalid simply because the trust was not created until property was transferred to the trustee at a much later date, including by contract after the settlor's death. A pourover devise to a previously unfunded trust is also valid and may constitute the property interest creating the trust. See Unif. Testamentary Additions to Trusts Act Section 1 (1991), codified at Uniform Probate Code Section 2-511 (pourover devise to trust valid regardless of existence, size, or character of trust corpus). See also Restatement (Third) of Trusts Section 19 (Tentative Draft No. 1, approved 1996).

While this section refers to transfer of property to a trustee, a trust can be created even though for a period of time no trustee is in office. See Restatement (Third) of Trusts Section 2 cmt. g (Tentative Draft No. 1, approved 1996); Restatement (Second) of Trusts Section 2 cmt. i (1959). A trust can also be created without notice to or acceptance by a trustee or beneficiary. See Restatement (Third) of Trusts Section 14 (Tentative Draft No. 1, approved 1996); Restatement (Second) of Trusts Sections 35-36 (1959).

The methods specified in this section are not exclusive. Section 102 [72-38-102] recognizes that trusts can also be created by special statute or court order. See also Restatement (Third) of Trusts Section 1 cmt. a (Tentative Draft No. 1, approved 1996); Unif. Probate Code Section 2-212 (elective share of incapacitated surviving spouse to be held in trust on terms specified in statute); Unif. Probate Code Section 5-411(a)(4) (conservator may create trust with court approval);

Restatement (Second) of Trusts Section 17 cmt. i (1959) (trusts created by statutory right to bring wrongful death action).

A trust can also be created by a promise that creates enforceable rights in a person who immediately or later holds these rights as trustee. See Restatement (Third) of Trusts Section 10(e) (Tentative Draft No. 1, approved 1996). A trust thus created is valid notwithstanding that the trustee may resign or die before the promise is fulfilled. Unless expressly made personal, the promise can be enforced by a successor trustee. For examples of trusts created by means of promises enforceable by the trustee, see Restatement (Third) of Trusts Section 10 cmt. g (Tentative Draft No. 1, approved 1996); Restatement (Second) of Trusts Sections 14 cmt. h, 26 cmt. n (1959).

A trust created by self-declaration is best created by reregistering each of the assets that comprise the trust into the settlor's name as trustee. However, such reregistration is not necessary to create the trust. See, e.g., In re Estate of Heggstad, 20 Cal. Rptr. 2d 433 (Ct. App. 1993); Restatement (Third) of Trusts Section 10 cmt. e (Tentative Draft No. 1, approved 1996); Restatement (Second) of Trusts Section 17 cmt. a (1959). A declaration of trust can be funded merely by attaching a schedule listing the assets that are to be subject to the trust without executing separate instruments of transfer. But such practice can make it difficult to later confirm title with third party transferees and for this reason is not recommended.

While a trust created by will may come into existence immediately at the testator's death and not necessarily only upon the later transfer of title from the personal representative, Section 701 [72-38-701] makes clear that the nominated trustee does not have a duty to act until there is an acceptance of the trusteeship, express or implied. To avoid an implied acceptance, a nominated testamentary trustee who is monitoring the actions of the personal representative but who has not yet made a final decision on acceptance should inform the beneficiaries that the nominated trustee has assumed only a limited role. The failure so to inform the beneficiaries could result in liability if misleading conduct by the nominated trustee causes harm to the trust beneficiaries. See Restatement (Third) of Trusts Section 35 cmt. b (Tentative Draft No. 2, approved 1999).

While this section confirms the familiar principle that a trust may be created by means of the exercise of a power of appointment (paragraph (3)) [72-38-401(3)], this Code does not legislate comprehensively on the subject of powers of appointment but addresses only selected issues. See Sections 302 [72-38-302] (representation by holder of general testamentary power of appointment); 505(b) [72-38-505(2)] (creditor claims against holder of power of withdrawal); and 603(b) [72-38-603(2)] (rights of holder of power of withdrawal). For the law on powers of appointment generally, see Restatement (Second) of Property: Donative Transfers Sections 11.1-24.4 (1986); Restatement (Third) of Property: Wills and Other Donative Transfers (in progress).

CASES DECIDED AFTER ADOPTION OF 1989 TRUST CODE

Express Trust Relationship Between Hutterite Colony and Colony Members: The District Court overruled a hearings examiner's findings that an express trust existed between an incorporated Hutterite Colony and the colony members. On appeal, the Supreme Court applied neutral secular principles of law to this church property dispute and reversed. All colony property was held in the name of the corporation under a communal property arrangement wherein all colony members shared their productivity and no one owned individual property. The articles of incorporation provided that the colony was devoted exclusively to agricultural pursuits for the livelihood of its members, and corporate assets were held in trust for the benefit of colony members and their heirs. Thus, an express trust existed between the colony and its members, and as trustee, the colony had a duty to administer the trust in the interest of its members as beneficiaries. The hearings examiner's findings that a trust existed was supported by substantial credible evidence, and the District Court erred in overturning those findings. In re Fair Hearing of Hofer v. Dept. of Public Health and Human Services, 2005 MT 302, 329 M 368, 124 P3d 1098 (2005), following Second Int'l Baha'i Council v. Chase, 2005 MT 30, 326 M 41, 106 P3d 1168 (2005).

Handwritten "Irrevocable Trust Reserving Income for Life" — Failure for Lack of Transfer of Property — No Resulting Trust or Constructive Trust Imposed: In anticipation of remarriage, the decedent, an attorney, drafted a handwritten document purporting to "sell, assign and convey" various mineral interests to a trust for the benefit of his daughters from his first marriage. The decedent never transferred or conveyed the named mineral interests to the trust or otherwise delivered the trust property to the named trustee. At the time of death, his wife, as personal representative of the estate, refused to convey the alleged trust property upon request of the daughters. The daughters sued, maintaining that the handwritten trust document was testamentary in nature and that therefore the personal representative must fund the testamentary trust with the mineral interests owned by the decedent at the time of his death. The personal representative argued that the document was not a valid testamentary trust and was intended to create an inter vivos trust, which was never executed by conveying or otherwise transferring the interests to the trust or the trustee. The District Court granted summary judgment for the daughters, concluding that the handwritten trust document was testamentary. The Supreme Court reversed, holding that the inter vivos trust document failed because of the lack of a transfer of property to the trust during the decedent's lifetime. The document was not testamentary because the document did not first and foremost express a clear and unmistakable intent that the trust would not take effect until the testator's death. Rather, the document convincingly displays all attributes of an inter vivos transaction that the trustor intended would take place at the time that the document was drafted or soon thereafter. Even if a resulting trust was imposed, the result would be the same, with the mineral interests returning to the trustor's estate. The other type of involuntary trust, a constructive trust, was not argued by the daughters and is therefore not available as an equitable remedy. Cate-Schweyen v. Cate, 2000 MT 345, 303 M 232, 15 P3d 467, 57 St. Rep. 1478 (2000).

Transfer of Property for Creation of Trust Not Included in General Power of Attorney: Jameison appointed her granddaughter, Bolich, as "true and lawful attorney", granting her authority to generally act in Jameison's stead "in all matters affecting my business or property". Bolich created a trust agreement naming Jameison the income beneficiary for life and Bolich as trustee and designating Jameison's two daughters as income beneficiaries during their lives in the event that they survived Jameison. The trust agreement provided for distribution of the trust principal for the health, maintenance, and welfare of the income beneficiaries at the trustee's discretion, and upon the death of the last income beneficiary, the trust was to dissolve, with the remainder distributed to Bolich or her estate. Bolich then conveyed all of Jameison's real property, including over 30 parcels, and personal property, including several certificates of deposit and promissory notes, to herself. Jameison died a few months later, and one daughter died shortly thereafter. Over 7 years later, Bolich distributed $100 in trust income to the remaining daughter, who was unhappy with the accounting and challenged the validity of the trust agreement, moving for summary judgment on grounds that Bolich did not have authority under the power of attorney to create it, citing a lack of evidence of Jameison's intent to create the trust and the fact that the trust agreement and conveyance documents were signed solely by Bolich and not by Jameison. The District Court found that Bolich's assertions regarding Jameison's intent were purely speculative and that Bolich had failed to produce any evidence that Jameison had intended to create the trust. The court concluded that the general power of attorney did not specifically authorize Bolich to create the trust and that Bolich exceeded her authority in doing so. The trust was invalidated and terminated, and the estate was distributed pursuant to the laws of intestacy. Bolich appealed. The Supreme Court affirmed. In this case, the power of attorney was broad and general but did not grant authority to create a trust, reflect Jameison's intent to create a trust, or even mention a trust, so Bolich's transfer of Jameison's property to herself as trustee was not warranted by the terms actually used in the power of attorney or as a means of executing other authority. The trust was not created by one of the methods in 72-33-201 (now repealed) and was invalid. Bolich's argument that the trust was ratified pursuant to 28-10-211 by Jameison's oral authorization also failed because ratification of a trust must be accomplished in writing pursuant to 72-33-208 (now repealed). Absent material facts regarding the validity of the trust, summary judgment invalidating the trust was proper. In re Trust of Jameison v. Bolich, 2000 MT 190, 300 M 418, 8 P3d 83, 57 St. Rep. 753 (2000), distinguishing McLaren Gold Mines Co. v. Morton, 124 M 382, 224 P2d 975 (1951).

CASES DECIDED PRIOR TO ADOPTION OF 1989 TRUST CODE

Delivery by Trustee of Trust Document to Trustor's Attorney: T.K. Laursen executed a deed conveying real property to his son Orville. On the same day, Orville executed a document acknowledging that the property had been conveyed to him to be held in trust for his father. T.K. Laursen did not sign the second document. The trust document was delivered by Orville to T.K. Laursen's lawyer. In a dispute over the legal ownership of the property, the Supreme Court ruled that the fact that the trust document had been given to T.K. Laursen's attorney for safekeeping was an act that tended to show that T.K. intended a trust to be created. McCaffrey v. Laursen, 215 M 305, 697 P2d 103, 42 St. Rep. 378 (1985).

Acceptance of Mineral Interest Assignment Presumed Because Beneficial to Trust: In 1954, Fitzpatrick and three other parties entered into an operating agreement concerning the working interest in an oil and gas lease. The agreement included a clause giving each party a preferential right to purchase the working interest of any other party. In 1969, Fitzpatrick divided his interest into three parts. He assigned one-third to his wife, reserved one-third in himself, and assigned one-third in four equal parts to four trusts which he had created for his four children. In 1972, Fitzpatrick signed a quitclaim assignment of whatever working interest he had to Youngblood, successor in interest to one of the four parties to the 1954 agreement. Youngblood had acquired similar quitclaim assignments from the other two parties to the original agreement. Believing that he owned 100% of the working interest in the lease, Youngblood began development of oil and gas wells on the land. The land became productive in 1972. In 1975, Youngblood, concerned about whether or not he had acquired all of Fitzpatrick's interest, had Fitzpatrick and his wife sign letters to ratify that Youngblood had acquired all their working interest in 1972. The Fitzpatrick children, as beneficiaries of the trusts, refused to sign similar letters. Youngblood then filed an action to quiet title to the working interest in him. The District Court found for Youngblood, ruling that the 1969 assignment was invalid for failure of delivery, failure of acceptance, and for retention of dominion and control over the working interest by Fitzpatrick. The Supreme Court reversed. The court ruled that Fitzpatrick's intent in making the 1969 assignment was to transfer income from oil and gas production to his wife and four children and that delivery was therefore complete. Acceptance of the assignment may be presumed because the net effect of the assignment was beneficial to the trusts. The court further ruled that there was not sufficient evidence that Fitzpatrick retained dominion and control over the working interests after the 1969 assignment. Finally the court ruled that the parties did not intend the preferential purchase clause to apply to a transfer without consideration between family members, so Youngblood was not entitled to enforce that clause. Exeter Exploration Co. v. Fitzpatrick, 202 M 209, 661 P2d 1255, 40 St. Rep. 38 (1983).

Delivery of Property: When a mother upon her deathbed delivered a quantity of jewelry to her daughter-in-law with instruction to turn it over to her surviving husband to be in turn delivered to their sons when old enough to appreciate the gift, the result of the transaction was the creation of a voluntary trust, which was not terminated by the death of the father before the trust was executed, the Court in such a case having power to appoint a trustee to carry it out. Stagg v. Stagg, 90 M 180, 300 P 539 (1931).

Stockholders' Agreement: An agreement between preferred stockholders that each should lend a certain proportion of a sum of money to the corporation, and that certain shares of common stock held by one of their number in trust for distribution as a bonus to parties lending such money should immediately upon making the loan become the property of the lenders, and be divided according to the proportion of said sum lent by each, did not create a trust or make the holder of the certificates of stock a trustee for the benefit of his fellow signers; the mere fact that the holder of the stock retained possession of the certificates representing such stock as a mere stakeholder does not make him such a trustee. Crosby v. Robbins, 56 M 179, 182 P 122 (1919); Asbury v. Robbins, 56 M 195, 182 P 126 (1919); Hanson v. Robbins, 56 M 196, 182 P 126 (1919).

Elements of Express Trust: An instrument claimed by plaintiff to have created an express trust in real property in his favor which neither indicated an intention on the part of the plaintiff to create a trust nor showed that defendant was accepting or acknowledging the existence of one, nor the purpose of its creation, nor what disposition defendant was to make of the property, was insufficient to constitute the latter a trustee as alleged. Mantle v. White, 47 M 234, 132 P 22 (1913).

Attorney General's Opinions

Highway Right-of-Way — Abandonment vs. Sale — Funds Held in Trust: The Code provisions regarding abandonment are to be followed when the Highway Commission (now Transportation Commission) relinquishes a right-of-way easement. Under the facts giving rise to this opinion, the Highway Department (now Department of Transportation) received $1.8 million from the Anaconda Company to be used for alternative traffic facilities upon abandonment of the right-of-way. The Highway Department (now Department of Transportation) has authority to hold such funds in trust for Butte-Silver Bow. 38 A.G. Op. 57 (1979).

72-38-402. Requirements for creation.

Official Comments

Subsection (a) [72-38-402(1)] codifies the basic requirements for the creation of a trust. To create a valid trust, the settlor must indicate an intention to create a trust. See Restatement (Third) of Trusts Section 13 (Tentative Draft No. 1, approved 1996); Restatement (Second) of Trusts Section 23 (1959). But only such manifestations of intent as are admissible as proof in a judicial proceeding may be considered. See Section 103(18) [72-38-103(21)] ("terms of a trust" defined).

To create a trust, a settlor must have the requisite mental capacity. To create a revocable or testamentary trust, the settlor must have the capacity to make a will. To create an irrevocable trust, the settlor must have capacity during lifetime to transfer the property free of trust. See Section 601 (capacity of settlor to create revocable trust), and see generally Restatement (Third) of Trusts Section 11 (Tentative Draft No. 1, approved 1996); Restatement (Second) of Trusts Sections 18-22 (1959); and Restatement (Third) of Property: Wills and Other Donative Transfers Section 8.1 (Tentative Draft No. 3, 2001).

Subsection (a)(3) [72-38-402(1)(c)] requires that a trust, other than a charitable trust, a trust for the care of an animal, or a trust for another valid noncharitable purpose, have a definite beneficiary. While some beneficiaries will be definitely ascertained as of the trust's creation, subsection (b) [72-38-402(2)] recognizes that others may be ascertained in the future as long as this occurs within the applicable perpetuities period. The definite beneficiary requirement does not prevent a settlor from making a disposition in favor of a class of persons. Class designations are valid as long as the membership of the class will be finally determined within the applicable perpetuities period. For background on the definite beneficiary requirement, see Restatement (Third) of Trusts Sections 44-46 (Tentative Draft No. 2, approved 1999); Restatement (Second) of Trusts Sections 112-122 (1959).

Subsection (a)(4) [72-38-402(1)(d)] recites standard doctrine that a trust is created only if the trustee has duties to perform. See Restatement (Third) of Trusts Section 2 (Tentative Draft No. 1, approved 1996); Restatement (Second) of Trusts Section 2 (1959). Trustee duties are usually active, but a validating duty may also be passive, implying only that the trustee has an obligation not to interfere with the beneficiary's enjoyment of the trust property. Such passive trusts, while valid under this Code, may be terminable under the enacting jurisdiction's Statute of Uses. See Restatement (Third) of Trusts Section 6 (Tentative Draft No. 1, approved 1996); Restatement (Second) of Trusts Sections 67-72 (1959).

Subsection (a)(5) [72-38-402(1)(e)] addresses the doctrine of merger, which, as traditionally stated, provides that a trust is not created if the settlor is the sole trustee and sole beneficiary of all beneficial interests. The doctrine of merger has been inappropriately applied by the courts in some jurisdictions to invalidate self-declarations of trust in which the settlor is the sole life beneficiary but other persons are designated as beneficiaries of the remainder. The doctrine of merger is properly applicable only if all beneficial interests, both life interests and remainders, are vested in the same person, whether in the settlor or someone else. An example of a trust to which the doctrine of merger would apply is a trust of which the settlor is sole trustee, sole beneficiary for life, and with the remainder payable to the settlor's probate estate. On the doctrine of merger generally, see Restatement (Third) of Trusts Section 69 (Tentative Draft No. 3, 2001); Restatement (Second) of Trusts Section 341 (1959).

Subsection (c) [72-38-402(3)] allows a settlor to empower the trustee to select the beneficiaries even if the class from whom the selection may be made cannot be ascertained. Such a provision would fail under traditional doctrine; it is an imperative power with no designated beneficiary capable of enforcement. Such a provision is valid, however, under both this Code and the Restatement, if there is at least one person who can meet the description. If the trustee does not exercise the power within a reasonable time, the power fails and the property will pass by resulting trust. See Restatement (Third) of Trusts Section 46 (Tentative Draft No. 2, approved 1999). See also Restatement (Second) of Trusts Section 122 (1959); Restatement (Second) of Property: Donative Transfers Section 12.1 cmt. e (1986).

CASES DECIDED AFTER ADOPTION OF 1989 TRUST CODE

Handwritten "Irrevocable Trust Reserving Income for Life" — Failure for Lack of Transfer of Property — No Resulting Trust or Constructive Trust Imposed: In anticipation of remarriage, the decedent, an attorney, drafted a handwritten document purporting to "sell, assign and convey" various mineral interests to a trust for the benefit of his daughters from his first marriage. The decedent never transferred or conveyed the named mineral interests to the trust or otherwise delivered the trust property to the named trustee. At the time of death, his wife, as personal representative of the estate, refused to convey the alleged trust property upon request of the daughters. The daughters sued, maintaining that the handwritten trust document was testamentary in nature and that therefore the personal representative must fund the testamentary trust with the mineral interests owned by the decedent at the time of his death. The personal representative argued that the document was not a valid testamentary trust and was intended to create an inter vivos trust, which was never executed by conveying or otherwise transferring the interests to the trust or the trustee. The District Court granted summary judgment for the daughters, concluding that the handwritten trust document was testamentary. The Supreme Court reversed, holding that the inter vivos trust document failed because of the lack of a transfer of property to the trust during the decedent's lifetime. The document was not testamentary because the document did not first and foremost express a clear and unmistakable intent that the trust would not take effect until the testator's death. Rather, the document convincingly displays all attributes of an inter vivos transaction that the trustor intended would take place at the time that the document was drafted or soon thereafter. Even if a resulting trust was imposed, the result would be the same, with the mineral interests returning to the trustor's estate. The other type of involuntary trust, a constructive trust, was not argued by the daughters and is therefore not available as an equitable remedy. Cate-Schweyen v. Cate, 2000 MT 345, 303 M 232, 15 P3d 467, 57 St. Rep. 1478 (2000).

Transfer of Property for Creation of Trust Not Included in General Power of Attorney: Jameison appointed her granddaughter, Bolich, as "true and lawful attorney", granting her authority to generally act in Jameison's stead "in all matters affecting my business or property". Bolich created a trust agreement naming Jameison the income beneficiary for life and Bolich as trustee and designating Jameison's two daughters as income beneficiaries during their lives in the event that they survived Jameison. The trust agreement provided for distribution of the trust principal for the health, maintenance, and welfare of the income beneficiaries at the trustee's discretion, and upon the death of the last income beneficiary, the trust was to dissolve, with the remainder distributed to Bolich or her estate. Bolich then conveyed all of Jameison's real property, including over 30 parcels, and personal property, including several certificates of deposit and promissory notes, to herself. Jameison died a few months later, and one daughter died shortly thereafter. Over 7 years later, Bolich distributed $100 in trust income to the remaining daughter, who was unhappy with the accounting and challenged the validity of the trust agreement, moving for summary judgment on grounds that Bolich did not have authority under the power of attorney to create it, citing a lack of evidence of Jameison's intent to create the trust and the fact that the trust agreement and conveyance documents were signed solely by Bolich and not by Jameison. The District Court found that Bolich's assertions regarding Jameison's intent were purely speculative and that Bolich had failed to produce any evidence that Jameison had intended to create the trust. The court concluded that the general power of attorney did not specifically authorize Bolich to create the trust and that Bolich exceeded her authority in doing so. The trust was invalidated and terminated, and the estate was distributed pursuant to the laws of intestacy. Bolich appealed. The Supreme Court affirmed. In this case, the power of attorney was broad and general but did not grant authority to create a trust, reflect Jameison's intent to create a trust, or even mention a trust, so Bolich's transfer of Jameison's property to herself as trustee was not warranted by the terms actually used in the power of attorney or as a means of executing other authority. The trust was not created by one of the methods in 72-33-201 (now repealed) and was invalid. Bolich's argument that the trust was ratified pursuant to 28-10-211 by Jameison's oral authorization also failed because ratification of a trust must be accomplished in writing pursuant to 72-33-208 (now repealed). Absent material facts regarding the validity of the trust, summary judgment invalidating the trust was proper. In re Trust of Jameison v. Bolich, 2000 MT 190, 300 M 418, 8 P3d 83, 57 St. Rep. 753 (2000), distinguishing McLaren Gold Mines Co. v. Morton, 124 M 382, 224 P2d 975 (1951).

Precatory Language Not Sufficient to Create Trust: The children of the testator brought an action to have the District Court declare that the language of the will, which left everything to the testator's father or in the event of his death to the testator's stepmother and which stated that the testator had confidence that his father or stepmother would use the estate in the best interests of his children, in reality created a trust in behalf of the testator's children. The Supreme Court, stating that the principles of trust law existing before the adoption of the new trust code were still applicable, held that the language used by the decedent clearly and unambiguously made an outright gift to his father and in default to his stepmother and specifically excluded his children and that therefore the statement of the reasons for doing so by the decedent did not limit the testamentary gift and a trust was not created. In re Estate of Bolinger, 284 M 114, 943 P2d 981, 54 St. Rep. 799 (1997).

Whether Language in Will Creates Trust Is Question of Law and Is Determined by Intent of Testator — Burden to Prove Existence of Trust on Party Claiming Trust's Existence — Legal Principles Existing Before Adoption of New Trust Code Still Applicable: The children of the testator brought an action to have the District Court declare that the language of the will, which left everything to the testator's father or in the event of his death to the testator's stepmother and which stated that the testator had confidence that his father or stepmother would use the estate in the best interests of his children, in reality created a trust in behalf of the testator's children. The Supreme Court, stating that the principles of trust law existing before the adoption of the new trust code were still applicable, held that the question of whether any specific language in the will created a trust was a question of law for a court to decide and that a trust can be created only if the court finds that the testator intended to create a trust. The Supreme Court further stated that the object therefore of a judicial interpretation of a will is to ascertain the intention of the testator deduced from a consideration of the whole instrument and a comparison of its various parts in light of the situation and circumstances surrounding the testator when the instrument was framed. The Supreme Court also affirmed earlier cases holding that the burden of proof to establish the existence of a trust is on the party who claims it and must be founded on clear and convincing evidence. In re Estate of Bolinger, 284 M 114, 943 P2d 981, 54 St. Rep. 799 (1997).

CASES DECIDED PRIOR TO ADOPTION OF 1989 TRUST CODE

Property Transfer Required to Establish Trust — Trust Agreement Alone Insufficient: In a case applying the 1981 version of 72-20-107 and 72-20-108 (both now repealed) in determining whether a trust agreement itself would qualify as an instrument of conveyance to create a valid trust, the Supreme Court first noted that, absent a transfer of property, no trust of property is created. Here, the trust agreement in question did not properly describe the property within the document itself or attach a description as an exhibit when the document was signed; therefore, the trust failed to convey the property at its execution. An attachment could have validated the trust agreement as an instrument of conveyance only if the person executing the document were to have redelivered, confirmed, ratified, or adopted the transfer, but there was no evidence of that having occurred. The express trust at issue was invalid because there was no transfer of property into the trust. McCormick v. Brevig, 1999 MT 86, 294 M 144, 980 P2d 603, 56 St. Rep. 355 (1999), following In re Estate of Severson, 459 NW 2d 473 (Iowa 1990), and followed in Cate-Schweyen v. Cate, 2000 MT 345, 303 M 232, 15 P3d 467, 57 St. Rep. 1478 (2000).

Delivery by Trustee of Trust Document to Trustor's Attorney: T.K. Laursen executed a deed conveying real property to his son Orville. On the same day, Orville executed a document acknowledging that the property had been conveyed to him to be held in trust for his father. T.K. Laursen did not sign the second document. The trust document was delivered by Orville to T.K. Laursen's lawyer. In a dispute over the legal ownership of the property, the Supreme Court ruled that the fact that the trust document had been given to T.K. Laursen's attorney for safekeeping was an act that tended to show that T.K. intended a trust to be created. McCaffrey v. Laursen, 215 M 305, 697 P2d 103, 42 St. Rep. 378 (1985).

Intent to Create — May Be Express or Implied: Intent to establish a voluntary trust may be express or implied. However, clear and convincing evidence establishing intent is required. McCaffrey v. Laursen, 215 M 305, 697 P2d 103, 42 St. Rep. 378 (1985).

Intention to Create: The transaction between an insolvent grain warehouseman and the state Department of Agriculture, whereby the former did no more than assent to the taking over of its property (other than stored grain) by the Department, may not, in an action for the conversion of such property, be held to show the creation of a trust in the Department in favor of holders of unredeemed storage tickets where the complaint did not disclose an intention on the part of the supposed trustor to create a trust or a designation of the beneficiaries (72-20-107 and 72-20-108, now repealed). Hence, the District Court did not err in sustaining a demurrer (demurrer abolished, former Rule 7(c), M.R.Civ.P., now superseded) to the complaint seeking to recover on the theory that at the time of its seizure by the Sheriff, plaintiff was entitled to the possession of the property. (Associate Justices Matthews and Ford dissenting.) Dept. of Agriculture, Labor and Industry v. DeVore, 91 M 47, 6 P2d 125 (1931).

72-38-403. Trusts created in other jurisdictions.

Official Comments

The validity of a trust created by will is ordinarily determined by the law of the decedent's domicile. No such certainty exists with respect to determining the law governing the validity of inter vivos trusts. Generally, at common law a trust was created if it complied with the law of the state having the most significant contacts to the trust. Contacts for making this determination include the domicile of the trustee, the domicile of the settlor at the time of trust creation, the location of the trust property, the place where the trust instrument was executed, and the domicile of the beneficiary. See 5A Austin Wakeman Scott & William Franklin Fratcher, The Law of Trusts Sections 597, 599 (4th ed. 1987). Furthermore, if the trust has contacts with two or more states, one of which would validate the trust's creation and the other of which would deny the trust"s validity, the tendency is to select the law upholding the validity of the trust. See 5A Austin Wakeman Scott & William Franklin Fratcher, The Law of Trusts Section 600 (4th ed. 1987).

Section 403 [72-38-403] extends the common law rule by validating a trust if its creation complies with the law of any of a variety of states in which the settlor or trustee had significant contacts. Pursuant to Section 403 [72-38-403], a trust not created by will is validly created if its creation complies with the law of the jurisdiction in which the trust instrument was executed, or the law of the jurisdiction in which, at the time of creation the settlor was domiciled, had a place of abode, or was a national; the trustee was domiciled or had a place of business; or any trust property was located.

Section 403 [72-38-403] is comparable to Section 2-506 of the Uniform Probate Code, which validates wills executed in compliance with the law of a variety of places in which the testator had a significant contact. Unlike the UPC, however, Section 403 [72-38-403] is not limited to execution of the instrument but applies to the entire process of a trust's creation, including compliance with the requirement that there be trust property. In addition, unlike the UPC, Section 403 [72-38-403] validates a trust valid under the law of the domicile or place of business of the designated trustee, or if valid under the law of the place where any of the trust property is located.

The section does not supersede local law requirements for the transfer of real property, such that title can be transferred only by recorded deed.

72-38-404. Trust purposes.

Official Comments

For an explication of the requirement that a trust must not have a purpose that is unlawful or against public policy, see Restatement (Third) of Trusts §§27-30 (Tentative Draft No. 2, approved 1999); Restatement (Second) of Trusts §§59-65 (1959). A trust with a purpose that is unlawful or against public policy is invalid. Depending on when the violation occurred, the trust may be invalid at its inception or it may become invalid at a later date. The invalidity may also affect only particular provisions. Generally, a trust has a purpose which is illegal if (1) its performance involves the commission of a criminal or tortious act by the trustee; (2) the settlor's purpose in creating the trust was to defraud creditors or others; or (3) the consideration for the creation of the trust was illegal. See Restatement (Third) of Trusts §28 cmt. a (Tentative Draft No. 2, approved 1999); Restatement (Second) of Trusts §60 cmt. a (1959). Purposes violative of public policy include those that tend to encourage criminal or tortious conduct, that interfere with freedom to marry or encourage divorce, that limit religious freedom, or which are frivolous or capricious. See Restatement (Third) of Trusts §29 cmt. d-h (Tentative Draft No. 2, 1999); Restatement (Second) of Trusts §62 (1959).

Pursuant to Section 402(a) [72-38-402(1)], a trust must have an identifiable beneficiary unless the trust is of a type that does not have beneficiaries in the usual sense, such as a charitable trust or, as provided in Sections 408 [72-38-408] and 409 [72-38-409], trusts for the care of an animal or other valid noncharitable purpose. The general purpose of trusts having identifiable beneficiaries is to benefit those beneficiaries in accordance with their interests as defined in the trust's terms. The requirement of this section that a trust and its terms be for the benefit of its beneficiaries, which is derived from Restatement (Third) of Trusts §27(2) (Tentative Draft No. 2, approved 1999), implements this general purpose. While a settlor has considerable latitude in specifying how a particular trust purpose is to be pursued, the administrative and other nondispositive trust terms must reasonably relate to this purpose and not divert the trust property to achieve a trust purpose that is invalid, such as one which is frivolous or capricious. See Restatement (Third) of Trusts §27 cmt. b (Tentative Draft No. 2, approved 1999).

Section 412(b) [72-38-412(2)], which allows the court to modify administrative terms that are impracticable, wasteful, or impair the trust's administration, is a specific application of the requirement that a trust and its terms be for the benefit of the beneficiaries. The fact that a settlor suggests or directs an unlawful or other inappropriate means for performing a trust does not invalidate the trust if the trust has a substantial purpose that can be achieved by other methods. See Restatement (Third) of Trusts §28 cmt. e (Tentative Draft No. 2, approved 1999).

Case Notes

CASES DECIDED PRIOR TO ADOPTION OF 1989 TRUST CODE

Equal Protection — Discrimination in Private Trust Not Illegal Absent State Action: A trust that was created to provide stipends to male members of Future Farmers of America and 4-H clubs, although clearly discriminatory, did not violate the equal protection clause of the United States Constitution. A private person may dispose of his money or property as he wishes and in so doing may lawfully discriminate without offending the due process clause as long as the state and its instrumentalities are not involved. In re Will of Cram, 186 M 37, 606 P2d 145 (1980).

Conveyance by Trustee Under Will:

A will devising one-half of the residuary estate to a trustee with directions to pay income to testator's daughter for a certain period and directing trustee to "convey and transfer the corpus" as provided therein was not invalid under 72-24-103 (now repealed) as being a trust to convey. In re Strode's Estate, 118 M 540, 167 P2d 579 (1946).

Testator creating a trust and having the right to say to whom the real property shall belong may also provide in the trust that the trustee at the termination thereof shall convey the property. In re Strode's Estate, 118 M 540, 167 P2d 579 (1946).

Trustee of Express Trust Allowed to Maintain Action in His Own Name: When a collection agent took assignments of claims against a debtor "in trust", he could maintain suit thereon in his own name as trustee of express trust. Rae v. Cameron, 112 M 159, 114 P2d 1060 (1941), overruling Streetbeck v. Benson, 107 M 110, 80 P2d 861 (1938) and N. Mont. Ass'n of Credit Men v. Hauge, 111 M 56, 105 P2d 1102 (1940).

72-38-405. Charitable purposes — enforcement.

Official Comments

The required purposes of a charitable trust specified in subsection (a) [72-38-405(1)] restate the well-established categories of charitable purposes listed in Restatement (Third) of Trusts §28 (Tentative Draft No. 3, approved 2001), and Restatement (Second) of Trusts §368 (1959), which ultimately derive from the Statute of Charitable Uses, 43 Eliz. I, c.4 (1601). The directive to the courts to validate purposes the achievement of which are beneficial to the community has proved to be remarkably adaptable over the centuries. The drafters concluded that it should not be disturbed.

Charitable trusts are subject to the restriction in Section 404 [72-38-404] that a trust purpose must be legal and not contrary to public policy. This would include trusts that involve invidious discrimination. See Restatement (Third) of Trusts §28 cmt. f (Tentative Draft No. 3, 2001).

Under subsection (b) [72-38-405(2)], a trust that states a general charitable purpose does not fail if the settlor neglected to specify a particular charitable purpose or organization to receive distributions. The court may instead validate the trust by specifying particular charitable purposes or recipients, or delegate to the trustee the framing of an appropriate scheme. See Restatement (Second) of Trusts §397 cmt. d (1959). Subsection (b) [72-38-405(2)] of this section is a corollary to Section 413 [72-38-413], which states the doctrine of cy pres. Under Section 413(a) [72-38-413(1)], a trust failing to state a general charitable purpose does not fail upon failure of the particular means specified in the terms of the trust. The court must instead apply the trust property in a manner consistent with the settlor's charitable purposes to the extent they can be ascertained.

Subsection (b) [72-38-405(2)] does not apply to the long-established estate planning technique of delegating to the trustee the selection of the charitable purposes or recipients. In that case, judicial intervention to supply particular terms is not necessary to validate the creation of the trust. The necessary terms instead will be supplied by the trustee. See Restatement (Second) of Trusts §396 (1959). Judicial intervention under subsection (b) [72-38-405(2)] will become necessary only if the trustee fails to make a selection. See Restatement (Second) of Trusts §397 cmt. d (1959). Pursuant to Section 110(b) [72-38-110(2)], the charitable organizations selected by the trustee would not have the rights of qualified beneficiaries under this Code because they are not expressly designated to receive distributions under the terms of the trust.

Contrary to Restatement (Second) of Trusts §391 (1959), subsection (c) [72-38-405(3)] grants a settlor standing to maintain an action to enforce a charitable trust. The grant of standing to the settlor does not negate the right of the state attorney general or persons with special interests to enforce either the trust or their interests. For the law on the enforcement of charitable trusts, see Susan N. Gary, Regulating the Management of Charities: Trust Law, Corporate Law, and Tax Law, 21 U. Hawaii L. Rev. 593 (1999).

Charitable Trust: A trustee of property dedicated to a charitable purpose is obligated to follow the directions of the trustor and to use ordinary care and diligence in the execution of the trust. Howard v. Sisters of Charity of Leavenworth, 193 F. Supp. 191 (D.C. Mont. 1961).

72-38-406. Creation of trust induced by fraud, duress, or undue influence.

Official Comments

This section is a specific application of Restatement (Third) of Trusts §12 (Tentative Draft No. 1, approved 1996), and Restatement (Second) of Trusts §333 (1959), which provide that a trust can be set aside or reformed on the same grounds as those which apply to a transfer of property not in trust, among which include undue influence, duress, and fraud, and mistake. This section addresses undue influence, duress, and fraud. For reformation of a trust on grounds of mistake, see Section 415 [72-38-415]. See also Restatement (Third) of Property: Wills and Other Donative Transfers §8.3 (Tentative Draft No. 3, approved 2001), which closely tracks the language above. Similar to a will, the invalidity of a trust on grounds of undue influence, duress, or fraud may be in whole or in part.

72-38-407. Statute of frauds.

Official Comments

[Note: Section 407 in the Uniform Trust Code allows for the creation of an oral trust, as established by clear and convincing evidence. This section was not adopted.]

While it is always advisable for a settlor to reduce a trust to writing, the Uniform Trust Code follows established law in recognizing oral trusts. Such trusts are viewed with caution, however. The requirement of this section that an oral trust can be established only by clear and convincing evidence is a higher standard than is in effect in many States. See Restatement (Third) of Trusts §20 Reporter's Notes (Tentative Draft No. 1, approved 1996).

Absent some specific statutory provision, such as a provision requiring that transfers of real property be in writing, a trust need not be evidenced by a writing. States with statutes of frauds or other provisions requiring that the creation of certain trusts must be evidenced by a writing may wish specifically to cite such provisions.

For the Statute of Frauds generally, see Restatement (Second) of Trusts §§40-52 (1959). For a description of what the writing must contain, assuming that a writing is required, see Restatement (Third) of Trusts §22 (Tentative Draft No. 1, approved 1996); Restatement (Second) of Trusts §46-49 (1959). For a discussion of when the writing must be signed, see Restatement (Third) of Trusts §23 (Tentative Draft No. 1, approved 1996); Restatement (Second) of Trusts §41-42 (1959). For the law of oral trusts, see Restatement (Third) of Trusts §20 (Tentative Draft No. 1, approved 1996); Restatement (Second) of Trusts §§43-45 (1959).

CASES DECIDED AFTER ADOPTION OF 1989 TRUST CODE

Transfer of Property for Creation of Trust Not Included in General Power of Attorney: Jameison appointed her granddaughter, Bolich, as "true and lawful attorney", granting her authority to generally act in Jameison's stead "in all matters affecting my business or property". Bolich created a trust agreement naming Jameison the income beneficiary for life and Bolich as trustee and designating Jameison's two daughters as income beneficiaries during their lives in the event that they survived Jameison. The trust agreement provided for distribution of the trust principal for the health, maintenance, and welfare of the income beneficiaries at the trustee's discretion, and upon the death of the last income beneficiary, the trust was to dissolve, with the remainder distributed to Bolich or her estate. Bolich then conveyed all of Jameison's real property, including over 30 parcels, and personal property, including several certificates of deposit and promissory notes, to herself. Jameison died a few months later, and one daughter died shortly thereafter. Over 7 years later, Bolich distributed $100 in trust income to the remaining daughter, who was unhappy with the accounting and challenged the validity of the trust agreement, moving for summary judgment on grounds that Bolich did not have authority under the power of attorney to create it, citing a lack of evidence of Jameison's intent to create the trust and the fact that the trust agreement and conveyance documents were signed solely by Bolich and not by Jameison. The District Court found that Bolich's assertions regarding Jameison's intent were purely speculative and that Bolich had failed to produce any evidence that Jameison had intended to create the trust. The court concluded that the general power of attorney did not specifically authorize Bolich to create the trust and that Bolich exceeded her authority in doing so. The trust was invalidated and terminated, and the estate was distributed pursuant to the laws of intestacy. Bolich appealed. The Supreme Court affirmed. In this case, the power of attorney was broad and general but did not grant authority to create a trust, reflect Jameison's intent to create a trust, or even mention a trust, so Bolich's transfer of Jameison's property to herself as trustee was not warranted by the terms actually used in the power of attorney or as a means of executing other authority. The trust was not created by one of the methods in 72-33-201 (now repealed) and was invalid. Bolich's argument that the trust was ratified pursuant to 28-10-211 by Jameison's oral authorization also failed because ratification of a trust must be accomplished in writing pursuant to 72-33-208 (now repealed). Absent material facts regarding the validity of the trust, summary judgment invalidating the trust was proper. In re Trust of Jameison v. Bolich, 2000 MT 190, 300 M 418, 8 P3d 83, 57 St. Rep. 753 (2000), distinguishing McLaren Gold Mines Co. v. Morton, 124 M 382, 224 P2d 975 (1951).

CASES DECIDED PRIOR TO ADOPTION OF 1989 TRUST CODE

No Express or Constructive Trust: Testimony that decedent conveyed certain land to Lohrke and later made an oral statement that decedent wanted the land to go to his children was insufficient to create a voluntary or express trust involving real property. No constructive trust existed because Lohrke and decedent were close friends and the property was voluntarily transferred to Lohrke without his knowledge. A constructive trust requires fraud, mistake, undue influence, violation of a trust, or other wrongful acts. Eckart v. Hubbard, 184 M 320, 602 P2d 988 (1979).

Statute of Frauds: A trust created by operation of law does not come under the Statute of Frauds and may be proved by parol evidence. Cremer v. Cremer Rodeo Land and Livestock Co., 181 M 87, 592 P2d 485 (1979).

Writing Required in Express Trust:

Where there was no writing embodying an alleged "specific understanding and agreement", there could be no enforcement of a trust since, as the trust was pleaded, it was based on parol and void under the Statute of Frauds. Platts v. Platts, 134 M 474, 334 P2d 722 (1959).

Where, in an action to compel a reconveyance of certain trust property on the ground that the purpose of the trust had been fully accomplished, defendant in his answer recognized the original contract by which the trust was created and the property conveyed as valid but set up title to the property by virtue of a subsequent contract, he could not thereafter contend that the original contract was void because it was not in writing. Willoburn Ranch Co. v. Yegen, 49 M 101, 140 P 231 (1914).

An express trust cannot be based upon an oral agreement. Lynch v. Herrig, 32 M 267, 80 P 240 (1905).

Resulting Trust: Since a resulting trust in realty arises not out of a contract but by operation of law, it may be proved by parol evidence, the Statute of Frauds not applying. Campanello v. Mercer, 124 M 528, 227 P2d 312 (1951); Wilson v. Wilson, 64 M 533, 210 P 896 (1922).

Elements of Proof to Establish Resulting Trust: Where it is sought to establish a resulting trust by reason of a conveyance made by or on behalf of a husband to his wife, the evidence establishing such trust must be clear, convincing, and practically free from doubt, especially so where the wife is dead and the husband must establish his case by his own testimony as to oral conversations between himself and deceased. Humbird v. Arnet, 99 M 499, 44 P2d 756 (1935); Clary v. Fleming, 60 M 246, 198 P 546 (1921).

Writing Not Required: A voluntary trust may be created orally when the subject matter is personal property; it is a device by which the donor effectuates a gift either of property or of its beneficial use and enjoyment to a designated donee. Stagg v. Stagg, 90 M 180, 300 P 539 (1931).

Created by Operation of Law: When a transfer of real property is made to one person and the consideration therefor is paid by or for another, a trust is presumed to result in favor of him by or for whom such payment is made; such resulting trust is created by operation of law and not by contract and may be proved by parol evidence. McQuay v. McQuay, 81 M 311, 263 P 683 (1928).

72-38-408. Trust for care of animal.

Official Comments

This section and the next section of the Code validate so called honorary trusts. Unlike honorary trusts created pursuant to the common law of trusts, which are arguably no more than powers of appointment, the trusts created by this and the next section are valid and enforceable. For a discussion of the common law doctrine, see Restatement (Third) of Trusts §47 (Tentative Draft No. 2, approved 1999); Restatement (Second) of Trusts §124 (1959).

This section addresses a particular type of honorary trust, the trust for the care of an animal. Section 409 [72-38-409] specifies the requirements for trusts without ascertainable beneficiaries that are created for other noncharitable purposes. A trust for the care of an animal may last for the life of the animal. While the animal will ordinarily be alive on the date the trust is created, an animal may be added as a beneficiary after that date as long as the addition is made prior to the settlor's death. Animals in gestation but not yet born at the time of the trust's creation may also be covered by its terms. A trust authorized by this section may be created to benefit one designated animal or several designated animals.

Subsection (b) [72-38-408(2)] addresses enforcement. Noncharitable trusts ordinarily may be enforced by their beneficiaries. Charitable trusts may be enforced by the State's attorney general or by a person deemed to have a special interest. See Restatement (Second) of Trusts §391 (1959). But at common law, a trust for the care of an animal or a trust without an ascertainable beneficiary created for a noncharitable purpose was unenforceable because there was no person authorized to enforce the trustee's obligations.

Sections 408 [72-38-408] and 409 [72-38-409] close this gap. The intended use of a trust authorized by either section may be enforced by a person designated in the terms of the trust or, if none, by a person appointed by the court. In either case, Section 110(b) [72-38-110(2)] grants to the person appointed the rights of a qualified beneficiary for the purpose of receiving notices and providing consents. If the trust is created for the care of an animal, a person with an interest in the welfare of the animal has standing to petition for an appointment. The person appointed by the court to enforce the trust should also be a person who has exhibited an interest in the animal's welfare. The concept of granting standing to a person with a demonstrated interest in the animal's welfare is derived from the Uniform Guardianship and Protective Proceedings Act, which allows a person interested in the welfare of a ward or protected person to file petitions on behalf of the ward or protected person. See, e.g., Uniform Probate Code §§5-210(b), 5-414(a).

Subsection (c) [72-38-408(3)] addresses the problem of excess funds. If the court determines that the trust property exceeds the amount needed for the intended purpose and that the terms of the trust do not direct the disposition, a resulting trust is ordinarily created in the settlor or settlor's successors in interest. See Restatement (Third) of Trusts §47 (Tentative Draft No. 2, approved 1999); Restatement (Second) of Trusts §124 (1959). Successors in interest include the beneficiaries under the settlor's will, if the settlor has a will, or in the absence of an effective will provision, the settlor's heirs. The settlor may also anticipate the problem of excess funds by directing their disposition in the terms of the trust. The disposition of excess funds is within the settlor's control. See Section 105(a) [72-38-105(1)]. While a trust for an animal is usually not created until the settlor's death, subsection (a) [72-38-408(1)] allows such a trust to be created during the settlor's lifetime. Accordingly, if the settlor is still living, subsection (c) [72-38-408(3)] provides for distribution of excess funds to the settlor, and not to the settlor's successors in interest.

Should the means chosen not be particularly efficient, a trust created for the care of an animal can also be terminated by the trustee or court under Section 414 [72-38-414].

Termination of a trust under that section, however, requires that the trustee or court develop an alternative means for carrying out the trust purposes. See Section 414(c) [72-38-414(3)].

This section and the next section are suggested by Section 2-907 of the Uniform Probate Code, but much of this and the following section is new.

72-38-409. Noncharitable trust without ascertainable beneficiary.

Official Comments

This section authorizes two types of trusts without ascertainable beneficiaries; trusts for general but noncharitable purposes, and trusts for a specific noncharitable purpose other than the care of an animal, on which see Section 408 [72-38-408]. Examples of trusts for general noncharitable purposes include a bequest of money to be distributed to such objects of benevolence as the trustee might select. Unless such attempted disposition was interpreted as charitable, at common law the disposition was honorary only and did not create a trust. Under this section, however, the disposition is enforceable as a trust for a period of up to 21 years, although that number is placed in brackets to indicate that States may wish to select a different time limit.

The most common example of a trust for a specific noncharitable purpose is a trust for the care of a cemetery plot. The lead-in language to the section recognizes that some special purpose trusts, particularly those for care of cemetery plots, are subject to other statutes. Such legislation will typically endeavor to facilitate perpetual care as opposed to care limited to 21 years as under this section.

For the requirement that a trust, particularly the type of trust authorized by this section, must have a purpose that is not capricious, see Section 404 [72-38-404] Comment. For examples of the types of trusts authorized by this section, see Restatement (Third) of Trusts §47 (Tentative Draft No. 2, approved 1999), and Restatement (Second) of Trusts §62 cmt. w and §124 (1959). The case law on capricious purposes is collected in 2 Austin W. Scott & William F. Fratcher, The Law of Trusts §124.7 (4th ed. 1987).

This section is similar to Section 408 [72-38-408], although less detailed. Much of the Comment to Section 408 [72-38-408] also applies to this section.

72-38-410. Modification or termination of trust — proceedings for approval or disapproval.

Official Comments

Subsection (a) [72-38-410(1)] lists the grounds on which trusts typically terminate. For a similar formulation, see Restatement (Third) of Trusts Section 61 (Tentative Draft No. 3, approved 2001). Terminations under subsection (a) [72-38-410(1)] may be in either in whole or in part. Other types of terminations, all of which require action by a court, trustee, or beneficiaries, are covered in Sections 411-414 [72-38-411 through 72-38-414], which also address trust modification. Of these sections, all but Section 411 [72-38-411] apply to charitable trusts and all but Section 413 [72-38-413] apply to noncharitable trusts.

Withdrawal of the trust property is not an event terminating a trust. The trust remains in existence although the trustee has no duties to perform unless and until property is later contributed to the trust.

Subsection (b) [72-38-410(2)] specifies the persons who have standing to seek court approval or disapproval of proposed trust modifications, terminations, combinations, or divisions. An approval or disapproval may be sought for an action that does not require court permission, including a petition questioning the trustee's distribution upon termination of a trust under $50,000 (Section 414) [72-38-414], and a petition to approve or disapprove a proposed trust division or consolidation (Section 417) [72-38-417]. Subsection (b) [72-38-410(2)] makes the settlor an interested person with respect to a judicial proceeding brought by the beneficiaries under Section 411 [72-38-411] to terminate or modify a trust. Contrary to Restatement (Second) of Trusts Section 391 (1959), subsection (b) [72-38-410(2)] grants a settlor standing to petition the court under Section 413 [72-38-413] to apply cy pres to modify the settlor's charitable trust.

2004 Amendment. For an explanation of why a portion of subsection (b) [72-38-410(2)] has been placed in brackets, see the comment to the 2004 Amendment to Section 411 [72-38-411].

72-38-411. Modification or termination of irrevocable trust by consent.

Official Comments

This section describes the circumstances in which termination or modification of a noncharitable irrevocable trust may be compelled by the beneficiaries, with or without the concurrence of the settlor. For provisions governing modification or termination of trusts without the need to seek beneficiary consent, see Sections 412 [72-38-412] (modification or termination due to unanticipated circumstances or inability to administer trust effectively), 414 [72-38-414] (termination or modification of uneconomic noncharitable trust), and 416 [72-38-416] (modification to achieve settlor's tax objectives). If the trust is revocable by the settlor, the method of revocation specified in Section 602 applies.

Subsection (a) [72-38-411(1)], which was placed in brackets pursuant to a 2004 amendment, states the test for termination or modification by the beneficiaries with the concurrence of the settlor. For an explanation of why subsection (a) [72-38-411(1)] has been placed in brackets, see the 2004 comment at the end of this section.

Subsection (b) [72-38-411(2)] states the test for termination or modification by unanimous consent of the beneficiaries without the concurrence of the settlor. The rules on trust termination in Subsections (a)-(b) [72-38-411(1)-(2)] carries forward the Claflin rule, first stated in the famous case of Claflin v. Claflin, 20 N.E. 454 (Mass. 1889). Subsection (c) [72-38-411(3)] addresses the effect of a spendthrift provision. Subsection (d) [72-38-411(4)] directs how the trust property is to be distributed following a termination under either subsection (a) [72-38-411(1)] or (b) [72-38-411(2)]. Subsection (e) [72-38-411(5)] creates a procedure for judicial approval of a proposed termination or modification when the consent of less than all of the beneficiaries is available.

Under this section, a trust may be modified or terminated over a trustee's objection. However, pursuant to Section 410 [72-38-410], the trustee has standing to object to a proposed termination or modification.

The settlor's right to join the beneficiaries in terminating or modifying a trust under this section does not rise to the level of a taxable power. See Treas. Reg. Section 20.2038-1(a)(2). No gift tax consequences result from a termination as long as the beneficiaries agree to distribute the trust property in accordance with the value of their proportionate interests.

The provisions of Article 3 [Title 72, ch. 38, pt. 3] on representation, virtual representation and the appointment and approval of representatives appointed by the court apply to the determination of whether all beneficiaries have signified consent under this section. The authority to consent on behalf of another person, however, does not include authority to consent over the other person's objection. See Section 301(b) [72-38-301(2)]. Regarding the persons who may consent on behalf of a beneficiary, see Sections 302 [72-38-302] through 305 [72-38-305]. A consent given by a representative is invalid to the extent there is a conflict of interest between the representative and the person represented. Given this limitation, virtual representation of a beneficiary's interest by another beneficiary pursuant to Section 304 [72-38-304] will rarely be available in a trust termination case, although it should be routinely available in cases involving trust modification, such as a grant to the trustee of additional powers. If virtual or other form of representation is unavailable, Section 305 [72-38-305] of the Code permits the court to appoint a representative who may give the necessary consent to the proposed modification or termination on behalf of the minor, incapacitated, unborn, or unascertained beneficiary. The ability to use virtual and other forms of representation to consent on a beneficiary's behalf to a trust termination or modification has not traditionally been part of the law, although there are some notable exceptions. Compare Restatement (Second) Section 337(1) (1959) (beneficiary must not be under incapacity), with Hatch v. Riggs National Bank, 361 F.2d 559 (D.C. Cir. 1966) (guardian ad litem authorized to consent on beneficiary's behalf).

Subsection (a) [72-38-411(1)] also addresses the authority of an agent, conservator, or guardian to act on a settlor's behalf. Consistent with Section 602 [72-38-602] on revocation or modification of a revocable trust, the section assumes that a settlor, in granting an agent general authority, did not intend for the agent to have authority to consent to the termination or modification of a trust, authority that could be exercised to radically alter the settlor's estate plan. In order for an agent to validly consent to a termination or modification of the settlor's revocable trust, such authority must be expressly conveyed either in the power or in the terms of the trust.

Subsection (a) [72-38-411(1)], however, does not impose restrictions on consent by a conservator or guardian, other than prohibiting such action if the settlor is represented by an agent. The section instead leaves the issue of a conservator's or guardian's authority to local law. Many conservatorship statutes recognize that termination or modification of the settlor's trust is a sufficiently important transaction that a conservator should first obtain the approval of the court supervising the conservatorship. See, e.g., Unif. Probate Code Section 5-411(a)(4). Because the Uniform Trust Code uses the term "conservator" to refer to the person appointed by the court to manage an individual's property (see Section 103(5) [72-38-103(5)]), a guardian may act on behalf of a settlor under this section only if a conservator has not been appointed.

Subsection (a) [72-38-411(1)] is similar to Restatement (Third) of Trusts Section 65(2) (Tentative Draft No. 3, approved 2001), and Restatement (Second) of Trusts Section 338(2) (1959), both of which permit termination upon joint action of the settlor and beneficiaries. Unlike termination by the beneficiaries alone under subsection (b) [72-38-411(2)], termination with the concurrence of the settlor does not require a finding that the trust no longer serves a material purpose. No finding of failure of material purpose is required because all parties with a possible interest in the trust's continuation, both the settlor and beneficiaries, agree there is no further need for the trust. Restatement Third goes further than subsection (b) of this section [72-38-411(2)] and Restatement Second, however, in also allowing the beneficiaries to compel termination of a trust that still serves a material purpose if the reasons for termination outweigh the continuing material purpose.

Subsection (b) [72-38-411(2)], similar to Restatement Third but not Restatement Second, allows modification by beneficiary action. The beneficiaries may modify any term of the trust if the modification is not inconsistent with a material purpose of the trust. Restatement Third, though, goes further than this Code in also allowing the beneficiaries to use trust modification as a basis for removing the trustee if removal would not be inconsistent with a material purpose of the trust. Under the Code, however, Section 706 [72-38-706] is the exclusive provision on removal of trustees. Section 706(b)(4) [72-38-706(2)(d)] recognizes that a request for removal upon unanimous agreement of the qualified beneficiaries is a factor for the court to consider, but before removing the trustee the court must also find that such action best serves the interests of all the beneficiaries, that removal is not inconsistent with a material purpose of the trust, and that a suitable cotrustee or successor trustee is available. Compare Section 706(b)(4) [72-38-706(2)(d)], with Restatement (Third) Section 65 cmt. f (Tentative Draft No. 3, approved 2001).

The requirement that the trust no longer serve a material purpose before it can be terminated by the beneficiaries does not mean that the trust has no remaining function. In order to be material, the purpose remaining to be performed must be of some significance:

Material purposes are not readily to be inferred. A finding of such a purpose generally requires some showing of a particular concern or objective on the part of the settlor, such as concern with regard to the beneficiary's management skills, judgment, or level of maturity. Thus, a court may look for some circumstantial or other evidence indicating that the trust arrangement represented to the settlor more than a method of allocating the benefits of property among multiple beneficiaries, or a means of offering to the beneficiaries (but not imposing on them) a particular advantage. Sometimes, of course, the very nature or design of a trust suggests its protective nature or some other material purpose. Restatement (Third) of Trusts Section 65 cmt. d (Tentative Draft No. 3, approved 2001).

Subsection (c) [72-38-411(3), adopted as modified] of this section deals with the effect of a spendthrift provision on the right of a beneficiary to concur in a trust termination or modification. By a 2004 amendment, subsection (c) has been placed in brackets and thereby made optional. Spendthrift terms have sometimes been construed to constitute a material purpose without inquiry into the intention of the particular settlor. For examples, see Restatement (Second) of Trusts Section 337 (1959); George G. Bogert & George T. Bogert, The Law of Trusts and Trustees Section 1008 (Rev. 2d ed. 1983); and 4 Austin W. Scott & William F. Fratcher, The Law of Trusts Section 337 (4th ed. 1989). This result is troublesome because spendthrift provisions are often added to instruments with little thought. Subsection (c), similar to Restatement (Third) of Trusts Section 65 cmt. e (Tentative Draft No. 3, approved 2001), does not negate the possibility that continuation of a trust to assure spendthrift protection might have been a material purpose of the particular settlor. The question of whether that was the intent of a particular settlor is instead a matter of fact to be determined on the totality of the circumstances.

Subsection (d) [72-38-411(4)] recognizes that the beneficiaries' power to compel termination of the trust includes the right to direct how the trust property is to be distributed. While subsection (a) [72-38-411(1)] requires the settlor's consent to terminate an irrevocable trust, the settlor does not control the subsequent distribution of the trust property. Once termination has been approved, how the trust property is to be distributed is solely for the beneficiaries to decide.

Subsection (e) [72-38-411(5)], similar to Restatement (Third) of Trusts Section 65 cmt. c (Tentative Draft No. 3, approved 2001), and Restatement (Second) of Trusts Sections 338(2) &

340(2) (1959), addresses situations in which a termination or modification is requested by less than all the beneficiaries, either because a beneficiary objects, the consent of a beneficiary cannot be obtained, or representation is either unavailable or its application uncertain. Subsection (e) [72-38-411(5)] allows the court to fashion an appropriate order protecting the interests of the nonconsenting beneficiaries while at the same time permitting the remainder of the trust property to be distributed without restriction. The order of protection for the nonconsenting beneficiaries might include partial continuation of the trust, the purchase of an annuity, or the valuation and cashout of the interest.

2003 Amendment. The amendment, which adds the language "modification or" to subsection (a) [72-38-411(1)], fixes an inadvertent omission. It was the intent of the drafting committee that an agent with authority or a conservator or guardian with the approval of the court be able to participate not only in a decision to terminate a trust but also in a decision to modify it.

2004 Amendments.

Section 411(a), Section 301(d), and Conforming Changes to Sections 301(c) and 410(b). Section 411(a) [72-38-411(1)] was amended in 2004 on the recommendation of the Estate and Gift Taxation Committee of the American College of Trust and Estate Counsel (ACTEC). Enacting jurisdictions now have several options all of which are indicated by brackets:

- delete subsection (a) [72-38-411(1)], meaning that the state's prior law would control on this issue.

- require court approval of the modification or termination.

- make the provision prospective and applicable only to irrevocable trusts created on or after the effective date or to revocable trusts that become irrevocable on or after the effective date of the provision.

- enact subsection (a) [72-38-411(1)] in its original form.

Section 411(a) [72-38-411(1)], as originally drafted did not require that a court approve a joint decision of the settlor and beneficiaries to terminate or modify an irrevocable trust. The ACTEC Committee was concerned that:

- Section 411(a) [72-38-411(1)], without amendment, could potentially result in the taxation for federal estate tax purposes of irrevocable trusts created in states which previously required that a court approve a settlor/beneficiary termination or modification; and

- Because of the ability of a settlor under Section 301[72-38-301] to represent and bind a beneficiary with respect to a termination or modification of an irrevocable trust, Section 411(a) [72-38-411(1)] might result in inclusion of the trust in the settlor's gross estate. New Section 301(d) [72-38-301(4)] eliminates the possibility of such representation.

The Drafting Committee recommends that all jurisdictions enact the amendment to Section 301(d) [72-38-301(4)]. The Drafting Committee recommends that jurisdictions conform Section 411(a) [72-38-411(1)] to prior law on whether or not court approval is necessary for the settlor and beneficiaries to jointly terminate or modify an irrevocable trust. If prior law is in doubt, the enacting jurisdiction may wish to make Section 411(a) [72-38-411(1)] prospective only. The enacting jurisdiction may also elect to delete Section 411(a) [72-38-411(1)].

States electing to delete Section 411(a) [72-38-411(1)] should also delete the cross-references to Section 411 found in Sections 301(c) [72-38-301(3)] and 410(b) [72-38-410(2)]. These cross-references have therefore been placed in brackets. States electing to delete Section 411(a) [72-38-411(1)] should also not enact Section 301(d) [72-38-301(4)], which for this reason has similarly been placed in brackets.

Section 411(c) Section 411(c) [72-38-411(3), adopted as modified], which by the 2004 amendment was placed in brackets and therefore made optional, provides that a spendthrift provision is not presumed to constitute a material purpose of the trust. Several states that have enacted the Code have not agreed with the provision and have either deleted it or have reversed the presumption. Given these developments, the Drafting Committee concluded that uniformity could not be achieved. The Joint Editorial Board for Uniform Trusts and Estates Acts, however, is of the view that the better approach is to enact subsection (c) in its original form for the reasons stated in the comment to this Section.

CASES DECIDED AFTER ADOPTION OF 1989 TRUST CODE

Termination of Family Trusts Proper Given Disintegration of Family — Distribution of Trust Property to Parents Affirmed: During the marriage, the parents set up two irrevocable trusts, with the children as beneficiaries, and each parent received annual distributions from one trust. When the marriage disintegrated, the husband moved to reclassify the corpuses of the trusts as marital assets and to distribute the trust assets between husband and wife. The District Court agreed that the purposes of the family trusts, which were for estate planning tools and to avoid probate and inheritance taxes, were no longer viable, so the court dissolved the trusts and distributed the trust assets between husband and wife pending appeal. The Supreme Court applied 72-33-413 (now repealed) and affirmed. Continuation of the trusts would have substantially impaired the purposes of the trusts, given the limited existence of other marital assets and the children's limited contributions of labor toward the acquisition and development of the trust property. Both husband and wife could possibly have experienced extreme detriment if the trust assets were not distributed as marital property, and the District Court did not err in doing so. In re Marriage of Epperson, 2005 MT 46, 326 M 142, 107 P3d 1268 (2005).

Material Purpose of Trust Frustrated — Modification of Trust for Appointment of Corporate Sole Trustee Proper: Eggebrecht died, leaving a wife and two young children. His wife was appointed personal representative of his intestate estate. Shortly after he died, Eggebrecht's parents filed several creditor's claims against the estate and sought to have a will, executed 10 years earlier, admitted to probate. The will left everything to Eggebrecht's brother and sisters and purported to disinherit any future spouse. Following lengthy litigation, the parties instead agreed to create an irrevocable trust, with the children as beneficiaries, the wife and mother as trustees, and the wife and both parents as trust advisers. About 3 years later, the wife sought funds from the trust to meet the children's needs, but her requests for disbursements were denied by the parents. The wife then petitioned to modify the trust, offering to resign as joint trustee and requesting substitution of a corporate trustee. One of the children gained majority during the pendency of the action and joined the suit with the wife, also expressing the belief that the solution was to have a corporate trustee administer the trust. The District Court found, and the Supreme Court agreed, that the true material purpose of the trust was to benefit the children by giving them support and maintenance and that that purpose was frustrated as a result of the joint trustees' inability to work together. Therefore, the reasons for modifying the trust to allow appointment of a corporate trustee outweighed the material purpose of having a trust adviser position, and the District Court properly exercised its discretion in eliminating the trust adviser position and appointing a corporate sole trustee. In re Eggebrecht Irrevocable Trust v. Eggebrecht, 2000 MT 189, 300 M 409, 4 P3d 1207, 57 St. Rep. 748 (2000).

72-38-412. Modification or termination because of unanticipated circumstances or inability to administer trust effectively.

Official Comments

This section broadens the court's ability to apply equitable deviation to terminate or modify a trust. Subsection (a) [72-38-412(1)] allows a court to modify the dispositive provisions of the trust as well as its administrative terms. For example, modification of the dispositive provisions to increase support of a beneficiary might be appropriate if the beneficiary has become unable to provide for support due to poor health or serious injury. Subsection (a) [72-38-412(1)] is similar to Restatement (Third) of Trusts Section 66(1) (Tentative Draft No. 3, approved 2001), except that this section, unlike the Restatement, does not impose a duty on the trustee to petition the court if the trustee is aware of circumstances justifying judicial modification. The purpose of the "equitable deviation" authorized by subsection (a) [72-38-412(1)] is not to disregard the settlor's intent but to modify inopportune details to effectuate better the settlor's broader purposes. Among other things, equitable deviation may be used to modify administrative or dispositive terms due to the failure to anticipate economic change or the incapacity of a beneficiary. For numerous illustrations, see Restatement (Third) of Trusts Section 66 cmt. b (Tentative Draft No. 3, approved 2001). While it is necessary that there be circumstances not anticipated by the settlor before the court may grant relief under subsection (a) [72-38-412(1)], the circumstances may have been in existence when the trust was created. This section thus complements Section 415 [72-38-415], which allows for reformation of a trust based on mistake of fact or law at the creation of the trust.

Subsection (b) [72-38-412(2)] broadens the court's ability to modify the administrative terms of a trust. The standard under subsection (b) [72-38-412(2)] is similar to the standard for applying cy pres to a charitable trust. See Section 413(a) [72-38-413(1)]. Just as a charitable trust may be modified if its particular charitable purpose becomes impracticable or wasteful, so can the administrative terms of any trust, charitable or noncharitable. Subsections (a) [72-38-412(1)] and (b) [72-38-412(2)] are not mutually exclusive. Many situations justifying modification of administrative terms under subsection (a) [72-38-412(1)] will also justify modification under subsection (b) [72-38-412(2)]. Subsection (b) [72-38-412(2)] is also an application of the requirement in Section 404 [72-38-404] that a trust and its terms must be for the benefit of its beneficiaries. See also Restatement (Third) of Trusts Section 27(2) & cmt. b (Tentative Draft No. 2, approved 1999). Although the settlor is granted considerable latitude in defining the purposes of the trust, the principle that a trust have a purpose which is for the benefit of its beneficiaries precludes unreasonable restrictions on the use of trust property. An owner's freedom to be capricious about the use of the owner's own property ends when the property is impressed with a trust for the benefit of others. See Restatement (Second) of Trusts Section 124 cmt. g (1959). Thus, attempts to impose unreasonable restrictions on the use of trust property will fail. See Restatement (Third) of Trusts Section 27 Reporter's Notes to cmt. b (Tentative Draft No. 2, approved 1999). Subsection (b), unlike subsection (a), does not have a direct precedent in the common law, but various states have insisted on such a measure by statute. See, e.g., Mo. Rev. Stat. Section 456.590.1.

Upon termination of a trust under this section, subsection (c) [72-38-412(3)] requires that the trust be distributed in a manner consistent with the purposes of the trust. As under the doctrine of cy pres, effectuating a distribution consistent with the purposes of the trust requires an examination of what the settlor would have intended had the settlor been aware of the unanticipated circumstances. Typically, such terminating distributions will be made to the qualified beneficiaries, often in proportion to the actuarial value of their interests, although the section does not so prescribe. For the definition of qualified beneficiary, see Section 103(13) [72-38-103(16)].

Modification under this section, because it does not require beneficiary action, is not precluded by a spendthrift provision.

72-38-413. Cy pres.

Official Comments

Subsection (a) [72-38-413(1)] codifies the court's inherent authority to apply cy pres. The power may be applied to modify an administrative or dispositive term. The court may order the trust terminated and distributed to other charitable entities. Partial termination may also be ordered if the trust property is more than sufficient to satisfy the trust's current purposes. Subsection (a) [72-38-413(1)], which is similar to Restatement (Third) of Trusts §67 (Tentative Draft No. 3, approved 2001), modifies the doctrine of cy pres by presuming that the settlor had a general charitable intent when a particular charitable purpose becomes impossible or impracticable to achieve. Traditional doctrine did not supply that presumption, leaving it to the courts to determine whether the settlor had a general charitable intent. If such an intent is found, the trust property is applied to other charitable purposes. If not, the charitable trust fails. See Restatement (Second) of Trusts §399 (1959). In the great majority of cases the settlor would prefer that the property be used for other charitable purposes. Courts are usually able to find a general charitable purpose to which to apply the property, no matter how vaguely such purpose may have been expressed by the settlor. Under subsection (a) [72-38-413(1)], if the particular purpose for which the trust was created becomes impracticable, unlawful, impossible to achieve, or wasteful, the trust does not fail. The court instead must either modify the terms of the trust or distribute the property of the trust in a manner consistent with the settlor's charitable purposes.

The settlor, with one exception, may mandate that the trust property pass to a noncharitable beneficiary upon failure of a particular charitable purpose. Responding to concerns about the clogging of title and other administrative problems caused by remote default provisions upon failure of a charitable purpose, subsection (b) [72-38-413(2)] invalidates a gift over to a noncharitable beneficiary upon failure of a particular charitable purpose unless the trust property is to revert to a living settlor or fewer than 21 years have elapsed since the trust's creation. Subsection (b) [72-38-413(2)] will not apply to a charitable lead trust, under which a charity receives payments for a term certain with a remainder to a noncharity. In the case of a charitable lead trust, the settlor's particular charitable purpose does not fail upon completion of the specified trust term and distribution of the remainder to the noncharity. Upon completion of the specified trust term, the settlor's particular charitable purpose has instead been fulfilled. For a discussion of the reasons for a provision such as subsection (b) [72-38-413(2)], see Ronald Chester, Cy Pres of Gift Over: The Search for Coherence in Judicial Reform of Failed Charitable Trusts, 23 Suffolk U. L. Rev. 41 (1989).

The doctrine of cy pres is applied not only to trusts, but also to other types of charitable dispositions, including those to charitable corporations. This section does not control dispositions made in nontrust form. However, in formulating rules for such dispositions, the courts often refer to the principles governing charitable trusts, which would include this Code.

For the definition of charitable purpose, see Section 405(a) [72-38-405(1)]. Pursuant to Sections 405(c) [72-38-405(3)] and 410(b) [72-38-410(2)], a petition requesting a court to enforce a charitable trust or to apply cy pres may be maintained by a settlor. Such actions can also be maintained by a cotrustee, the state attorney general, or by a person having a special interest in the charitable disposition. See Restatement (Second) of Trusts §391 (1959).

72-38-414. Modification or termination of uneconomic trust.

Official Comments

Subsection (a) [72-38-414(1), adopted as modified] assumes that a trust with a value of $50,000 or less is sufficiently likely to be inefficient to administer that a trustee should be able to terminate it without the expense of a judicial termination proceeding. The amount has been placed in brackets to signal to enacting jurisdictions that they may wish to designate a higher or lower figure. Because subsection (a) [72-38-414(1)] is a default rule, a settlor is free to set a higher or lower figure or to specify different procedures or to prohibit termination without a court order. See Section 105 [72-38-105] and Article 4 [Title 72, ch. 38, pt. 4] General Comment.

Subsection (b) [72-38-414(2)] allows the court to modify or terminate a trust if the costs of administration would otherwise be excessive in relation to the size of the trust. The court may terminate a trust under this section even if the settlor has forbidden it. See Section 105(b)(4) [72-38-105(2)(d)]. Judicial termination under this subsection may be used whether or not the trust is larger or smaller than $50,000.

When considering whether to terminate a trust under either subsection (a) [72-38-414(1)] or (b) [72-38-414(2)], the trustee or court should consider the purposes of the trust. Termination under this section is not always wise. Even if administrative costs may seem excessive in relation to the size of the trust, protection of the assets from beneficiary mismanagement may indicate that the trust be continued. The court may be able to reduce the costs of administering the trust by appointing a new trustee.

Upon termination of a trust under this section, subsection (c) [72-38-414(3)] requires that the trust property be distributed in a manner consistent with the purposes of the trust. In addition to outright distribution to the beneficiaries, Section 816(21) [72-38-816(21)] authorizes payment to be made by a variety of alternate payees. Distribution under this section will typically be made to the qualified beneficiaries in proportion to the actuarial value of their interests.

Even though not accompanied by the usual trappings of a trust, the creation and transfer of an easement for conservation or preservation will frequently create a charitable trust. The organization to whom the easement was conveyed will be deemed to be acting as trustee of what will ostensibly appear to be a contractual or property arrangement. Because of the fiduciary obligation imposed, the termination or substantial modification of the easement by the "trustee" could constitute a breach of trust. The drafters of the Uniform Trust Code concluded that easements for conservation or preservation are sufficiently different from the typical cash and securities found in small trusts that they should be excluded from this section, and subsection (d) [not adopted] so provides. Most creators of such easements, it was surmised, would prefer that the easement be continued unchanged even if the easement, and hence the trust, has a relatively low market value. For the law of conservation easements, see Restatement (Third) of Property: Servitudes §1.6 (2000).

While this section is not directed principally at honorary trusts, it may be so applied. See Sections 408 [72-38-408], 409 [72-38-409].

Because termination of a trust under this section is initiated by the trustee or ordered by the court, termination is not precluded by a spendthrift provision.

72-38-415. Reformation to correct mistakes.

Official Comments

Reformation of inter vivos instruments to correct a mistake of law or fact is a long-established remedy. Restatement (Third) of Property: Donative Transfers Section 12.1 (Tentative Draft No. 1, approved 1995), which this section copies, clarifies that this doctrine also applies to wills.

This section applies whether the mistake is one of expression or one of inducement. A mistake of expression occurs when the terms of the trust misstate the settlor's intention, fail to include a term that was intended to be included, or include a term that was not intended to be included. A mistake in the inducement occurs when the terms of the trust accurately reflect what the settlor intended to be included or excluded but this intention was based on a mistake of fact or law. See Restatement (Third) of Property: Donative Transfers Section 12.1 cmt. i (Tentative Draft No. 1, approved 1995). Mistakes of expression are frequently caused by scriveners' errors while mistakes of inducement often trace to errors of the settlor.

Reformation is different from resolving an ambiguity. Resolving an ambiguity involves the interpretation of language already in the instrument. Reformation, on the other hand, may involve the addition of language not originally in the instrument, or the deletion of language originally included by mistake, if necessary to conform the instrument to the settlor's intent. Because reformation may involve the addition of language to the instrument, or the deletion of language that may appear clear on its face, reliance on extrinsic evidence is essential. To guard against the possibility of unreliable or contrived evidence in such circumstance, the higher standard of clear and convincing proof is required. See Restatement (Third) of Property: Donative Transfers Section 12.1 cmt. e (Tentative Draft No. 1, approved 1995).

In determining the settlor's original intent, the court may consider evidence relevant to the settlor's intention even though it contradicts an apparent plain meaning of the text. The objective of the plain meaning rule, to protect against fraudulent testimony, is satisfied by the requirement of clear and convincing proof. See Restatement (Third) of Property: Donative Transfers Section 12.1 cmt. d and Reporter's Notes (Tentative Draft No. 1, approved 1995). See also John H. Langbein & Lawrence W. Waggoner, Reformation of Wills on the Ground of Mistake: Change of Direction in American Law?, 130 U. Pa. L. Rev. 521 (1982).

72-38-416. Modification to achieve settlor's tax objectives.

Official Comments

This section is copied from Restatement (Third) of Property: Donative Transfers §12.2 (Tentative Draft No. 1, approved 1995). "Modification" under this section is to be distinguished from the "reformation" authorized by Section 415 [72-38-415]. Reformation under Section 415 [72-38-415] is available when the terms of a trust fail to reflect the donor's original, particularized intention. The mistaken terms are then reformed to conform to this specific intent. The modification authorized here allows the terms of the trust to be changed to meet the settlor's tax-saving objective as long as the resulting terms, particularly the dispositive provisions, are not inconsistent with the settlor's probable intent. The modification allowed by this subsection is similar in concept to the cy pres doctrine for charitable trusts (see Section 413 [72-38-413]), and the deviation doctrine for unanticipated circumstances (see Section 412 [72-38-412]).

Whether a modification made by the court under this section will be recognized under federal tax law is a matter of federal law. Absent specific statutory or regulatory authority, binding recognition is normally given only to modifications made prior to the taxing event, for example, the death of the testator or settlor in the case of the federal estate tax. See Rev. Rul. 73-142, 1973-1 C.B. 405. Among the specific modifications authorized by the Internal Revenue Code or Service include the revision of split-interest trusts to qualify for the charitable deduction, modification of a trust for a noncitizen spouse to become eligible as a qualified domestic trust, and the splitting of a trust to utilize better the exemption from generation-skipping tax.

For further discussion of the rule of this section and the relevant case law, see Restatement (Third) of Property: Donative Transfers §12.2 cmts. and Reporter's Notes (Tentative Draft No. 1, approved 1995).

72-38-417. Combination and division of trusts.

Official Comments

This section, which authorizes the combination or division of trusts, is subject to contrary provision in the terms of the trust. See Section 105 [72-38-105] and Article 4 [Title 72, ch. 38, pt. 4] General Comment. Many trust instruments and standardized estate planning forms include comprehensive provisions governing combination and division of trusts. Except for the requirement that the qualified beneficiaries receive advance notice of a proposed combination or division, this section is similar to Restatement (Third) of Trusts §68 (Tentative Draft No. 3, approved 2001).

This section allows a trustee to combine two or more trusts even though their terms are not identical. Typically the trusts to be combined will have been created by different members of the same family and will vary on only insignificant details, such as the presence of different perpetuities savings periods. The more the dispositive provisions of the trusts to be combined differ from each other the more likely it is that a combination would impair some beneficiary's interest, hence the less likely that the combination can be approved. Combining trusts may prompt more efficient trust administration and is sometimes an alternative to terminating an uneconomic trust as authorized by Section 414 [72-38-414]. Administrative economies promoted by combining trusts include a potential reduction in trustees' fees, particularly if the trustee charges a minimum fee per trust, the ability to file one trust income tax return instead of multiple returns, and the ability to invest a larger pool of capital more effectively. Particularly if the terms of the trust are identical, available administrative economies may suggest that the trustee has a responsibility to pursue a combination. See Section 805 [72-38-805] (duty to incur only reasonable costs).

Division of trusts is often beneficial and, in certain circumstances, almost routine. Division of trusts is frequently undertaken due to a desire to obtain maximum advantage of exemptions available under the federal generation-skipping tax. While the terms of the trusts which result from such a division are identical, the division will permit differing investment objectives to be pursued and allow for discretionary distributions to be made from one trust and not the other. Given the substantial tax benefits often involved, a failure by the trustee to pursue a division might in certain cases be a breach of fiduciary duty. The opposite could also be true if the division is undertaken to increase fees or to fit within the small trust termination provision. See Section 414 [72-38-414].

This section authorizes a trustee to divide a trust even if the trusts that result are dissimilar. Conflicts among beneficiaries, including differing investment objectives, often invite such a division, although as in the case with a proposed combination of trusts, the more the terms of the divided trusts diverge from the original plan, the less likely it is that the settlor's purposes would be achieved and that the division could be approved.

This section does not require that a combination or division be approved either by the court or by the beneficiaries. Prudence may dictate, however, that court approval under Section 410 [72-38-410] be sought and beneficiary consent obtained whenever the terms of the trusts to be combined or the trusts that will result from a division differ substantially one from the other. For the provisions relating to beneficiary consent or ratification of a transaction, or release of trustee from liability, see Section 1009 [72-38-1009].

While the consent of the beneficiaries is not necessary before a trustee may combine or divide trusts under this section, advance notice to the qualified beneficiaries of the proposed combination or division is required. This is consistent with Section 813 [72-38-813], which requires that the trustee keep the beneficiaries reasonably informed of trust administration, including the giving of advance notice to the qualified beneficiaries of several specified actions that may have a major impact on their interests.

Numerous States have enacted statutes authorizing division of trusts, either by trustee action or upon court order. For a list of these statutes, see Restatement (Third) Property: Donative Transfers §12.2 Statutory Note (Tentative Draft No. 1, approved 1995). Combination or division has also been authorized by the courts in the absence of authorizing statute. See, e.g., In re Will of Marcus, 552 N.Y.S. 2d 546 (Surr. Ct.1990) (combination); In re Heller Inter Vivos Trust, 613 N.Y.S. 2d 809 (Surr. Ct. 1994) (division); and BankBoston v. Marlow, 701 N.E. 2d 304 (Mass. 1998) (division).

For a provision authorizing a trustee, in distributing the assets of the divided trust, to make non-pro-rata distributions, see Section 816(22) [72-38-816(22)].

CASES DECIDED AFTER ADOPTION OF 1989 TRUST CODE

Characterization of Succeeding Beneficiaries as Remaindermen Not Error: In deciding that good cause did not exist to warrant division of a trust, the District Court described the succeeding beneficiaries as remaindermen. Two trust primary beneficiaries contended that the court erred in its description because the primary beneficiaries did not have life estates in the trust, to which they would succeed, but rather had a perpetual interest in the trust. The primary beneficiaries asserted that the court's misunderstanding of the nature of the succeeding beneficiaries' interests granted greater protection to the succeeding beneficiaries than was granted by the trust itself. On appeal, the Supreme Court noted that the primary beneficiaries' interest in the trust was not perpetual because the trust was designed to terminate upon the death of the last primary beneficiary, at which time the corpus would be distributed to the beneficiaries who succeeded to the primary beneficiaries' interests or to their assigns. It was understandable that the District Court would use the analogy of remaindermen to describe the succeeding beneficiaries, and the Supreme Court found no error in the analogy. In re Stevens Revocable Trust, 2005 MT 106, 327 M 39, 112 P3d 972 (2005).

Trust Matters Subject to Summary Judgment: Two sons, Thomas and William, sought to divide their mother's trust but failed to present sufficient evidence that good cause existed for the division. The District Court granted summary judgment to two other sons who were respondents. Thomas and William appealed on grounds that 72-33-416 (now repealed) necessitates a trial whenever trustees and beneficiaries have a disagreement about a trust, because of the inherent discretion in trust decisions, making summary judgment inappropriate for nearly all trust matters. The Supreme Court disagreed. Not every situation involving family disagreements or moves by beneficiaries will necessarily constitute good cause for a trust decision. Here, Thomas and William were unable to demonstrate that the District Court's conclusion that good cause did not exist was incorrect. Because trust matters are subject to the same principles of summary judgment as other matters, absent a showing of good cause to divide the trust, summary judgment for respondents was proper. Part 5
Creditor's Claims — Spendthrift and Discretionary Trusts

Part Official Comments

General Comment This article addresses the validity of a spendthrift provision and the rights of creditors, both of the settlor and beneficiaries, to reach a trust to collect a debt. Sections 501 [72-38-501] and 502 [72-38-502] state the general rules. Section 501 [72-38-501] applies if the trust does not contain a spendthrift provision or the spendthrift provision, if any, does not apply to the beneficiary's interest. Section 502 [72-38-502] states the effect of a spendthrift provision. Unless a claim is being made by an exception creditor, a spendthrift provision bars a beneficiary's creditor from reaching the beneficiary's interest until distribution is made by the trustee. An exception creditor, however, can reach the beneficiary's interest subject to the court's power to limit the relief. Section 503 [not adopted] lists the categories of exception creditors whose claims are not subject to a spendthrift restriction. Sections 504 [72-38-504] through 507 [72-38-507] address special categories in which the rights of a beneficiary's creditors are the same whether or not the trust contains a spendthrift provision. Section 504 [72-38-504] deals with discretionary trusts and trusts for which distributions are subject to a standard. Section 505 [72-38-505] covers creditor claims against a settlor, whether the trust is revocable or irrevocable, and if revocable, whether the claim is made during the settlor's lifetime or incident to the settlor's death. Section 506 [72-38-506] provides a creditor with a remedy if a trustee fails to make a mandated distribution within a reasonable time. Section 507 [72-38-507] clarifies that although the trustee holds legal title to trust property, that property is not subject to the trustee's personal debts.

The provisions of this article relating to the validity and effect of a spendthrift provision and the rights of certain creditors and assignees to reach the trust may not be modified by the terms of the trust. See Section 105(b)(5) [72-38-105(2)(e), adopted without reference to this part].

This article does not supersede state exemption statutes nor an enacting jurisdiction's Uniform Fraudulent Transfers Act which, when applicable, invalidates any type of gratuitous transfer, including transfers into trust.

Comment Amended in 2004

Comment Section 503 of the Uniform Trust Code was not adopted and the Official Comment to Section 503 is included here:

This section exempts the claims of certain categories of creditors from the effects of a spendthrift restriction and specifies the remedies such exemption creditors may take to satisfy their claims.

The exception in subsection (b)(1) [not adopted] for judgments or orders to support a beneficiary's child or current or former spouse is in accord with Restatement (Third) of Trusts Section 59(a) (Tentative Draft No. 2, approved 1999), Restatement (Second) of Trusts Section 157(a) (1959), and numerous state statutes. It is also consistent with federal bankruptcy law, which exempts such support orders from discharge. The effect of this exception is to permit the claimant for unpaid support to attach present or future distributions that would otherwise be made to the beneficiary. Distributions subject to attachment include distributions required by the express terms of the trust, such as mandatory payments of income, and distributions the trustee has otherwise decided to make, such as through the exercise of discretion. Subsection (b)(1) [not adopted], unlike Section 504 [72-38-504], does not authorize the spousal or child claimant to compel a distribution from the trust. Section 504 [72-38-504] authorizes a spouse or child claimant to compel a distribution to the extent the trustee has abused a discretion or failed to comply with a standard for distribution.

Subsection (b)(1) [not adopted] refers both to "support" and "maintenance" in order to accommodate differences among the States in terminology employed. No difference in meaning between the two terms is intended.

The definition of "child" in subsection (a) [not adopted] accommodates the differing approaches States take to defining the class of individuals eligible for child support, including such issues as whether support can be awarded to stepchildren. However the State making the award chooses to define "child" will be recognized under this Code, whether the order sought to be enforced was entered in the same or different State. For the definition of "state," which includes Puerto Rico and other American possessions, see Section 103(17) [72-38-103(20)].

The definition of "child" in subsection (a) [not adopted] is not exclusive. The definition clarifies that a "child" includes an individual awarded child support in any state. The definition does not expressly include but neither does it exclude persons awarded child support in some other country or political subdivision, such as a Canadian province.

The exception in subsection (b)(2) [not adopted] for a judgment creditor who has provided services for the protection of a beneficiary's interest in the trust is in accord with Restatement (Third) of Trusts Section 59(b) (Tentative Draft No. 2, approved 1999), and Restatement (Second) of Trusts Section 157(c) (1959). This exception allows a beneficiary of modest means to overcome an obstacle preventing the beneficiary's obtaining services essential to the protection or enforcement of the beneficiary's rights under the trust. See Restatement (Third) of Trusts Section 59 cmt. d (Tentative Draft No. 2, approved 1999).

Subsection (b)(3) [not adopted] which is similar to Restatement (Third) of Trusts Section 59 cmt. a (Tentative Draft No. 2, approved 1999), exempts certain governmental claims from a spendthrift restriction. Federal preemption guarantees that certain federal claims, such as claims by the Internal Revenue Service, may bypass a spendthrift provision no matter what this Code might say. The case law and relevant Internal Revenue Code provisions on the exception for federal tax claims are collected in George G. Bogert & George T. Bogert, The Law of Trusts and Trustees Section 224 (Rev. 2d ed. 1992); and 2A Austin W. Scott & William F. Fratcher, The Law of Trusts Section 157.4 (4th ed. 1987). Regarding claims by state governments, this subsection recognizes that States take a variety of approaches with respect to collection, depending on whether the claim is for unpaid taxes, for care provided at an institution, or for other charges. Acknowledging this diversity, subsection (c) [not adopted] does not prescribe a rule, but refers to other statutes of the State on whether particular claims are subject to or exempted from spendthrift provisions.

Unlike Restatement (Third) of Trusts Section 59(2) (Tentative Draft No. 2, approved 1999), and Restatement (Second) of Trusts Section 157(b) (1959), this Code does not create an exception to the spendthrift restriction for creditors who have furnished necessary services or supplies to the beneficiary. Most of these cases involve claims by governmental entities, which the drafters concluded are better handled by the enactment of special legislation as authorized by subsection (b)(3) [not adopted]. The drafters also declined to create an exception for tort claimants. For a discussion of the exception for tort claims, which has not generally been recognized, see Restatement (Third) of Trusts Section 59 Reporter's Notes to cmt. a (Tentative Draft No. 2, approved 1999). For a discussion of other exceptions to a spendthrift restriction, recognized in some States, see George G. Bogert & George T. Bogert, The Law of Trusts and Trustees Section 224 (Rev. 2d ed. 1992); and 2A Austin W. Scott & William F. Fratcher, The Law of Trusts Sections 157-157.5 (4th ed. 1987).

Subsection (c) [not adopted] provides that the only remedy available to an exception creditor is attachment of present or future distributions of present or future distributions. Depending on other creditor law of the state, additional remedies may be available should a beneficiary's interest not be subject to a spendthrift provision. Section 501 [72-38-501], which applies in such situations, provides that the creditor may reach the beneficiary's interest under that section by attachment or "other means." Subsection (c) [not adopted], similar to Section 501 [72-38-501], clarifies that the court has the authority to limit the creditor's relief as appropriate under the circumstances.

2005 Amendment. The amendment rewrote this section. The section previously provided:

SECTION 503. EXCEPTIONS TO SPENDTHRIFT PROVISION.

(a) In this section, "child" includes any person for whom an order or judgment for child support has been entered in this or another State.

(b) Even if a trust contains a spendthrift provision, a beneficiary's child, spouse, or former spouse who has a judgment or court order against the beneficiary for support or maintenance, or a judgment creditor who has provided services for the protection of a beneficiary's interest in the trust, may obtain from a court an order attaching present or future distributions to or for the benefit of the beneficiary.

(c) A spendthrift provision is unenforceable against a claim of this State or the United States to the extent a statute of this State or federal law so provides.

CASES DECIDED PRIOR TO ADOPTION OF 1989 TRUST CODE

Spendthrift Provision Valid — Exemption From Collection by Creditors: In a case of first impression, the Supreme Court held spendthrift provisions in trusts to be valid. In this case, the beneficiary's attempted assignment of trust income to his creditors was invalid, though the creditors could execute against the income after payment of the income to the beneficiary. A lower court order directing trustee to pay the trust income directly to the creditors was reversed. Section 72-24-210 (now repealed) did not apply because: (1) the trust was made up of personal property and three contracts for deed, which under the doctrine of equitable conversion are personal property to the seller; and (2) the trust provided that any income not distributed was to be added to principal, thus providing a direction for accumulation. Lundgren v. Hoglund, 219 M 295, 711 P2d 809, 42 St. Rep. 2031 (1985).

Trustee's Right to Appeal Court Order When Trustee Not a Party: Trustee-bank could appeal from court order directing trustee to pay all income due beneficiary to beneficiary's judgment creditors, even though the trustee was not a party to the action between the beneficiary and creditors. The trustee had a fiduciary duty to preserve and protect the trust assets. Lundgren v. Hoglund, 219 M 295, 711 P2d 809, 42 St. Rep. 2031 (1985).

72-38-501. Rights of beneficiary's creditor or assignee.

Official Comments

This section applies only if the trust does not contain a spendthrift provision or the spendthrift provision does not apply to a particular beneficiary's interest. A settlor may subject to spendthrift protection the interests of certain beneficiaries but not others. A settlor may also subject only a portion of the trust to spendthrift protection such as an interest in the income but not principal. For the effect of a spendthrift provision on creditor claims, see Section 503 [not adopted].

Absent a valid spendthrift provision, a creditor may ordinarily reach the interest of a beneficiary the same as any other of the beneficiary's assets. This does not necessarily mean that the creditor can collect all distributions made to the beneficiary. The interest may be too indefinite or contingent for the creditor to reach or the interest may qualify for an exemption under the state's general creditor exemption statutes. See (Third) of Trusts §56 (2003); Restatement (Second) of Trusts §§147-149, 162 (1959). Other creditor law of the State may limit the creditor to a specified percentage of a distribution. See, e.g., Cal. Prob. Code Section 15306.5. This section does not prescribe the procedures ("other means") for reaching a beneficiary's interest or of priority among claimants, leaving those issues to the enacting State's laws on creditor rights. The section does clarify, however, that an order obtained against the trustee, whatever state procedure may have been used, may extend to future distributions whether made directly to the beneficiary or to others for the beneficiary's benefit. By allowing an order to extend to future payments, the need for the creditor periodically to return to court will be reduced.

Because proceedings to satisfy a claim are equitable in nature, the second sentence of this section ratifies the court's discretion to limit the award as appropriate under the circumstances. In exercising its discretion to limit relief, the court may appropriately consider the circumstances of a beneficiary and the beneficiary's family. See Restatement (Third) of Trusts Section 56 cmt. e (Tentative Draft No. 2, approved 1999).

2005 Amendment. A 2005 amendment changes "protected by" to "subject to" in the first sentence of the section. No substantive change is intended. The amendment was made to negate an implication that this section allowed an exception creditor to reach a beneficiary's interest even though the trust contained a spendthrift provision. The list of exception creditors and their remedies are contained in Section 503 [not adopted]. Clarifying changes are also made in the comments and unnecessary language on creditor remedies omitted.

72-38-502. Spendthrift provision.

Official Comments

Under this section, a settlor has the power to restrain the transfer of a beneficiary's interest, regardless of whether the beneficiary has an interest in income, in principal, or in both. Unless one of the exceptions under this article applies, a creditor of the beneficiary is prohibited from attaching a protected interest and may only attempt to collect directly from the beneficiary after payment is made. This section is similar to Restatement (Third) of Trusts §58 (Tentative Draft No. 2, approved 1999), and Restatement (Second) of Trusts §§152-153 (1959). For the definition of spendthrift provision, see Section 103(15).

For a spendthrift provision to be effective under this Code, it must prohibit both the voluntary and involuntary transfer of the beneficiary's interest, that is, a settlor may not allow a beneficiary to assign while prohibiting a beneficiary's creditor from collecting, and vice versa. See Restatement (Third) of Trusts §58 cmt. b (Tentative Draft No. 2, approved 1999). See also Restatement (Second) of Trusts §152(2) (1959). A spendthrift provision valid under this Code will also be recognized as valid in a federal bankruptcy proceeding. See 11 U.S.C. §541(c)(2).

Subsection (b) [72-38-502(2)], which is derived from Texas Property Code §112.035(b), allows a settlor to provide maximum spendthrift protection simply by stating in the instrument that all interests are held subject to a "spendthrift trust" or words of similar effect.

A disclaimer, because it is a refusal to accept ownership of an interest and not a transfer of an interest already owned, is not affected by the presence or absence of a spendthrift provision. Most disclaimer statutes expressly provide that the validity of a disclaimer is not affected by a spendthrift protection. See, e.g., Uniform Probate Code §2-801(a). Releases and exercises of powers of appointment are also not affected because they are not transfers of property. See Restatement (Third) of Trusts §58 cmt. c (Tentative Draft No. 2, approved 1999).

A spendthrift provision is ineffective against a beneficial interest retained by the settlor. See Restatement (Third) of Trusts §58(2), (Tentative Draft No. 2, approved 1999). This is a necessary corollary to Section 505(a)(2) [72-38-505(1)(b)], which allows a creditor or assignee of the settlor to reach the maximum amount that can be distributed to or for the settlor's benefit. This right to reach the trust applies whether or not the trust contains a spendthrift provision.

A valid spendthrift provision makes it impossible for a beneficiary to make a legally binding transfer, but the trustee may choose to honor the beneficiary's purported assignment. The trustee may recommence distributions to the beneficiary at anytime. The beneficiary, not having made a binding transfer, can withdraw the beneficiary's direction but only as to future payments. See Restatement (Third) of Trusts §58 cmt. d (Tentative Draft No. 2, approved 1999); Restatement (Second) of Trusts §152 cmt. i (1959).

72-38-504. Discretionary trusts — effect of standard.

Official Comments

This section addresses the ability of a beneficiary's creditor to reach the beneficiary's discretionary trust interest, whether or not the exercise of the trustee's discretion is subject to a standard. This section, similar to the Restatement, eliminates the distinction between discretionary and support trusts, unifying the rules for all trusts fitting within either of the former categories. See Restatement (Third) of Trusts Section 60 Reporter's Notes to cmt. a (Tentative Draft No. 2, approved 1999). By eliminating this distinction, the rights of a creditor are the same whether the distribution standard is discretionary, subject to a standard, or both. Other than for a claim by a child, spouse or former spouse, a beneficiary's creditor may not reach the beneficiary's interest. Eliminating this distinction affects only the rights of creditors. The affect of this change is limited to the rights of creditors. It does not affect the rights of a beneficiary to compel a distribution. Whether the trustee has a duty in a given situation to make a distribution depends on factors such as the breadth of the discretion granted and whether the terms of the trust include a support or other standard. See Section 814 [72-38-814] comment.

For a discussion of the definition of "child" in subsection (a), see Section 503 Comment [not adopted; comment included in Title 72, ch. 38, pt. 5 comments].

Subsection (b) [72-38-504(1)], which establishes the general rule, forbids a creditor from compelling a distribution from the trust, even if the trustee has failed to comply with the standard of distribution or has abused a discretion. Under subsection (d) [72-38-504(2)], the power to force a distribution due to an abuse of discretion or failure to comply with a standard belongs solely to the beneficiary. Under Section 814(a) [72-38-814(1)], a trustee must always exercise a discretionary power in good faith and with regard to the purposes of the trust and the interests of the beneficiaries.

Subsection (c) [not adopted] creates an exception for support claims of a child, spouse, or former spouse who has a judgment or order against a beneficiary for support or maintenance. While a creditor of a beneficiary generally may not assert that a trustee has abused a discretion or failed to comply with a standard of distribution, such a claim may be asserted by the beneficiary's child, spouse, or former spouse enforcing a judgment or court order against the beneficiary for unpaid support or maintenance. The court must direct the trustee to pay the child, spouse or former spouse such amount as is equitable under the circumstances but not in excess of the amount the trustee was otherwise required to distribute to or for the benefit of the beneficiary. Before fixing this amount, the court having jurisdiction over the trust should consider that in setting the respective support award, the family court has already considered the respective needs and assets of the family. The Uniform Trust Code does not prescribe a particular procedural method for enforcing a judgment or order against the trust, leaving that matter to local collection law.

Subsection (e) [72-38-504(3)], which was added by a 2004 amendment, is discussed below.

2004 Amendment Section 504(e) [72-38-504(3)], 103(11) [72-38-103(13)] Trusts are frequently drafted in which a trustee is also a beneficiary. A common example is what is often referred to as a bypass trust, under which the settlor's spouse will frequently be named as both trustee and beneficiary. An amount equal to the exemption from federal estate tax will be placed in the bypass trust, and the trustee, who will often be the settlor's spouse, will be given discretion to make distributions to the beneficiaries, a class which will usually include the spouse/trustee. To prevent the inclusion of the trust in the spouse-trustee's gross estate, the spouse's discretion to make distributions for the spouse's own benefit will be limited by an ascertainable standard relating to health, education, maintenance, or support.

The UTC, as previously drafted, did not specifically address the issue of whether a creditor of a beneficiary may reach the beneficial interest of a beneficiary who is also a trustee. However, Restatement (Third) of Trusts §60, comment g, which was approved by the American law Institute in 1999, provides that the beneficial interest of a beneficiary/trustee may be reached by the beneficiary/trustee's creditors. Because the UTC is supplemented by the common law (see UTC Section 106 [72-38-106]), this Restatement rule might also apply in states enacting the UTC. The drafting committee has concluded that adoption of the Restatement rule would unduly disrupt standard estate planning and should be limited. Consequently, Section 504 [72-38-504] is amended to provide that the provisions of this section, which generally prohibit a creditor of a beneficiary from reaching a beneficiary's discretionary interest, apply even if the beneficiary is also a trustee or cotrustee. The beneficiary-trustee is protected from creditor claims to the extent the beneficiary-trustee's discretion is protected by an ascertainable standard as defined in the relevant Internal Revenue Code sections. The result is that the beneficiary's trustee's interest is protected to the extent it is also exempt from federal estate tax. The amendment thereby achieves its main purpose, which is to protect the trustee-beneficiary of a bypass trust from creditor claims.

The protection conferred by this subsection, however, is no greater than if the beneficiary had not been named trustee. If an exception creditor can reach the beneficiary's interest under some other provision, the interest is not insulated from creditor claims by the fact the beneficiary is or becomes a trustee.

In addition, the definition of "power of withdrawal" in Section 103 [72-38-103(13)] is amended to clarify that a power of withdrawal does not include a power exercisable by the trustee that is limited by an ascertainable standard. The purpose of this amendment is to preclude a claim that the power of a trustee-beneficiary to make discretionary distributions for the trustee-beneficiary's own benefit results in an enforceable claim of the trustee-beneficiary's creditors to reach the trustee-beneficiary's interest as provided in Section 505(b) [72-38-505(2)]. Similar to the amendment to Section 504 [72-38-504], the amendment to "power of withdrawal" is being made because of concerns that Restatement (Third) of Trusts Section 60, comment g, otherwise might allow a beneficiary-trustee's creditors to reach the trustee's beneficial interest.

The Code does not specifically address the extent to which a creditor of a trustee/beneficiary may reach a beneficial interest of a beneficiary/trustee that is not limited by an ascertainable standard.

For the definition of "ascertainable standard," see Section 103(2) [72-38-103(2)].

72-38-505. Creditor's claim against settlor.

Official Comments

Subsection (a)(1) [72-38-505(1)(a)] states what is now a well accepted conclusion, that a revocable trust is subject to the claims of the settlor's creditors while the settlor is living. See Restatement (Third) of Trusts Section 25 cmt. e (Tentative Draft No. 1, approved 1996). Such claims were not allowed at common law, however. See Restatement (Second) of Trusts Section 330 cmt. o (1959). Because a settlor usually also retains a beneficial interest that a creditor may reach under subsection (a)(2), the common law rule, were it retained in this Code, would be of little significance. See Restatement (Second) of Trusts Section 156(2) (1959).

Subsection (a)(2) [72-38-505(1)(b)], which is based on Restatement (Third) of Trusts Section 58(2) and cmt. e (Tentative Draft No. 2, approved 1999), and Restatement (Second) of Trusts Section 156 (1959), follows traditional doctrine in providing that a settlor who is also a beneficiary may not use the trust as a shield against the settlor's creditors. The drafters of the Uniform Trust Code concluded that traditional doctrine reflects sound policy. Consequently, the drafters rejected the approach taken in States like Alaska and Delaware, both of which allow a settlor to retain a beneficial interest immune from creditor claims. See Henry J. Lischer, Jr., Domestic Asset Protection Trusts: Pallbearers to Liability, 35 Real Prop. Prob. & Tr. J. 479 (2000); John E. Sullivan, III, Gutting the Rule Against Self-Settled Trusts: How the Delaware Trust Law Competes with Offshore Trusts, 23 Del. J. Corp. L. 423 (1998). Under the Code, whether the trust contains a spendthrift provision or not, a creditor of the settlor may reach the maximum amount that the trustee could have paid to the settlor-beneficiary. If the trustee has discretion to distribute the entire income and principal to the settlor, the effect of this subsection is to place the settlor's creditors in the same position as if the trust had not been created. For the definition of "settlor," see Section 103(15) [72-38-103(18)].

This section does not address possible rights against a settlor who was insolvent at the time of the trust's creation or was rendered insolvent by the transfer of property to the trust. This subject is instead left to the State's law on fraudulent transfers. A transfer to the trust by an insolvent settlor might also constitute a voidable preference under federal bankruptcy law.

Subsection (a)(3) [72-38-505(1)(c)] recognizes that a revocable trust is usually employed as a will substitute. As such, the trust assets, following the death of the settlor, should be subject to the settlor's debts and other charges. However, in accordance with traditional doctrine, the assets of the settlor's probate estate must normally first be exhausted before the assets of the revocable trust can be reached. This section does not attempt to address the procedural issues raised by the need first to exhaust the decedent's probate estate before reaching the assets of the revocable trust. Nor does this section address the priority of creditor claims or liability of the decedent's other nonprobate assets for the decedent's debts and other charges. Subsection (a)(3) [72-38-505(1)(c)], however, does ratify the typical pourover will, revocable trust plan. As long as the rights of the creditor or family member claiming a statutory allowance are not impaired, the settlor is free to shift liability from the probate estate to the revocable trust. Regarding other issues associated with potential liability of nonprobate assets for unpaid claims, see Section 6-102 of the Uniform Probate Code, which was added to that Code in 1998.

Subsection (b)(1) [72-38-505(2)(a)] treats a power of withdrawal as the equivalent of a power of revocation because the two powers are functionally identical. This is also the approach taken in Restatement (Third) of Trusts Section 56 cmt. b (Tentative Draft No. 2, approved 1999). If the power is unlimited, the property subject to the power will be fully subject to the claims of the power holder's creditors, the same as the power holder's other assets. If the power holder retains the power until death, the property subject to the power may be liable for claims and statutory allowances to the extent the power holder's probate estate is insufficient to satisfy those claims and allowances. For powers limited either in time or amount, such as a right to withdraw a $10,000 annual exclusion contribution within 30 days, this subsection would limit the creditor to the $10,000 contribution and require the creditor to take action prior to the expiration of the 30-day period.

Upon the lapse, release, or waiver of a power of withdrawal, the property formerly subject to the power will normally be subject to the claims of the power holder's creditors and assignees the same as if the power holder were the settlor of a now irrevocable trust. Pursuant to subsection (a)(2) [72-38-505(1)(b)], a creditor or assignee of the power holder generally may reach the power holder's entire beneficial interest in the trust, whether or not distribution is subject to the trustee's discretion. However, following the lead of Arizona Revised Statutes Section 14-7705(g) and Texas Property Code Section 112.035(e), subsection (b)(2) [72-38-505(2)(b)] creates an exception for trust property which was subject to a Crummey or five and five power. Upon the lapse, release, or waiver of a power of withdrawal, the holder is treated as the settlor of the trust only to the extent the value of the property subject to the power at the time of the lapse, release, or waiver exceeded the greater of the amounts specified in IRC Sections 2041(b)(2) or 2514(e) [greater of 5% or $5,000], or IRC Section 2503(b) [$10,000 in 2001].

The Uniform Trust Code does not address creditor issues with respect to property subject to a special power of appointment or a testamentary general power of appointment. For creditor rights against such interests, see Restatement (Property) Second: Donative Transfers Sections 13.1-13.7 (1986).

Compiler's Comments

Source: This section modifies section 505 of the Uniform Law Commission's Uniform Trust Code by adding language regarding the trustee's discretionary authority in subsection (1)(b).

The language in this section relates to the language in 72-36-302 (now repealed).

72-38-506. Overdue distribution.

Official Comments

The effect of a spendthrift provision is generally to insulate totally a beneficiary's interest until a distribution is made and received by the beneficiary. See Section 502 [72-38-502]. But this section, along with several other sections in this article, recognizes exceptions to this general rule. Whether a trust contains a spendthrift provision or not, a trustee should not be able to avoid creditor claims against a beneficiary by refusing to make a distribution required to be made by the express terms of the trust. On the other hand, a spendthrift provision would become largely a nullity were a beneficiary's creditors able to attach all required payments as soon as they became due. This section reflects a compromise between these two competing principles. A creditor can reach a mandatory distribution, including a distribution upon termination, if the trustee has failed to make the payment within a reasonable time after the designated distribution date. Following this reasonable period, payments mandated by the express terms of the trust are in effect being held by the trustee as agent for the beneficiary and should be treated as part of the beneficiary's personal assets.

This section is similar to Restatement (Third) of Trusts Section 58 cmt. d (Tentative Draft No. 2, approved 1999).

2001 Amendment. By amendment in 2001, "designated distribution date" was substituted for "required distribution date" in subsection (b) [72-38-506(2)]. The amendment conforms the language of this section to terminology used elsewhere in the Code.

2005 Amendment. The amendment adds a clarifying definition of "mandatory distribution" in subsection (a) [72-38-506(1)], which is based on an Ohio proposal. The amendment:

- tracks the traditional understanding that a mandatory distribution includes a provision requiring that a beneficiary be paid the income of a trust or receive principal upon termination;

- correlates the definition of "mandatory distribution" in this section to the broad definition of discretionary trust used in Section 504 [72-38-504]. Under both Sections 504 [72-38-504] and 506 [72-38-506], a trust is discretionary even if the discretion is expressed in the form of a standard, such as a provision directing a trustee to pay for a beneficiary's support;

- addresses the situation where the terms of the trust couple language of discretion with language of direction. An example of such a provision is "my trustees shall, in their absolute discretion, distribute such amounts as are necessary for the beneficiary's support." Despite the presence of the imperative "shall," the provision is discretionary, not mandatory. For a more elaborate example of such a discretionary "shall" provision, see Marsman. Nasca, 573 N.E. 2d 1025 (Mass. Ct. App. 1991).

- is clarifying. No change of substance is intended by this amendment. This amendment merely clarifies that a mandatory distribution is to be understood in its traditional sense such as a provision requiring that the beneficiary receive an income or receive principal upon termination of the trust.

72-38-507. Personal obligations of trustee.

Official Comments

Because the beneficiaries of the trust hold the beneficial interest in the trust property and the trustee holds only legal title without the benefits of ownership, the creditors of the trustee have only a personal claim against the trustee. See Restatement (Third) §5 cmt. k (Tentative Draft No.1, approved 1996); Restatement (Second) of Trusts §12 cmt. a (1959). Similarly, a personal creditor of the trustee who attaches trust property to satisfy the debt does not acquire title as a bona fide purchaser even if the creditor is unaware of the trust. See Restatement (Second) of Trusts §308 (1959). The protection afforded by this section is consistent with that provided by the Bankruptcy Code. Property in which the trustee holds legal title as trustee is not part of the trustee's bankruptcy estate. 11 U.S.C. §541(d).

The exemption of the trust property from the personal obligations of the trustee is the most significant feature of Anglo-American trust law by comparison with the devices available in civil law countries. A principal objective of the Hague Convention on the Law Applicable to Trusts and on their Recognition is to protect the Anglo-American trust with respect to transactions in civil law countries. See Hague Convention art. 11. See also Henry Hansmann & Ugo Mattei, The Functions of Trust Law: A Comparative Legal and Economic Analysis, 73 N.Y.U. Part 6
Revocable Trusts

Part Official Comments

This article deals with issues of significance not totally settled under prior law. Because of the widespread use in recent years of the revocable trust as an alternative to a will, this short article is one of the more important articles of the Code. This article and the other articles of the Code treat the revocable trust as the functional equivalent of a will. Section 601 [72-38-601] provides that the capacity standard for wills applies in determining whether the settlor had capacity to create a revocable trust. Section 602 [72-38-602], after providing that a trust is presumed revocable unless stated otherwise, prescribes the procedure for revocation or amendment, whether the trust contains one or several settlors. Section 603 [72-38-603] provides that while a trust is revocable and the settlor has capacity, the rights of the beneficiaries are subject to the settlor's control. Section 604 [72-38-604] prescribes a statute of limitations on contest of revocable trusts.

Sections 601 [72-38-601] and 604 [72-38-604], because they address requirements relating to creation and contest of trusts, are not subject to alteration or restriction in the terms of the trust. See Section 105 [72-38-105]. Sections 602 [72-38-602] and 603 [72-38-603], by contrast, are not so limited and are fully subject to the settlor's control.

72-38-601. Capacity of settlor of revocable trust.

Official Comments

This section is patterned after Restatement (Third) of Trusts §11(1) (Tentative Draft No. 1, approved 1996). The revocable trust is used primarily as a will substitute, with its key provision being the determination of the persons to receive the trust property upon the settlor's death. To solidify the use of the revocable trust as a device for transferring property at death, the settlor usually also executes a pourover will. The use of a pourover will assures that property not transferred to the trust during life will be combined with the property the settlor did manage to convey. Given this primary use of the revocable trust as a device for disposing of property at death, the capacity standard for wills rather than that for lifetime gifts should apply. The application of the capacity standard for wills does not mean that the revocable trust must be executed with the formalities of a will. There are no execution requirements under this Code for a trust not created by will, and a trust not containing real property may be created by an oral statement. See Section 407 and Comment [Section 407 expressly allows oral trusts; 72-38-407 as adopted does not].

The Uniform Trust Code does not explicitly spell out the standard of capacity necessary to create other types of trusts, although Section 402 [72-38-402] does require that the settlor have capacity. This section includes a capacity standard for creation of a revocable trust because of the uncertainty in the case law and the importance of the issue in modern estate planning. No such uncertainty exists with respect to the capacity standard for other types of trusts. To create a testamentary trust, the settlor must have the capacity to make a will. To create an irrevocable trust, the settlor must have the capacity that would be needed to transfer the property free of trust. See generally Restatement (Third) of Trusts §11 (Tentative Draft No. 1, approved 1996); Restatement (Third) of Property: Wills and Other Donative Transfers §8.1 (Tentative Draft No. 3, approved 2001).

72-38-602. Revocation or amendment of revocable trust.

Official Comments

Subsection (a) [72-38-602(1)], which provides that a settlor may revoke or modify a trust unless the terms of the trust expressly state that the trust is irrevocable, changes the common law. Most States follow the rule that a trust is presumed irrevocable absent evidence of contrary intent. See Restatement (Second) of Trusts §330 (1959). California, Iowa, Montana, Oklahoma, and Texas presume that a trust is revocable. The Uniform Trust Code endorses this minority approach, but only for trusts created after its effective date. This Code presumes revocability when the instrument is silent because the instrument was likely drafted by a nonprofessional, who intended the trust as a will substitute. The most recent revision of the Restatement of Trusts similarly reverses the former approach. A trust is presumed revocable if the settlor has retained a beneficial interest. See Restatement (Third) of Trusts §63 cmt. c (Tentative Draft No. 3, approved 2001). Because professional drafters habitually spell out whether or not a trust is revocable, subsection (a) [72-38-602(1)] will have limited application.

A power of revocation includes the power to amend. An unrestricted power to amend may also include the power to revoke a trust. See Restatement (Third) of Trusts §63 cmt. g (Tentative Draft No. 3, approved 2001); Restatement (Second) of Trusts §331 cmt. g and h (1959).

Subsection (b) [72-38-602(2)], which is similar to Restatement (Third) of Trusts §63 cmt. k (Tentative Draft No. 3, approved 2001), provides default rules for revocation or amendment of a trust having several settlors. The settlor's authority to revoke or modify the trust depends on whether the trust contains community property. To the extent the trust contains community property, the trust may be revoked by either spouse acting alone but may be amended only by joint action of both spouses. The purpose of this provision, and the reason for the use of joint trusts in community property States, is to preserve the community character of property transferred to the trust. While community property does not prevail in a majority of States, contributions of community property to trusts created in noncommunity property States does occur. This is due to the mobility of settlors, and the fact that community property retains its community character when a couple move from a community to a noncommunity State. For this reason, subsection (b) [72-38-602(2)], and its provision on contributions of community property, should be enacted in all States, whether community or noncommunity.

With respect to separate property contributed to the trust, or all property of the trust if none of the trust property consists of community property, subsection (b) [72-38-602(2)] provides that each settlor may revoke or amend the trust as to the portion of the trust contributed by that settlor. The inclusion of a rule for contributions of separate property does not mean that the drafters of this Code concluded that the use of joint trusts should be encouraged. The rule is included because of the widespread use of joint trusts in noncommunity property States in recent years. Due to the desire to preserve the community character of trust property, joint trusts are a necessity in community property States. Unless community property will be contributed to the trust, no similarly important reason exists for the creation of a joint trust in a noncommunity property State. Joint trusts are often poorly drafted, confusing the dispositive provisions of the respective settlors. Their use can also lead to unintended tax consequences. See Melinda S. Merk, Joint Revocable Trusts for Married Couples Domiciled in Common-Law Property States, 32 Real Prop. Prob. & Tr. J. 345 (1997).

Subsection (b) [72-38-602(2)] does not address the many technical issues that can arise in determining the settlors' proportionate contribution to a joint trust. Most problematic are contributions of jointly-owned property. In the case of joint tenancies in real estate, each spouse would presumably be treated as having made an equal contribution because of the right to sever the interest and convert it into a tenancy in common. This is in contrast to joint accounts in financial institutions, ownership of which in most States is based not on fractional interest but on actual dollar contribution. See, e.g., Uniform Probate Code §6-211. Most difficult may be determining a contribution rule for entireties property. In Holdener v. Fieser, 971 S.W. 2d 946 (Mo. Ct. App. 1998), the court held that a surviving spouse could revoke the trust with respect to the entire interest but did not express a view as to revocation rights while both spouses were living.

Subsection (b)(3) [72-38-602(2)(c)] requires that the other settlor or settlors be notified if a joint trust is revoked by less than all of the settlors. Notifying the other settlor or settlors of the revocation or amendment will place them in a better position to protect their interests. If the revocation or amendment by less than all of the settlors breaches an implied agreement not to revoke or amend the trust, those harmed by the action can sue for breach of contract. If the trustee fails to notify the other settlor or settlors of the revocation or amendment, the parties aggrieved by the trustee's failure can sue the trustee for breach of trust.

Subsection (c) [72-38-602(3), adopted as modified], which is similar to Restatement (Third) of Trusts §63 cmt. h and i (Tentative Draft No. 3, approved 2001), specifies the method of revocation and amendment. Revocation of a trust differs fundamentally from revocation of a will. Revocation of a will, because a will is not effective until death, cannot affect an existing fiduciary relationship. With a trust, however, because a revocation will terminate an already existing fiduciary relationship, there is a need to protect a trustee who might act without knowledge that the trust has been revoked. There is also a need to protect trustees against the risk that they will misperceive the settlor's intent and mistakenly assume that an informal document or communication constitutes a revocation when that was not in fact the settlor's intent. To protect trustees against these risks, drafters habitually insert provisions providing that a revocable trust may be revoked only by delivery to the trustee of a formal revoking document. Some courts require strict compliance with the stated formalities. Other courts, recognizing that the formalities were inserted primarily for the trustee's and not the settlor's benefit, will accept other methods of revocation as long as the settlor's intent is clear. See Restatement (Third) of Trusts §63 Reporter's Notes to cmt. h-j (Tentative Draft No. 3, approved 2001).

This Code tries to effectuate the settlor's intent to the maximum extent possible while at the same time protecting a trustee against inadvertent liability. While notice to the trustee of a revocation is good practice, this section does not make the giving of such notice a prerequisite to a trust's revocation. To protect a trustee who has not been notified of a revocation or amendment, subsection (g) [72-38-602(7)] provides that a trustee who does not know that a trust has been revoked or amended is not liable to the settlor or settlor's successors in interest for distributions made and other actions taken on the assumption that the trust, as unamended, was still in effect. However, to honor the settlor's intent, subsection (c) [72-38-602(3)] generally honors a settlor's clear expression of intent even if inconsistent with stated formalities in the terms of the trust.

Under subsection (c) [72-38-602(3), adopted as modified], the settlor may revoke or amend a revocable trust by substantial compliance with the method specified in the terms of the trust or by a later will or codicil or any other method manifesting clear and convincing evidence of the settlor's intent. Only if the method specified in the terms of the trust is made exclusive is use of the other methods prohibited. Even then, a failure to comply with a technical requirement, such as required notarization, may be excused as long as compliance with the method specified in the terms of the trust is otherwise substantial.

While revocation of a trust will ordinarily continue to be accomplished by signing and delivering a written document to the trustee, other methods, such as a physical act or an oral statement coupled with a withdrawal of the property, might also demonstrate the necessary intent. These less formal methods, because they provide less reliable indicia of intent, will often be insufficient, however. The method specified in the terms of the trust is a reliable safe harbor and should be followed whenever possible.

Revocation or amendment by will is mentioned in subsection (c) [72-38-602(3), adopted as modified] not to encourage the practice but to make clear that it is not precluded by omission. See Restatement (Third) of Property: Will and Other Donative Transfers §7.2 cmt. e (Tentative Draft No. 3, approved 2001), which validates revocation or amendment of will substitutes by later will. Situations do arise, particularly in death-bed cases, where revocation by will may be the only practicable method. In such cases, a will, a solemn document executed with a high level of formality, may be the most reliable method for expressing intent. A revocation in a will ordinarily becomes effective only upon probate of the will following the testator's death. For the cases, see Restatement (Third) of Trusts §63 Reporter's Notes to cmt. h-i (Tentative Draft No. 3, approved 2001).

A residuary clause in a will disposing of the estate differently than the trust is alone insufficient to revoke or amend a trust. The provision in the will must either be express or the will must dispose of specific assets contrary to the terms of the trust. The substantial body of law on revocation of Totten trusts by will offers helpful guidance. The authority is collected in William H. Danne, Jr., Revocation of Tentative ("Totten") Trust of Savings Bank Account by Inter Vivos Declaration or Will, 46 A.L.R. 3d 487 (1972).

Subsection (c) [72-38-602(3)] does not require that a trustee concur in the revocation or amendment of a trust. Such a concurrence would be necessary only if required by the terms of the trust. If the trustee concludes that an amendment unacceptably changes the trustee's duties, the trustee may resign as provided in Section 705 [72-38-705].

Subsection (d) [72-38-602(4)], providing that upon revocation the trust property is to be distributed as the settlor directs, codifies a provision commonly included in revocable trust instruments.

A settlor's power to revoke is not terminated by the settlor's incapacity. The power to revoke may instead be exercised by an agent under a power of attorney as authorized in subsection (e) [72-38-602(5)], by a conservator or guardian as authorized in subsection (f) [72-38-602(6)], or by the settlor personally if the settlor regains capacity.

Subsection (e) [72-38-602(5)], which is similar to Restatement (Third) of Trusts §63 cmt. l (Tentative Draft No. 3, approved 2001), authorizes an agent under a power of attorney to revoke or modify a revocable trust only to the extent the terms of the trust or power of attorney expressly so permit. An express provision is required because most settlors usually intend that the revocable trust, and not the power of attorney, to function as the settlor's principal property management device. The power of attorney is usually intended as a backup for assets not transferred to the revocable trust or to address specific topics, such as the power to sign tax returns or apply for government benefits, which may be beyond the authority of a trustee or are not customarily granted to a trustee.

Subsection (f) [72-38-602(6)] addresses the authority of a conservator or guardian to revoke or amend a revocable trust. Under the Uniform Trust Code, a "conservator" is appointed by the court to manage the ward's party, a "guardian" to make decisions with respect to the ward's personal affairs. See Section 103 [72-38-103]. Consequently, subsection (f) [72-38-602(6)] authorizes a guardian to exercise a settlor's power to revoke or amend a trust only if a conservator has not been appointed.

Many state conservatorship statutes authorize a conservator to exercise the settlor's power of revocation with the prior approval of the court supervising the conservatorship. See, e.g., Uniform Probate Code §411(a)(4). Subsection (f) [72-38-602(6)] ratifies this practice. Under the Code, a conservator may exercise a settlor's power of revocation, amendment, or right to withdraw trust property upon approval of the court supervising the conservatorship. Because a settlor often creates a revocable trust for the very purpose of avoiding conservatorship, this power should be exercised by the court reluctantly. Settlors concerned about revocation by a conservator may wish to deny a conservator a power to revoke. However, while such a provision in the terms of the trust is entitled to considerable weight, the court may override the restriction if it concludes that the action is necessary in the interests of justice. See Section 105(b)(13) [72-38-105(2)(k)].

Steps a conservator can take to stem possible abuse is not limited to petitioning to revoke the trust. The conservator could petition for removal of the trustee under Section 706 [72-38-706]. The conservator, acting on the settlor-beneficiary's behalf, could also bring an action to enforce the trust according to its terms. Pursuant to Section 303 [72-38-303], a conservator may act on behalf of the beneficiary whose estate the conservator controls whenever a consent or other action by the beneficiary is required or may be given under the Code.

If a conservator has not been appointed, subsection (f) [72-38-602(6)] authorizes a guardian to exercise a settlor's power to revoke or amend the trust upon approval of the court supervising the guardianship. The court supervising the guardianship will need to determine whether it can grant a guardian authority to revoke a revocable trust under local law or whether it will be necessary to appoint a conservator for that purpose.

2001 Amendment. By amendment in 2001, revocation by "executing a later will or codicil" in subsection (c)(2)(A) [not adopted] was changed to revocation by a "later will or codicil" to avoid an implication that the trust is revoked immediately upon execution of the will or codicil and not at the testator's death.

72-38-603. Settlor's powers — powers of withdrawal.

Official Comments

This section recognizes that the settlor of a revocable trust is in control of the trust and should have the right to enforce the trust. Pursuant to this section, the duty under Section 813 [72-38-813] to inform and report to beneficiaries is owed to the settlor of a revocable trust as long as the settlor has capacity.

If the settlor loses capacity, subsection (a) [72-38-603(1)] no longer applies, with the consequence that the rights of the beneficiaries are no longer subject to the settlor's control. The beneficiaries are then entitled to request information concerning the trust and the trustee must provide the beneficiaries with annual trustee reports and whatever other information may be required under Section 813 [72-38-813]. However, because this section may be freely overridden in the terms of the trust, a settlor is free to deny the beneficiaries these rights, even to the point of directing the trustee not to inform them of the existence of the trust. Also, should an incapacitated settlor later regain capacity, the beneficiaries' rights will again be subject to the settlor's control.

Typically, the settlor of a revocable trust will also be the sole or primary beneficiary of the trust, and the settlor has control over whether to take action against a trustee for breach of trust. Upon the settlor's incapacity, any right of action the settlor-trustee may have against the trustee for breach of trust occurring while the settlor had capacity will pass to the settlor's agent or conservator, who would succeed to the settlor's right to have property restored to the trust. Following the death or incapacity of the settlor, the beneficiaries would have a right to maintain an action against a trustee for breach of trust. However, with respect to actions occurring prior to the settlor's death or incapacity, an action by the beneficiaries could be barred by the settlor's consent or by other events such as approval of the action by a successor trustee. For the requirements of a consent, see Section 1009 [72-38-1009].

Subsection (b) [72-38-603(2)] makes clear that a holder of a power of withdrawal has the same powers over the trust as the settlor of a revocable trust. Equal treatment is warranted due to the holder's equivalent power to control the trust. For the definition of power of withdrawal, see Section 103(11) [72-38-103(13)].

2001 Amendment. By a 2001 amendment, former subsection (b) was deleted. Former subsection (b) provided: "While a trust is revocable and the settlor does not have capacity to revoke the trust, rights of the beneficiaries are held by the beneficiaries." No substantive change was intended by this amendment. Former subsection (b) was superfluous. Rights of the beneficiaries are always held by the beneficiaries unless taken away by some other provision. Subsection (a) [72-38-603(1)] grants these rights to the settlor of a revocable trust while the settlor has capacity. Upon a settlor's loss of capacity, these rights are held by the beneficiaries with or without former subsection (b).

2003 Amendment. The purpose of former subsection (b), which was deleted in 2003, was to make certain that upon revocation of amendment of a joint trust by fewer than all of its settlors, that the trustee would notify the nonparticipating settlor or settlors. The subsection, which provided that "If a revocable trust has more than one settlor, the duties of the trustee are owed to all of the settlors having capacity to revoke the trust," imposed additional duties upon a trustee and unnecessarily raised interpretative questions as to its scope. The drafter's original intent is restored, and in a much clearer form, by repealing former subsection (b), and by amending Section 602 to add a subsection (b)(3) [72-38-602(2)(c)] that states explicitly what former subsection (b) was trying to achieve.

2004 Amendment. The amendment places in brackets and makes optional the language in subsection (a) [not adopted] dealing with the settlor's capacity.

Section 603 [72-38-603] generally provides that while a trust is revocable, all rights that the trust's beneficiaries would otherwise possess are subject to the control of the settlor. This section, however, negates the settlor's control if the settlor is incapacitated. In such case, the beneficiaries are entitled to assert all rights provided to them under the Code, including the right to information concerning the trust.

Two issues have arisen concerning this incapacity limitation. First, because determining when a settlor is incapacitated is not always clear, concern has been expressed that it will often be difficult in a particular case to determine whether the settlor has become incapacitated and the settlor's control of the beneficiary's rights have ceased. Second, concern has been expressed that this section prescribes a different rule for revocable trusts than for wills and that the rules for both should instead be the same. In the case of a will, the devisees have no right to know of the dispositions made in their favor until the testator's death, whether or not the testator is incapacitated. Under Section 603 [72-38-603], however, the remainder beneficiary's right to know commences on the settlor's incapacity.

Concluding that uniformity among the states on this issue is not essential, the drafting committee has decided to place the reference to the settlor's incapacity in Section 603(a) [not adopted] in brackets. Enacting jurisdictions are free to strike the incapacity limitation or to provide a more precise definition of when a settlor is incapacitated, as has been done in the Missouri enactment (Mo. Stat. Ann. §456.6-603).

72-38-604. Limitation on action contesting validity of revocable trust — distribution of trust property.

Official Comments

This section provides finality to the question of when a contest of a revocable trust may be brought. The section is designed to allow an adequate time in which to bring a contest while at the same time permitting the expeditious distribution of the trust property following the settlor's death.

A trust can be contested on a variety of grounds. For example, the contestant may allege that no trust was created due to lack of intent to create a trust or lack of capacity (see Section 402 [72-38-402]), that undue influence, duress, or fraud was involved in the trust's creation (see Section 406 [72-38-406]), or that the trust had been revoked or modified (see Section 602 [72-38-602]). A "contest" is an action to invalidate all or part of the terms of the trust or of property transfers to the trustee. An action against a beneficiary or other person for intentional interference with an inheritance or gift, not being a contest, is not subject to this section. For the law on intentional interference, see Restatement (Second) of Torts §774B (1979). Nor does this section preclude an action to determine the validity of a trust that is brought during the settlor's lifetime, such as a petition for a declaratory judgment, if such action is authorized by other law. See Section 106 [72-38-106] (Uniform Trust Code supplemented by common law of trusts and principles of equity).

This section applies only to a revocable trust that becomes irrevocable by reason of the settlor's death. A trust that became irrevocable by reason of the settlor's lifetime release of the power to revoke is outside its scope. A revocable trust does not become irrevocable upon a settlor's loss of capacity. Pursuant to Section 602 [72-38-602], the power to revoke may be exercised by the settlor's agent, conservator, or guardian, or personally by the settlor if the settlor regains capacity.

Subsection (a) [72-38-602(1)] specifies a time limit on when a contest can be brought. A contest is barred upon the first to occur of two possible events. The maximum possible time for bringing a contest is three years from the settlor's death. This should provide potential contestants with ample time in which to determine whether they have an interest that will be affected by the trust, even if formal notice of the trust is lacking. The three-year period is derived from Section 3-108 of the Uniform Probate Code. Three years is the maximum limit under the UPC for contesting a nonprobated will. Enacting jurisdictions prescribing shorter or longer time limits for contest of a nonprobated will should substitute their own time limit. To facilitate this process, the "three-year" period has been placed in brackets.

A trustee who wishes to shorten the contest period may do so by giving notice. Drawing from California Probate Code §16061.7, subsection (a)(2) [72-38-604(1)(b)] bars a contest by a potential contestant 120 days after the date the trustee sent that person a copy of the trust instrument and informed the person of the trust's existence, of the trustee's name and address, and of the time allowed for commencing a contest. The reference to "120" days is placed in brackets to suggest to the enacting jurisdiction that it substitute its statutory time period for contesting a will following notice of probate. The 120 day period in subsection (a)(2) [72-38-604(1)(b)] is subordinate to the three-year bar in subsection (a)(1) [72-38-604(1)(a)]. A contest is automatically barred three years after the settlor's death even if notice is sent by the trustee less than 120 days prior to the end of that period.

Because only a small minority of trusts are actually contested, trustees should not be restrained from making distributions because of concern about possible liability should a contest later be filed. Absent a protective statute, a trustee is ordinarily absolutely liable for misdelivery of the trust assets, even if the trustee reasonably believed that the distribution was proper. See Restatement (Second) of Trusts §226 (1959). Subsection (b) [72-38-604(2)] addresses liability concerns by allowing the trustee, upon the settlor's death, to proceed expeditiously to distribute the trust property. The trustee may distribute the trust property in accordance with the terms of the trust until and unless the trustee receives notice of a pending judicial proceeding contesting the validity of the trust, or until notified by a potential contestant of a possible contest, followed by its filing within 60 days.

Even though a distribution in compliance with subsection (b) [72-38-604(2)] discharges the trustee from potential liability, subsection (c) [72-38-604(3)] makes the beneficiaries of what later turns out to have been an invalid trust liable to return any distribution received. Issues as to whether the distribution must be returned with interest, or with income earned or profit made are not addressed in this section but are left to the law of restitution.

For purposes of notices under this section, the substitute representation principles of Article 3 are applicable. The notice by the trustee under subsection (a)(2) [72-38-604(1)(b)] or by a potential contestant under subsection (b)(2) [72-38-604(2)(b)] must be given in a manner reasonably suitable under the circumstances and likely to result in its receipt. See Section 109(a) [72-38-109(1)].

This section does not address possible liability for the debts of the deceased settlor or a trustee's possible liability to creditors for distributing trust assets. For possible liability of the trust, see Section 505(a)(3) [72-38-505(1)(c)] and Comment. Whether a trustee can be held personally liable for creditor claims following distribution of trust assets is addressed in Uniform Probate Code §6-102, which was added to that Code in 1998.

Office of Trustee

Part Official Comments

This article contains a series of default rules dealing with the office of trustee. Sections 701 [72-38-701] and 702 [72-38-702] address the process for getting a trustee into office, including the procedures for indicating an acceptance and whether bond will be required. Section 703 [72-38-703] addresses cotrustees, permitting the cotrustees to act by majority action and specifying the extent to which one trustee may delegate to another. Sections 704 [72-38-704] through 707 [72-38-707] address changes in the office of trustee, specifying the circumstances when a vacancy must be filled, the procedure for resignation, the grounds for removal, and the process for appointing a successor. Sections 708 [72-38-708] and 709 [72-38-709] prescribe the standards for determining trustee compensation and reimbursement for expenses advanced.

Except for the court's authority to order bond, all of the provisions of this article are subject to modification in the terms of the trust. See Section 105 [72-38-105].

CASES DECIDED PRIOR TO ADOPTION OF 1989 TRUST CODE

Common-Law Trust Deadlocked in Business Matters: In an action to quiet title to mining property owned by common-law trust of five trustees, the interest of one of whom had allegedly been transferred to cross complainant who had never received his stock, resulting in a hopeless deadlock of the remaining four in business matters by a vote of two to two, and the Court appointed a receiver at the request of cross complainant, the remedies provided by the trust agreement should have been exhausted first and, under 72-23-507 (now repealed), the Court could appoint a successor to fill the vacancy if the agreement does not provide a method.

Remanded for revocation of order appointing receiver. Demos v. Doepker, 116 M 264, 149 P2d 544 (1944).

Vacancy — How Filled: Under 72-23-507 (now repealed), where a bank designated trustee of a sum of money for a specified purpose became insolvent and quit business, the District Court was required to appoint a successor. Conley v. Johnson, 101 M 376, 54 P2d 585 (1936).

Substitute Trustee: When a mother upon her deathbed delivered a quantity of jewelry to her daughter-in-law with instruction to turn it over to her surviving husband to be in turn delivered to their sons when old enough to appreciate the gift, the result of the transaction was the creation of a voluntary trust, which was not terminated by the death of the father before the trust was executed, the Court in such a case having power to appoint a trustee to carry it out. Stagg v. Stagg, 90 M 180, 300 P 539 (1931).

72-38-701. Accepting or declining trusteeship.

Official Comments

This section, which specifies the requirements for a valid acceptance of the trusteeship, implicates many of the same issues that arise in determining whether a trust has been revoked. Consequently, the two provisions track each other closely. Compare Section 701(a) [72-38-701(1)], with Section 602(c) [72-38-602(3)] (procedure for revoking or modifying trust). Procedures specified in the terms of the trust are recognized, but only substantial, not literal compliance is required. A failure to meet technical requirements, such as notarization of the trustee's signature, does not result in a failure to accept. Ordinarily, the trustee will indicate acceptance by signing the trust instrument or signing a separate written instrument. However, this section validates any other method demonstrating the necessary intent, such as by knowingly exercising trustee powers, unless the terms of the trust make the specified method exclusive. This section also does not preclude an acceptance by estoppel. For general background on issues relating to trustee acceptance and rejection, see Restatement (Third) of Trusts §35 (Tentative Draft No. 2, approved 1999); Restatement (Second) of Trusts §102 (1959). Consistent with Section 201(b) [not adopted], which emphasizes that continuing judicial supervision of a trust is the rare exception, not the rule, the Uniform Trust Code does not require that a trustee qualify in court.

To avoid the inaction that can result if the person designated as trustee fails to communicate a decision either to accept or to reject the trusteeship, subsection (b) [72-38-701(2)] provides that a failure to accept within a reasonable time constitutes a rejection of the trusteeship. What will constitute a reasonable time depends on the facts and circumstances of the particular case. A major consideration is possible harm that might occur if a vacancy in a trusteeship is not filled in a timely manner. A trustee's rejection normally precludes a later acceptance but does not cause the trust to fail. See Restatement (Third) of Trusts §35 cmt. c (Tentative Draft No. 2, approved 1999). Regarding the filling of a vacancy in the event of a rejection, see Section 704 [72-38-704].

A person designated as trustee who decides not to accept the trusteeship need not provide a formal rejection, but a clear and early communication is recommended. The appropriate recipient of the rejection depends upon the circumstances. Ordinarily, it would be appropriate to communicate the rejection to the person who informed the designee of the proposed trusteeship. If judicial proceedings involving the trust are pending, the rejection could be filed with the court. In the case of a person named as trustee of a revocable trust, it would be appropriate to communicate the rejection to the settlor. In any event, it would be best to inform a beneficiary with a significant interest in the trust because that beneficiary might be more motivated than others to seek appointment of a new trustee.

Subsection (c)(1) [72-38-701(3)(a)] makes clear that a nominated trustee may act expeditiously to protect the trust property without being considered to have accepted the trusteeship. However, upon conclusion of the intervention, the nominated trustee must send a rejection of office to the settlor, if living and competent, otherwise to a qualified beneficiary.

Because of the potential liability that can inhere in trusteeship, subsection (c)(2) [72-38-701(3)(b)] allows a person designated as trustee to inspect the trust property without accepting the trusteeship. The condition of real property is a particular concern, including possible tort liability for the condition of the premises or liability for violation of state or federal environmental laws such as CERCLA, 42 U.S.C. §9607. For a provision limiting a trustee's personal liability for obligations arising from ownership or control of trust property, see Section 1010(b) [72-38-1010(2)].

CASES DECIDED PRIOR TO ADOPTION OF 1989 TRUST CODE

Acceptance of Trust: In order to bring about a trust relationship so as to bind the trustee thereby there must have been some act or declaration by the trustee indicating an acceptance of the trust. Wood v. Robbins, 67 M 409, 215 P 1101 (1923).

72-38-702. Trustee's bond.

Official Comments

This provision is consistent with the Restatement Third and with the bonding provisions of the Uniform Probate Code. See Restatement (Third) of Trusts §34(3) and cmt. a (Tentative Draft No. 2, approved 1999); Uniform Probate Code §§3-604 (personal representatives), 5-415 (conservators), and 7-304 (trustees). Because a bond is required only if the terms of the trust require bond or a bond is found by the court to be necessary to protect the interests of beneficiaries, bond should rarely be required under this Code.

Despite the ability of the court pursuant to Section 105(b)(6) [72-38-105(2)(f)] to override a term of the trust waiving bond, the court should order bond in such cases only for good reasons. Similarly, the court should rarely dispense with bond if the settlor directed that the trustee give bond.

This section does not attempt to detail all of the technical bonding requirements that the court may impose. Typical requirements are listed in the Uniform Probate Code sections cited above. The amount of a bond otherwise required may be reduced by the value of trust property deposited in a manner that prevents its unauthorized disposition, and by the value of real property which the trustee, by express limitation of power, lacks power to convey without court authorization. Also, the court may excuse or otherwise modify a requirement of a bond, reduce or increase the amount of a bond, release a surety, or permit the substitution of another bond with the same or different sureties.

Subsection (c) [72-38-702(3)] clarifies that a regulated financial-service institution need not provide bond for individual trusts. Such institutions must meet detailed financial responsibility requirements in order to do trust business in the State, thereby obviating the need to post bonds in individual trusts. Subsection (c) [72-38-702(3)] is placed in brackets because the enacting jurisdiction may have already dealt with the subject in separate legislation, such as in its statutes on regulation of financial institutions. Instead of the phrase "regulated financial-service institution," enacting jurisdictions may wish to substitute their own term for institutions qualified to engage in trust business in the State.

72-38-703. Cotrustees.

Official Comments

This section contains most but not all of the Code's provisions on cotrustees. Other provisions relevant to cotrustees include Sections 704 [72-38-704] (vacancy in trusteeship need not be filled if cotrustee remains in office), 705 [72-38-705] (notice of resignation must be given to cotrustee), 706 [72-38-706] (lack of cooperation among cotrustees as ground for removal), 707 [72-38-707] (obligations of resigning or removed trustee), 813 [72-38-813] (reporting requirements upon vacancy in trusteeship), and 1013 [72-38-1013] (authority of cotrustees to authenticate documents).

Cotrustees are appointed for a variety of reasons. Having multiple decision-makers serves as a safeguard against eccentricity or misconduct. Cotrustees are often appointed to gain the advantage of differing skills, perhaps a financial institution for its permanence and professional skills, and a family member to maintain a personal connection with the beneficiaries. On other occasions, cotrustees are appointed to make certain that all family lines are represented in the trust's management.

Cotrusteeship should not be called for without careful reflection. Division of responsibility among cotrustees is often confused, the accountability of any individual trustee is uncertain, obtaining consent of all trustees can be burdensome, and unless an odd number of trustees is named deadlocks requiring court resolution can occur. Potential problems can be reduced by addressing division of responsibilities in the terms of the trust. Like the other sections of this article, this section is freely subject to modification in the terms of the trust. See Section 105.

Much of this section is based on comparable provisions of the Restatement of Trusts, although with extensive modifications. Reference should also be made to ERISA §405 (29 U.S.C. §1105), which in recent years has been the statutory base for the most significant case law on the powers and duties of cotrustees.

Subsection (a) [72-38-703(1)] is in accord with Restatement (Third) of Trusts §39 (Tentative Draft No. 2, approved 1999), which rejects the common law rule, followed in earlier Restatements, requiring unanimity among the trustees of a private trust. See Restatement (Second) of Trusts §194 (1959). This section is consistent with the prior Restatement rule applicable to charitable trusts, which allowed for action by a majority of trustees. See Restatement (Second) of Trusts §383 (1959).

Under subsection (b) [72-38-703(2)], a majority of the remaining trustees may act for the trust when a vacancy occurs in a cotrusteeship. Section 704 [72-38-704] provides that a vacancy in a cotrusteeship need be filled only if there is no trustee remaining in office.

Pursuant to subsection (c) [72-38-703(3)], a cotrustee must participate in the performance of a trustee function unless the cotrustee has properly delegated performance to another cotrustee, or the cotrustee is unable to participate due to temporary incapacity or disqualification under other law. Other laws under which a cotrustee might be disqualified include federal securities law and the ERISA prohibited transactions rules. Subsection (d) [72-38-703(4)] authorizes a cotrustee to assume some or all of the functions of another trustee who is unavailable to perform duties as provided in subsection (c) [72-38-703(3)].

Subsection (e) [72-38-703(5)] addresses the extent to which a trustee may delegate the performance of functions to a cotrustee. The standard differs from the standard for delegation to an agent as provided in Section 807 because the two situations are different. Section 807 [72-38-807], which is identical to Section 9 of the Uniform Prudent Investor Act, recognizes that many trustees are not professionals. Consequently, trustees should be encouraged to delegate functions they are not competent to perform. Subsection (e) [72-38-703(5)] is premised on the assumption that the settlor selected cotrustees for a specific reason and that this reason ought to control the scope of a permitted delegation to a cotrustee. Subsection (e) [72-38-703(5)] prohibits a trustee from delegating to another trustee functions the settlor reasonably expected the trustees to perform jointly. The exact extent to which a trustee may delegate functions to another trustee in a particular case will vary depending on the reasons the settlor decided to appoint cotrustees. The better practice is to address the division of functions in the terms of the trust, as allowed by Section 105 [72-38-105]. Subsection (e) [72-38-703(5)] is based on language derived from Restatement (Second) of Trusts §171 (1959). This section of the Restatement Second, which applied to delegations to both agents and cotrustees, was superseded, as to delegation to agents, by Restatement (Third) of Trusts: Prudent Investor Rule §171 (1992).

By permitting the trustees to act by a majority, this section contemplates that there may be a trustee or trustees who might dissent. Trustees who dissent from the acts of a cotrustee are in general protected from liability. Subsection (f) [72-38-703(6)] protects trustees who refused to join in the action. Subsection (h) [72-38-703(8)] protects a dissenting trustee who joined the action at the direction of the majority, such as to satisfy a demand of the other side to a transaction, if the trustee expressed the dissent to a cotrustee at or before the time of the action in question. However, the protections provided by subsections (f) [72-38-703(6)] and (h) [72-38-703(8)] no longer apply if the action constitutes a serious breach of trust. In that event, subsection (g) [72-38-703(7)] may impose liability against a dissenting trustee for failing to take reasonable steps to rectify the improper conduct. The responsibility to take action against a breaching cotrustee codifies the substance of Sections 184 and 224 of the Restatement (Second) of Trusts (1959).

CASES DECIDED PRIOR TO ADOPTION OF 1989 TRUST CODE

Trustees of Dissolved Corporation: One of five statutory trustees in charge of the affairs of a dissolved corporation may not prosecute an appeal to the Supreme Court from an order appointing a receiver for the corporation against the wishes of his cotrustees, irrespective of whether unit or majority rule of action controls under certain statutes. Union Bank & Trust Co. of Helena v. Penwell, 99 M 255, 42 P2d 457 (1935).

Action as Unit Required to Dispose of Business: The trustees are not merely agents who act independently one of another. They constitute a board and they can act only as a unit in the disposition of any business of the trust which requires the exercise of judgment or discretion. Gordon Campbell Petroleum Co. v. Gordon Campbell-Kevin Syndicate, 75 M 261, 242 P 540

(1926), distinguished in Bentall v. Koenig Bros., Inc., 140 M 339, 372 P2d 91 (1962). See also Williard v. Campbell Oil Co., 77 M 30, 248 P 219 (1926).

Business Trust: Since a trustee cannot take part in any transaction concerning the trust in which he is interested (72-20-204, now repealed), a contract entered into between a common-law trust at a meeting of its board of trustees attended by only two of its three members, and a company of which one of the two was the virtual owner was a nullity, and the fact that the third member in writing subsequently gave his approval did not render it valid for the reason that under 72-24-207 (now repealed), the board could act only as a board when assembled as such and not through the individuals composing it. Williard v. Campbell Oil Co., 77 M 30, 248 P 219 (1926).

72-38-704. Vacancy in trusteeship — appointment of successor.

Official Comments

This section lists the ways in which a trusteeship becomes vacant and the rules on filling the vacancy. See also Sections 701 [72-38-701] (accepting or declining trusteeship), 705 [72-38-705] (resignation), and 706 [72-38-706] (removal). Good drafting practice suggests that the terms of the trust deal expressly with the problem of vacancies, naming successors and specifying the procedure for filling vacancies. This section applies only if the terms of the trust fail to specify a procedure.

The disqualification of a trustee referred to in subsection (a)(4) [72-38-704(1)(d)] would include a financial institution whose right to engage in trust business has been revoked or removed. Such disqualification might also occur if the trust's principal place of administration is transferred to a jurisdiction in which the trustee, whether an individual or institution, is not qualified to act.

Subsection (b) [72-38-704(2)] provides that a vacancy in the cotrusteeship must be filled only if the trust has no remaining trustee. If a vacancy in the cotrusteeship is not filled, Section 703 [72-38-703] authorizes the remaining cotrustees to continue to administer the trust. However, as provided in subsection (e) [72-38-704(4)], the court, exercising its inherent equity authority, may always appoint additional trustees if the appointment would promote better administration of the trust. See Restatement (Third) of Trusts Section 34 cmt. e (Tentative Draft No. 2, approved 1999); Restatement (Second) of Trusts Section 108 cmt. e (1959).

Subsection (c) [72-38-704(3)] provides a procedure for filling a vacancy in the trusteeship of a noncharitable trust. Absent an effective provision in the terms of the trust, subsection (c)(2) [72-38-704(3)(b)] permits a vacancy in the trusteeship to be filled, without the need for court approval, by a person selected by unanimous agreement of the qualified beneficiaries. An effective provision in the terms of the trust for the designation of a successor trustee includes a procedure under which the successor trustee is selected by a person designated in those terms. Pursuant to Section 705(a)(1) [72-38-705(1)(a)], the qualified beneficiaries may also receive the trustee's resignation. If a trustee resigns following notice as provided in Section 705 [72-38-705], the trust may be transferred to a successor appointed pursuant to subsection (c)(2) [72-38-704(3)(b)] of this section, all without court involvement. A nonqualified beneficiary who is displeased with the choice of the qualified beneficiaries may petition the court for removal of the trustee under Section 706 [72-38-706].

If the qualified beneficiaries fail to make an appointment, subsection (c)(3) [72-38-704(3)(c)] authorizes the court to fill the vacancy. In making the appointment, the court should consider the objectives and probable intention of the settlor, the promotion of the proper administration of the trust, and the interests and wishes of the beneficiaries. See Restatement (Third) of Trusts Section 34 cmt. f (Tentative Draft No. 2, approved 1999); Restatement (Second) of Trusts Section 108 cmt. d (1959).

Subsection (d) [not adopted] specifies a procedure for filling a vacancy in the trusteeship of a charitable trust. Absent an effective designation in the terms of the trust, a successor trustee may be selected by the charitable organizations expressly designated to receive distributions in the terms of the trust but only if the attorney general concurs in the selection. If the attorney general does not concur in the selection, however, or if the trust does not designate a charitable organization to receive distributions, the vacancy may be filled only by the court. For the reason why the reference to the Attorney General is placed in brackets, see 2004 Amendment below.

In the case of a revocable trust, the appointment of a successor will normally be made directly by the settlor. As to the duties of a successor trustee with respect to the actions of a predecessor, see Section 812 [72-38-812].

2001 Amendment. Subsection (d) [not adopted], which creates a procedure for the filling of a vacancy in the trusteeship of a charitable trust, was added by a 2001 amendment.

2004 Amendment. The amendment to Section 704(d)(2) [not adopted] is a conforming amendment to the amendment to Section 110(d) [72-38-110(4)]. Section 110(d) [72-38-110(4)] provides that the attorney general has the rights of a qualified beneficiary with respect to charitable trusts having a principal place of administration in the state. If the enacting jurisdiction elects to delete or modify Section 110(d) [72-38-110(4)], then the enacting jurisdiction may wish to also modify subsection Section 704(d)(2) [not adopted] of this Section, which requires that the attorney general concur in the selection of a successor trustee nominated by a designated charitable organization.

72-38-705. Resignation of trustee.

Official Comments

This section rejects the common law rule that a trustee may resign only with permission of the court, and goes further than the Restatements, which allow a trustee to resign with the consent of the beneficiaries. See Restatement (Third) of Trusts §36 (Tentative Draft No.2, approved 1999); Restatement (Second) of Trusts §106 (1959). Concluding that the default rule ought to approximate standard drafting practice, the Drafting Committee provided in subsection (a) [72-38-705(1)] that a trustee may resign by giving notice to the qualified beneficiaries, a living settlor, and any cotrustee. A resigning trustee may also follow the traditional method and resign with approval of the court.

Restatement (Third) of Trusts §36 cmt. d (Tentative Draft No. 2, approved 1999), and Restatement (Second) of Trusts §106 cmt. b (1959), provide, similar to subsection (c) [72-38-705(3)], that a resignation does not release the resigning trustee from potential liabilities for acts or omissions while in office. The act of resignation can give rise to liability if the trustee resigns for the purpose of facilitating a breach of trust by a cotrustee. See Ream v. Frey, 107 F.3d 147 (3rd Cir. 1997).

Regarding the residual responsibilities of a resigning trustee until the trust property is delivered to a successor trustee, see Section 707 [72-38-707]. In the case of a revocable trust, because the rights of the qualified beneficiaries are subject to the settlor's control (see Section 603 [72-38-603]), resignation of the trustee is accomplished by giving notice to the settlor instead of the beneficiaries.

2001 Amendment. By a 2001 amendment, subsection (a)(1) [72-38-705(1)(a)] was amended to require that notice of a trustee's resignation be given to a living settlor. Previously, notice to a living settlor was required for a revocable but not irrevocable trust. Notice to the settlor of a revocable trust was required because the rights of the qualified beneficiaries, including the right to receive a trustee's resignation, are subject to the settlor's exclusive control. See Section 603 [72-38-603].

CASES DECIDED AFTER ADOPTION OF 1989 TRUST CODE

Material Purpose of Trust Frustrated — Modification of Trust for Appointment of Corporate Sole Trustee Proper: Eggebrecht died, leaving a wife and two young children. His wife was appointed personal representative of his intestate estate. Shortly after he died, Eggebrecht's parents filed several creditor's claims against the estate and sought to have a will, executed 10 years earlier, admitted to probate. The will left everything to Eggebrecht's brother and sisters and purported to disinherit any future spouse. Following lengthy litigation, the parties instead agreed to create an irrevocable trust, with the children as beneficiaries, the wife and mother as trustees, and the wife and both parents as trust advisers. About 3 years later, the wife sought funds from the trust to meet the children's needs, but her requests for disbursements were denied by the parents. The wife then petitioned to modify the trust, offering to resign as joint trustee and requesting substitution of a corporate trustee. One of the children gained majority during the pendency of the action and joined the suit with the wife, also expressing the belief that the solution was to have a corporate trustee administer the trust. The District Court found, and the Supreme Court agreed, that the true material purpose of the trust was to benefit the children by giving them support and maintenance and that that purpose was frustrated as a result of the joint trustees' inability to work together. Therefore, the reasons for modifying the trust to allow appointment of a corporate trustee outweighed the material purpose of having a trust adviser position, and the District Court properly exercised its discretion in eliminating the trust adviser position and appointing a corporate sole trustee. In re Eggebrecht Irrevocable Trust v. Eggebrecht, 2000 MT 189, 300 M 409, 4 P3d 1207, 57 St. Rep. 748 (2000).

72-38-706. Removal of trustee.

Official Comments

Subsection (a) [72-38-706(1)], contrary to the common law, grants the settlor of an irrevocable trust the right to petition for removal of a trustee. The right to petition for removal does not give the settlor of an irrevocable trust any other rights, such as the right to an annual report or to receive other information concerning administration of the trust. The right of a beneficiary to petition for removal does not apply to a revocable trust while the settlor has capacity. Pursuant to Section 603(a) [72-38-603(1)], while a trust is revocable and the settlor has capacity, the rights of the beneficiaries are subject to the settlor's exclusive control.

Trustee removal may be regulated by the terms of the trust. See Section 105 [72-38-105]. In fashioning a removal provision for an irrevocable trust, the drafter should be cognizant of the danger that the trust may be included in the settlor's federal gross estate if the settlor retains the power to be appointed as trustee or to appoint someone who is not independent. See Rev. Rul. 95-58, 1995-2 C.B. 191.

Subsection (b) [72-38-706(2)] lists the grounds for removal of the trustee. The grounds for removal are similar to those found in Restatement (Third) of Trusts Section 37 cmt. e (Tentative Draft No. 2, approved 1999). A trustee may be removed for untoward action, such as for a serious breach of trust, but the section is not so limited. A trustee may also be removed under a variety of circumstances in which the court concludes that the trustee is not best serving the interests of the beneficiaries. The term "interests of the beneficiaries" means the beneficial interests as provided in the terms of the trust, not as defined by the beneficiaries. See Section 103(8) [73-38-103(9)]. Removal for conduct detrimental to the interests of the beneficiaries is a well-established standard for removal of a trustee. See Restatement (Third) of Trusts Section 37 cmt. d (Tentative Draft No. 2, approved 1999); Restatement (Second) of Trusts Section 107 cmt. a (1959).

Subsection (b)(1) [72-38-706(2)(a)], consistent with Restatement (Third) of Trusts Section 37 cmt. e and g (Tentative Draft No, 2, approved 1999), makes clear that not every breach of trust justifies removal of the trustee. The breach must be "serious." A serious breach of trust may consist of a single act that causes significant harm or involves flagrant misconduct. A serious breach of trust may also consist of a series of smaller breaches, none of which individually justify removal when considered alone, but which do so when considered together. A particularly appropriate circumstance justifying removal of the trustee is a serious breach of the trustee's duty to keep the beneficiaries reasonably informed of the administration of the trust or to comply with a beneficiary's request for information as required by Section 813 [72-38-813]. Failure to comply with this duty may make it impossible for the beneficiaries to protect their interests. It may also mask more serious violations by the trustee.

The lack of cooperation among trustees justifying removal under subsection (b)(2) [72-38-706(2)(b)] need not involve a breach of trust. The key factor is whether the administration of the trust is significantly impaired by the trustees' failure to agree. Removal is particularly appropriate if the naming of an even number of trustees, combined with their failure to agree, has resulted in deadlock requiring court resolution. The court may remove one or more or all of the trustees. If a cotrustee remains in office following the removal, under Section 704 appointment of a successor trustee is not required.

Subsection (b)(2) [72-38-706(2)(b)] deals only with lack of cooperation among cotrustees, not with friction between the trustee and beneficiaries. Friction between the trustee and beneficiaries is ordinarily not a basis for removal. However, removal might be justified if a communications breakdown is caused by the trustee or appears to be incurable. See Restatement (Third) of Trusts Section 37 cmt. e (Tentative Draft No. 2, approved 1999).

Subsection (b)(3) [72-38-706(2)(c)] authorizes removal for a variety of grounds, including unfitness, unwillingness, or persistent failure to administer the trust effectively. Removal in any of these cases is allowed only if it best serves the interests of the beneficiaries. For the definition of "interests of the beneficiaries," see Section 103(8) [72-38-103(9)]. "Unfitness" may include not only mental incapacity but also lack of basic ability to administer the trust. Before removing a trustee for unfitness the court should consider the extent to which the problem might be cured by a delegation of functions the trustee is personally incapable of performing. "Unwillingness" includes not only cases where the trustee refuses to act but also a pattern of indifference to some or all of the beneficiaries. See Restatement (Third) of Trusts Section 37 cmt. e (Tentative Draft No. 2, approved 1999). A "persistent failure to administer the trust effectively" might include a long-term pattern of mediocre performance, such as consistently poor investment results when compared to comparable trusts.

It has traditionally been more difficult to remove a trustee named by the settlor than a trustee named by the court, particularly if the settlor at the time of the appointment was aware of the trustee's failings. See Restatement (Third) of Trusts Section 37 cmt. f (Tentative Draft No.2, approved 1999); Restatement (Second) of Trusts Section 107 cmt. f-g (1959). Because of the discretion normally granted to a trustee, the settlor's confidence in the judgment of the particular person whom the settlor selected to act as trustee is entitled to considerable weight. This deference to the settlor's choice can weaken or dissolve if a substantial change in the trustee's circumstances occurs. To honor a settlor's reasonable expectations, subsection (b)(4) [72-38-706(2)(d)] lists a substantial change of circumstances as a possible basis for removal of the trustee. Changed circumstances justifying removal of a trustee might include a substantial change in the character of the service or location of the trustee. A corporate reorganization of an institutional trustee is not itself a change of circumstances if it does not affect the service provided the individual trust account. Before removing a trustee on account of changed circumstances, the court must also conclude that removal is not inconsistent with a material purpose of the trust, that it will best serve the interests of the beneficiaries, and that a suitable cotrustee or successor trustee is available.

Subsection (b)(4) [72-38-706(2)(d)] also contains a specific but more limited application of Section 411 [72-38-411]. Section 411 [72-38-411] allows the beneficiaries by unanimous agreement to compel modification of a trust if the court concludes that the particular modification is not inconsistent with a material purpose of the trust. Subsection (b)(4) [72-38-706(2)(d)] of this section similarly allows the qualified beneficiaries to request removal of the trustee if the designation of the trustee was not a material purpose of the trust. Before removing the trustee the court must also find that removal will best serve the interests of the beneficiaries and that a suitable cotrustee or successor trustee is available.

Subsection (c) [72-38-706(3)] authorizes the court to intervene pending a final decision on a request to remove a trustee. Among the relief that the court may order under Section 1001(b) [72-38-1001(2)] is an injunction prohibiting the trustee from performing certain acts and the appointment of a special fiduciary to perform some or all of the trustee's functions. Pursuant to Section 1004 [72-38-1004], the court may also award attorney's fees as justice and equity may require.

CASES DECIDED AFTER ADOPTION OF 1989 TRUST CODE

No Abuse of Discretion in Failure to Remove Trustee of Trust: The beneficiary of a trust contended that the District Court should have removed the trustee of the trust, primarily because the trustee failed to file an annual accounting for the trust. The Supreme Court found no abuse of the District Court's discretion in denying the removal, noting that although the law requires an annual accounting, in this case the trust had no income or disbursements, so there was nothing to account for. The trustee was directed to file an annual accounting in order to protect the rights of the parties. In re Baird Trust, 2009 MT 81, 349 M 501, 204 P3d 703 (2009). See also In re Gershcow's Will, 261 NW2d 335 (Minn. 1977).

Trustee Acting Properly in Carrying Out Testator's Intent Rather Than Acting in Best Interests of Beneficiaries: The beneficiaries of a trust petitioned the District Court to remove Norwest as trustee on the basis that Norwest was not operating the trust in a way to maximize income to the beneficiaries, but rather in a manner to maximize the fees charged by Norwest.

The Supreme Court upheld the lower court's decision not to remove the trustee, stating that it is a basic principle of trust law that a trust is to be managed to carry out the testator's intent and that in the instant case, in examining the trust document, it is clear that the intent of the testator was to have the trust managed in the best interests of the trust estate. The Supreme Court went on to say that Norwest had greatly increased the value of the trust assets, which was in the best interest of the trust estate, even though that might not generate the most income for the beneficiaries. The Supreme Court's majority decision also included as dicta a detailed discussion countering points of the dissenting justices who argued in favor of removing the trustee. In re Estate of Berthot, 2002 MT 277, 312 M 366, 59 P3d 1080 (2002).

72-38-707. Delivery of property by former trustee.

Official Comments

This section addresses the continuing authority and duty of a resigning or removed trustee. Subject to the power of the court to make other arrangements or unless a cotrustee remains in office, a resigning or removed trustee has continuing authority until the trust property is delivered to a successor. If a cotrustee remains in office, there is no reason to grant a resigning or removed trustee any continuing authority, and none is granted under this section. In addition, if a cotrustee remains in office, the former trustee need not submit a final trustee's report. See Section 813(c) [72-38-813(3)].

There is ample authority in the Uniform Trust Code for the appointment of a special fiduciary, an appointment which can avoid the need for a resigning or removed trustee to exercise residual powers until a successor can take office. See Sections 704(e) [72-38-704(4)] (court may appoint additional trustee or special fiduciary whenever court considers appointment necessary for administration of trust), 705(b) [72-38-705(2)] (in approving resignation, court may impose conditions necessary for protection of trust property), 706(c) [72-38-706(3)] (pending decision on petition for removal, court may order appropriate relief), and 1001(b)(5) [72-38-1001(2)(e)] (to remedy breach of trust, court may appoint special fiduciary as necessary to protect trust property or interests of beneficiary).

If the former trustee has died, the Uniform Trust Code does not require that the trustee's personal representative windup the deceased trustee's administration. Nor is a trustee's conservator or guardian required to complete the former trustee's administration if the trustee's authority terminated due to an adjudication of incapacity. However, to limit the former trustee's liability, the personal representative, conservator or guardian may submit a trustee's report on the former trustee's behalf as authorized by Section 813(c) [72-38-813(3)]. Otherwise, the former trustee remains liable for actions taken during the trustee's term of office until liability is otherwise barred.

72-38-708. Compensation of trustee.

Official Comments

Subsection (a) [72-38-708(1)] establishes a standard of reasonable compensation. Relevant factors in determining this compensation, as specified in the Restatement, include the custom of the community; the trustee's skill, experience, and facilities; the time devoted to trust duties; the amount and character of the trust property; the degree of difficulty, responsibility and risk assumed in administering the trust, including in making discretionary distributions; the nature and costs of services rendered by others; and the quality of the trustee's performance. See Restatement (Third) of Trusts Section 38 cmt. c (Tentative Draft No. 2, approved 1999); Restatement (Second) of Trusts Section 242 cmt. b (1959).

In setting compensation, the services actually performed and responsibilities assumed by the trustee should be closely examined. A downward adjustment of fees may be appropriate if a trustee has delegated significant duties to agents, such as the delegation of investment authority to outside managers. See Section 807 [72-38-807] (delegation by trustee). On the other hand, a trustee with special skills, such as those of a real estate agent, may be entitled to extra compensation for performing services that would ordinarily be delegated. See Restatement (Third) of Trusts Section 38 cmt. d (Tentative Draft No. 2, approved 1999); Restatement (Second) of Trusts Section 242 cmt. d (1959).

Because "trustee" as defined in Section 103(20) [72-38-103(23)] includes not only an individual trustee but also cotrustees, each trustee, including a cotrustee, is entitled to reasonable compensation under the circumstances. The fact that a trust has more than one trustee does not mean that the trustees together are entitled to more compensation than had either acted alone. Nor does the appointment of more than one trustee mean that the trustees are eligible to receive the compensation in equal shares. The total amount of the compensation to be paid and how it will be divided depend on the totality of the circumstances. Factors to be considered include the settlor's reasons for naming more than one trustee and the level of responsibility assumed and exact services performed by each trustee. Often the fees of cotrustees will be in the aggregate higher than the fees for a single trustee because of the duty of each trustee to participate in administration and not delegate to a cotrustee duties the settlor expected the trustees to perform jointly. See Restatement (Third) of Trusts Section 38 cmt. i (Tentative Draft No. 2, approved 1999). The trust may benefit in such cases from the enhanced quality of decision-making resulting from the collective deliberations of the trustees.

Financial institution trustees normally base their fees on published fee schedules. Published fee schedules are subject to the same standard of reasonableness under the Uniform Trust Code as are other methods for computing fees. The courts have generally upheld published fee schedules but this is not automatic. Among the more litigated topics is the issue of termination fees. Termination fees are charged upon termination of the trust and sometimes upon transfer of the trust to a successor trustee. Factors relevant to whether the fee is appropriate include the actual work performed; whether a termination fee was authorized in the terms of the trust; whether the fee schedule specified the circumstances in which a termination fee would be charged; whether the trustee's overall fees for administering the trust from the date of the trust's creation, including the termination fee, were reasonable; and the general practice in the community regarding termination fees. Because significantly less work is normally involved, termination fees are less appropriate upon transfer to a successor trustee than upon termination of the trust. For representative cases, see Cleveland Trust Co. v. Wilmington Trust Co., 258 A.2d 58 (Del. 1969); In re Trusts Under Will of Dwan, 371 N.W. 2d 641 (Minn. Ct. App. 1985); Mercer v. Merchants National Bank, 298 A.2d 736 (N.H. 1972); In re Estate of Payson, 562 N.Y.S. 2d 329 (Surr. Ct. 1990); In re Indenture Agreement of Lawson, 607 A. 2d 803 (Pa. Super. Ct. 1992); In re Estate of Ischy, 415 A.2d 37 (Pa. 1980); Memphis Memorial Park v. Planters National Bank, 1986 Tenn. App. LEXIS 2978 (May 7, 1986); In re Trust of Sensenbrenner, 252 N.W. 2d 47 (Wis. 1977).

This Code does not take a specific position on whether dual fees may be charged when a trustee hires its own law firm to represent the trust. The trend is to authorize dual compensation as long as the overall fees are reasonable. For a discussion, see Ronald C. Link, Developments Regarding the Professional Responsibility of the Estate Administration Lawyer: The Effect of the Model Rules of Professional Conduct, 26 Real Prop. Prob. & Tr. J. 1, 22-38 (1991).

Subsection (b) [72-38-708(2)] permits the terms of the trust to override the reasonable compensation standard, subject to the court's inherent equity power to make adjustments downward or upward in appropriate circumstances. Compensation provisions should be drafted with care. Common questions include whether a provision in the terms of the trust setting the amount of the trustee's compensation is binding on a successor trustee, whether a dispositive provision for the trustee in the terms of the trust is in addition to or in lieu of the trustee's regular compensation, and whether a dispositive provision for the trustee is conditional on the person performing services as trustee. See Restatement (Third) of Trusts Section 38 cmt. e (Tentative Draft No.2, approved 1999); Restatement (Second) of Trusts Section 242 cmt. f (1959).

Compensation may be set by agreement. A trustee may enter into an agreement with the beneficiaries for lesser or increased compensation, although an agreement increasing compensation is not binding on a nonconsenting beneficiary. See Section 111(d) [72-38-111(4)] (matters that may be the resolved by nonjudicial settlement). See also Restatement (Third) of Trusts Section 38 cmt. f (Tentative Draft No. 2, approved 1999); Restatement (Second) of Trusts Section 242 cmt. i (1959). A trustee may also agree to waive compensation and should do so prior to rendering significant services if concerned about possible gift and income taxation of the compensation accrued prior to the waiver. See Rev. Rul. 66-167, 1966-1 C.B. 20. See also Restatement (Third) of Trusts Section 38 cmt. g (Tentative Draft No. 2, approved 1999); Restatement (Second) of Trusts Section 242 cmt. j (1959).

Section 816(15) [72-38-816(15)] grants the trustee authority to fix and pay its compensation without the necessity of prior court review, subject to the right of a beneficiary to object to the compensation in a later judicial proceeding. Allowing the trustee to pay its compensation without prior court approval promotes efficient trust administration but does place a significant burden on a beneficiary who believes the compensation is unreasonable. To provide a beneficiary with time to take action, and because of the importance of trustee's fees to the beneficiaries' interests, Section 813(b)(4) [72-38-813(2)(d)] requires a trustee to provide the qualified beneficiaries with advance notice of any change in the method or rate of the trustee's compensation. Failure to provide such advance notice constitutes a breach of trust, which, if sufficiently serious, would justify the trustee's removal under Section 706 [72-38-706].

Under Sections 501-502 of the Uniform Principal and Income Act (1997), one-half of a trustee's regular compensation is charged to income and the other half to principal. Chargeable to principal are fees for acceptance, distribution, or termination of the trust, and fees charged on disbursements made to prepare property for sale.

72-38-709. Reimbursement of expenses.

Official Comments

A trustee has the authority to expend trust funds as necessary in the administration of the trust, including expenses incurred in the hiring of agents. See Sections 807 [72-38-807] (delegation by trustee) and 816(15) [72-38-816(15)] (trustee to pay expenses of administration from trust).

Subsection (a)(1) [72-38-709(1)(a)] clarifies that a trustee is entitled to reimbursement from the trust for incurring expenses within the trustee's authority. The trustee may also withhold appropriate reimbursement for expenses before making distributions to the beneficiaries. See Restatement (Third) of Trusts §38 cmt. b (Tentative Draft No. 2, approved 1999); Restatement (Second) of Trusts §244 cmt. b (1959). A trustee is ordinarily not entitled to reimbursement for incurring unauthorized expenses. Such expenses are normally the personal responsibility of the trustee.

As provided in subsection (a)(2) [72-38-709(1)(b)], a trustee is entitled to reimbursement for unauthorized expenses only if the unauthorized expenditures benefitted the trust The purpose of this provision, which is derived from Restatement (Second) of Trusts §245 (1959), is not to ratify the unauthorized conduct of the trustee, but to prevent unjust enrichment of the trust. Given this purpose, a court, on appropriate grounds, may delay or even deny reimbursement for expenses which benefitted the trust. Appropriate grounds include: (1) whether the trustee acted in bad faith in incurring the expense; (2) whether the trustee knew that the expense was inappropriate; (3) whether the trustee reasonably believed the expense was necessary for the preservation of the trust estate; (4) whether the expense has resulted in a benefit; and (5) whether indemnity can be allowed without defeating or impairing the purposes of the trust. See Restatement (Second) of Trusts §245 cmt. g (1959).

Subsection (b) [72-38-709(2)] implements Section 802(h)(5) [72-38-802(8)(e)], which creates an exception to the duty of loyalty for advances by the trustee for the protection of the trust if the transaction is fair to the beneficiaries.

Reimbursement under this section may include attorney's fees and expenses incurred by the trustee in defending an action. However, a trustee is not ordinarily entitled to attorney's fees and expenses if it is determined that the trustee breached the trust. See 3A Austin W. Scott & William F. Fratcher, The Law of Trusts §245 (4th ed. 1988).

CASES DECIDED AFTER ADOPTION OF 1989 TRUST CODE

Trustee Entitled to Attorney Fees Incurred in Defending Against Action to Remove Trustee: The beneficiaries of a trust petitioned the District Court to remove Norwest as trustee on the basis that Norwest was not operating the trust in a way to maximize income to the beneficiaries, but rather in a manner to maximize the fees charged by Norwest. The Supreme Court upheld the lower court's decision not to remove the trustee, stating that it is a basic principle of trust law that a trust is to be managed to carry out the testator's intent and that in the instant case, in examining the trust document, it is clear that the intent of the testator was to have the trust managed in the best interests of the trust estate. The District Court awarded Norwest $10,463 in costs in defending the action and further ordered that the amount be paid out of the trust. The Supreme Court affirmed the lower court's decision, holding that the trust document provided for reimbursement for reasonable expenses, including attorney fees, and that 72-33-631 (now repealed) provides for reimbursement for expenditures properly incurred in the administration of a trust. In re Estate of Berthot, 2002 MT 277, 312 M 366, 59 P3d 1080 (2002).

Upon Substantiation, Trustee Entitled to Reimbursement for Attorney Fees Incurred in Preparing Trust Accounting: In a case involving disputes between the trustee, Norwest, and the trust beneficiaries, the lower court approved Norwest's Twenty-Ninth Accounting, including the trustee fees, but denied Norwest its attorney fees and expenses incurred in the preparation of the accounting on the basis that the amount claimed was unsubstantiated. Norwest argued that the District Court should have given it the opportunity to provide supporting evidence, rather than denying its fees and expenses outright. The Supreme Court ruled that upon substantiation, 72-33-631 (now repealed) provides for the reimbursement of reasonable attorney fees and expenses incurred in administration of the trust and remanded the case to the lower court, directing it to determine the amount of attorney fees and expenses to which the trustee was entitled. In re Estate of Berthot, 2002 MT 277, 312 M 366, 59 P3d 1080 (2002).

Living Trust — Costs and Attorney Fees Awarded to Trustee From Trust — Judicial Construction of Trust Documents: Clifford Dern and his wife Mary established a living trust for the benefit of their family. Derril Dern, a cotrustee, refused to sign a quitclaim deed conveying various properties left to the trust beneficiaries, and Mary brought an action to determine the beneficiaries' rights. The District Court relied upon 25-10-103 for its determination that payment of costs was discretionary with the court. The Supreme Court held that 25-10-103 applies only in those situations in which costs are not otherwise provided for. In this case, article 3 of the trust documents states that the trustee may pay "expenses of administration" from the trust. In reliance on that language and on 72-33-631 (now repealed) the Supreme Court held that the fees were a necessary expense of the trust, given Derril's refusal to sign the deed. The Supreme Court also noted that 72-33-631 (now repealed) allows repayment of expenditures incurred by the trustee in administration of the trust, that that provision was patterned after a section of the California probate code, and that California decisions interpreting that section of the California probate code hold that reasonable attorney fees are considered necessary expenses of trust administration. The Supreme Court also pointed out that its decision to allow fees is further buttressed by decisions interpreting 72-12-206. Finally, because the trust documents provided that only expenses of the trust were to be paid from the "trust estate", without further delineation of what constitutes the "trust estate", the Supreme Court interpreted those words to mean the entire trust estate, and because the marital trust estate was the only remaining source of funding for the entire estate, the fees were to be paid from the marital trust estate. In re Estate of Dern, 279 M 138, 928 P2d 123, 53 St. Rep. 1087 (1996).

CASES DECIDED PRIOR TO ADOPTION OF 1989 TRUST CODE

Borrowing Money to Pay Taxes: The rule that an executor is entitled to legal interest on necessary advances made in good faith when beneficial to the estate applies where he borrows money for the purpose of paying taxes on estate property without previous court order. In re Kelly's Estate, 91 M 98, 5 P2d 559 (1931).

Part 8
Duties and Powers of Trustee

Part Official Comments

This article states the fundamental duties of a trustee and lists the trustee's powers. The duties listed are not new, but how the particular duties are formulated and applied has changed over the years. This article was drafted where possible to conform with the 1994 Uniform Prudent Investor Act, which has been enacted in approximately two thirds of the States. The Uniform Prudent Investor Act prescribes a trustee's responsibilities with respect to the management and investment of trust property. The Uniform Trust Code also addresses a trustee's duties with respect to distribution to beneficiaries.

Because of the widespread adoption of the Uniform Prudent Investor Act [Title 72, ch. 38, pt. 9], it was decided not to disassemble and fully integrate the Prudent Investor Act into the Uniform Trust Code. Instead, States enacting the Uniform Trust Code are encouraged to recodify their version of the Prudent Investor Act by reenacting it as Article 9 of this Code [Title 72, ch. 38, pt. 9] rather than leaving it elsewhere in their statutes. Where the Uniform Trust Code and Uniform Prudent Investor Act overlap, States should enact the provisions of this article and not enact the duplicative provisions of the Prudent Investor Act. Sections of this article which overlap with the Prudent Investor Act are Sections 802 [72-38-802] (duty of loyalty), 803 [72-38-803] (impartiality), 805 [72-38-805] (costs of administration), 806 [72-38-806] (trustee's skills), and 807 [72-38-807] (delegation). For more complete instructions on how to enact the Uniform Prudent Investor Act as part of this Code, see the General Comment to Article 9 [Title 72, ch. 38, pt. 9 Official Comments].

All of the provisions of this article may be overridden in the terms of the trust except for certain aspects of the trustee's duty to keep the beneficiaries informed of administration (see Section 105(b)(8)-(9)) [not adopted], and the trustee's fundamental obligation to act in good faith, in accordance with the purposes of the trust, and for the benefit of the beneficiaries (see Section 105(b)(2)-(3) [72-38-105(2)(b) and (2)(c)]).

Part Case Notes

CASES DECIDED AFTER ADOPTION OF 1989 TRUST CODE

Breach of Fiduciary Duty of Trust Board to Establish, Improve, and Maintain Museum From Trust Proceeds: Alberta Bair's will established a charitable trust and directed the board overseeing the trust proceeds to establish, improve, and maintain a museum to display the family's historical artifacts. The museum was to be funded from the principal and interest of the trust for philanthropic purposes. The trust agreement provided that the museum had first priority on income distributed from the trust, but also empowered the board to sell, transfer, or relocate the museum 5 years after Bair's death if the board determined that the museum no longer served its purposes. The board initially established a museum and contracted with another museum for operations, but subsequently determined that the necessity for additional resources, without the likelihood of any return in terms of greater attendance or educational possibilities, made continuing the museum unfeasible, so the board ordered that the museum be closed. Friends of the museum sued the board for breach of its trust duties. The District Court found no breach of the board's fiduciary duty, but on appeal, the Supreme Court disagreed. The museum constituted the trust's primary purpose, and the board was required to spend the amount of trust funds necessary to establish, improve, and maintain the museum and breached its fiduciary duty to administer the trust by failing to do so, although delegating management to another museum was not a breach given the board's inexperience in museum management. The board also breached its duty by distributing more trust money through charitable grants than it spent on the museum, despite the museum "first priority" spending requirement. The board's trust duty was also breached when the board failed to substantiate that the public and educational purposes of the museum were no longer met. The District Court's finding that the board did not breach its trust duties was reversed, and the trustee was directed to appoint a new board to follow the directives of the trust agreement and to give the museum a fair opportunity to succeed. In re Bair Family Trust, 2008 MT 144, 343 M 138, 183 P3d 61 (2008), followed in Lane v. Caler, 2013 MT 108, 370 Mont. 30, 299 P.3d 827.

Conservator's Exercise of Reasonable Judgment Regarding Lease of Estate Property — Remand for Audit of Leasing Arrangement: The District Court appointed Saylor's stepson, Tim, as temporary guardian. Saylor and her brother, Deane, both filed written objections to the appointment, and the District Court then approved an agreement that made Deane the limited guardian and conservator of Saylor's out-of-state property and Tim the conservator of Saylor's Montana property. Saylor and Deane subsequently moved to remove Tim as conservator based on his failure to disclose certain financial documents relating to his administration of the estate. Tim had entered a grazing lease on Saylor's property that Saylor contended provided no material benefit to the estate. The District Court found no good cause to remove Tim as conservator and dismissed the petition for removal. On appeal, the Supreme Court noted that conservators are under the same duties as trustees and held that Tim exercised reasonable judgment regarding the lease arrangement and did not breach his duty as conservator so as to require his removal. Saylor's proposed substitute model lease was unrealistic. However, as a matter of equity, the Supreme Court remanded with instructions that the District Court order an audit of the lease arrangement to ensure that the figures attached to the lease conform to actualities and to allow the District Court to revise its prior determinations should the audit reveal facts that would require revision. In re Guardianship & Conservatorship of Saylor, 2005 MT 236, 328 M 415, 121 P3d 532 (2005).

Inventory Requirement Mandatory — Verifiable Accountings Required — Audit: The 90-day inventory requirement in 72-5-424 is not discretionary for Montana courts and conservators as a matter of law, even when liabilities exceed assets. The requirement is mandatory because: (1) the overall purpose of a conservatorship is to preserve the property of the protected person, and a conservator will likely be appointed only when there are assets that should be managed; (2) the plain language of 72-5-424 requires that every conservator prepare and file with the appointing court a complete inventory of the estate; and (3) the purpose of the statutory inventory requirement is to furnish a means by which the conservator's management may be checked and accounts verified. In constructing the inventory, the conservator has discretion to decide what to include and how to value the items in the estate, but that discretion must be verifiable. Pursuant to the court's duty to ensure that a conservator is acting in the best interests of the protected person, verification must consist of a means by which a trial court can independently determine whether accountings are generally complete and accurate, and credibility is not sufficient as documentation of accountings. In the present case, the record did not contain a complete, accurate, and verifiable accounting to show that the conservator properly accounted for the estate, so the Supreme Court remanded for an audit pursuant to 72-5-438. Once the conservator meets the burden of showing proper management and accounting, such as the example in 72-34-128 (now repealed), the burden shifts to the protected person to show that the inventory is incorrect. Redies v. Cosner & Uerling, 2002 MT 86, 309 M 315, 48 P3d 697 (2002). See also In re Allard Guardianship, 49 M 219, 141 P 661 (1914), and In re Estate of Clark, 237 M 179, 772 P2d 299 (1989).

CASES DECIDED PRIOR TO ADOPTION OF 1989 TRUST CODE

No Presumption of Competency in Transactions Between Conservator and Protected Persons: The lower court ruled that the protected persons, the elderly parents of the conservator, were competent. The Supreme Court reversed and remanded, stating that although the establishment of conservatorship is not an adjudication of incompetency and the protected person is presumed to have the capacity to contract with third persons, the presumption shifts with respect to transactions with the conservator. In such cases, the conservator has the burden of proving that the protected persons were at all times capable of understanding the nature of any transaction in which the conservator obtained a benefit. In re Estate of Clark, 237 M 179, 772 P2d 299, 46 St. Rep. 718 (1989), followed in Luke v. Gager, 2000 MT 377, 303 M 474, 16 P3d 377, 57 St. Rep. 1599 (2000).

Opportunity for Undue Influence Not Tantamount to Actual Undue Influence — Presumption Not Granted Absent Evidence of Misadministration: Where the older brother was named trustee and residuary devisee, younger brothers argued that 72-20-208 (now repealed) required the District Court to give them the benefit of the presumption against the trustee. They asserted that the statute places on the proponents of the will the burden of proving no undue influence. The Supreme Court held that the mere opportunity to exercise undue influence was not tantamount to the actual exercise of undue influence and that the burden of proving undue influence under 72-3-310 lies with the contestant of a will. The mere naming of a party as both trustee and residuary devisee does not create a transaction between the trustee and grantor/beneficiary and thereby shift the burden of proof to the trustee. The presumption created by 72-20-208 (now repealed) is rebuttable, and substantial evidence showed the will was properly executed, the testator was competent, and there was no improper act in the administration of the trust. In re Estate of Watson, 227 M 212, 738 P2d 494, 44 St. Rep. 1020 (1987).

Fiduciary Relationship Between Insurer and Insured — Breach Constituting Constructive Fraud: Fiduciary duties are simply a statement of the kind of good faith duty owed by an insurer to an insured. An insurance company has to consider the interests of both itself and the insured, but failure to act in the highest good faith toward the insured may constitute constructive fraud. Tynes v. Bankers Life Co., 224 M 350, 730 P2d 1115, 43 St. Rep. 2243 (1986).

Burdens of Proof in Case Involving Claimed Breach of Fiduciary Duty by Union Officers: In a dispute between a union and its former business managers, the District Court gave a general instruction that the party who asserts the affirmative of an issue has the burden of proving that issue by a preponderance of the evidence. The court further instructed the jury that if a fiduciary profits personally from the use of union funds, the burden shifts to the fiduciary to show he acted reasonably. Finally, the court instructed that a person with the duty to keep proper accounts has the burden of proving that he is entitled to the credits he claims. These instructions were consistent, clear, and accurate. Local Union No. 400 v. Bosh, 220 M 304, 715 P2d 36, 43 St. Rep. 388 (1986).

Fiduciary Duty of Union Officers: It was proper to instruct the jury on the duty of fiduciary responsibility owed by union officers by comparing it to a trust relationship; stating that, as fiduciaries, the officers were required to act prudently; and allowing the jury to consider the duties, powers, and obligations in the union constitution and bylaws. Local Union No. 400 v. Bosh, 220 M 304, 715 P2d 36, 43 St. Rep. 388 (1986). See also Luke v. Gager, 2000 MT 377, 303 M 474, 16 P3d 377, 57 St. Rep. 1599 (2000).

Fiduciary Relationship Basis for Constructive Fraud Cause of Action: Dealings or transactions between parties who have a fiduciary relationship provide a sufficient contract to support an action for constructive fraud. Local Union No. 400 v. Bosh, 220 M 304, 715 P2d 36, 43 St. Rep. 388 (1986). See also Luke v. Gager, 2000 MT 377, 303 M 474, 16 P3d 377, 57 St. Rep. 1599 (2000).

Insurer's Concealment of Material Facts — Bad Faith: In an action against his insurance company for failure to settle a third-party claim within policy limits, plaintiff offered and the trial court gave an instruction stating that an insurer is liable for bad faith if it intentionally conceals material facts within its knowledge and not known by the insured. Defendant contended it was error to give the instruction. On appeal, the Supreme Court stated that the duty of a fiduciary to his beneficiary is no less than that of a trustee. The fiduciary, as a trustee, is bound to act in the highest good faith toward his beneficiary and may not obtain any advantage over the latter by the slightest misrepresentation, concealment, threat, or adverse pressure of any kind. It was therefore not error to inform the jury that an insurance company which "intentionally" conceals material facts within its knowledge and not known to the insured may be found to be acting in bad faith. The concealed facts must be material to the subject of the trust or duty of the fiduciary as the instruction stated. The judgment was affirmed. Gibson v. W. Fire Ins. Co., 210 M 267, 682 P2d 725, 41 St. Rep. 1048 (1984).

Professional Misconduct — Lawyer Disbarred: The Supreme Court found substantial credible evidence supporting the findings of the Commission on Practice that the respondent violated 72-5-423, 72-20-201 (now repealed), 72-20-203 (now repealed), 72-20-204 (now repealed), 72-20-207 (now repealed), and various disciplinary rules and that he engaged in deceitful conduct for which he could be guilty of a misdemeanor in accordance with 37-61-406. The respondent was ordered disbarred and required to make restitution of $22,127.74. In re Reno, 187 M 262, 609 P2d 704, 37 St. Rep. 688 (1980).

Specific Finding on Existence of Confidential Relationship: There was no need for a specific finding on the issue of the existence of a confidential or fiduciary relationship because there was insufficient proof of wrongdoing on the part of defendant, even if he were considered to be a voluntary trustee. Boatman v. Berg, 176 M 208, 577 P2d 382 (1978).

Charitable Trust: A trustee of property dedicated to a charitable purpose is obligated to follow the directions of the trustor and to use ordinary care and diligence in the execution of the trust. Howard v. Sisters of Charity of Leavenworth, 193 F. Supp. 191 (D.C. Mont. 1961).

Vesting of Beneficiary's Interest in Stock: When the settlor of a revocable trust purchased a stock certificate in his name as trustee for a certain beneficiary and reserved the right to change the beneficiary and to receive the income and to vote the stock, upon the declaration of the trust, the named beneficiary became vested with an equitable interest in the stock, which consisted essentially in a right to have the trustee perform the duties imposed on him by law and eventually to succeed to complete ownership of the stock. Investors Stock Fund, Inc. v. Roberts, 179 F. Supp. 185 (D.C. Mont. 1959), affirmed in 286 F2d 647 (9th Cir. 1961).

Industrial Accident Board: The Industrial Accident Board (now the Division of Workers' Compensation of the Department of Labor and Industry) is under a legal and moral duty to deal fairly with workmen as beneficiaries and to disclose all matters affecting their interests, either beneficially or otherwise. Yurkovich v. Indus. Accident Bd., 132 M 77, 314 P2d 866 (1957).

Manager of Syndicate: By 72-20-201 and 72-20-207 (now repealed), it is made the duty of a trustee to act in the utmost good faith to those for whom he acts, and failure of the manager of a syndicate to inform those to whom sales of units were made through the use of the mails, that by contracts made by him approximately 50% of the proceeds of sales was paid as commissions and expenses to sales agents, was a breach of trust and a fraud upon them. Campbell v. U.S., 12 F2d 873 (1926).

Officer of Bank Dealing With It: While an officer or director of a bank stands in a fiduciary relation to it and will not be permitted to profit because of his position as such, he may engage in ordinary business transactions with it or through it, provided his dealings are fair and he takes no undue advantage of his fiduciary relationship. Duffy v. Hastings, 78 M 22, 252 P 316 (1926).

Director Dealing With Corporation: There is no presumption that a director dealing with his corporation does so in bad faith unless he gains an advantage thereby, and if the company is indebted to him on a bona fide claim he may enforce it by the same method open to any other of its creditors. Mayger v. St. Louis Min. & Mill. Co., 68 M 492, 219 P 1102 (1923).

Sale by Broker to Himself Voidable: A real estate broker entrusted with the privilege of selling the land of his principal cannot sell to himself, and where he does so, the sale made by him is voidable at the option of the owner. Crowley v. Rorvig, 61 M 245, 203 P 496 (1921), followed in Boyne, U.S.A., Inc. v. Mallas, 236 M 305, 769 P2d 1235, 46 St. Rep. 380 (1989).

Deposit in Bank for Benefit of Another: A bank which accepts a deposit of money in trust for the benefit of another, to be delivered to a third party upon the happening of a contingency, is bound to the highest good faith in executing the trust thus created; disposition of the deposit contrary to instruction renders the bank liable in damages either for a conversion or in assumpsit for money had and received. Glendenning v. Slayton, 55 M 586, 179 P 817 (1919).

All Conveyances Not Void — Burden of Proof: However 72-24-206 (now repealed) may be viewed, it is perfectly clear that not all conveyances by such trustees are prima facie void or voidable. They are void or voidable only if made in contravention of the trust, and as this presumably is not the character of any given conveyance, the burden is necessarily upon him who asserts to prove that such is its character. Horsky v. McKennan, 53 M 50, 162 P 376 (1916).

Guardian: It is fraud for a guardian to use the ward's funds entrusted to him for any purpose not connected with the trust. In re Allard Guardianship, 49 M 219, 141 P 661 (1914).

Accounting — Selling Price of Land: Good faith requires an agent employed to sell land to account to his principal for the entire selling price, less the agreed commission. Middlefork Cattle Co. v. Todd, 49 M 259, 141 P 641 (1914).

Real Estate Broker: If a broker is employed to sell land at a certain price on commission, and he finds a purchaser at that price, but induces his principal to sell at a lower figure, upon the representation that he cannot get any more, and the broker pockets the difference, it is a clear case of fraud upon his principal, and an action lies to compel him to disgorge the amount of profit so wrongfully realized. Middlefork Cattle Co. v. Todd, 49 M 259, 141 P 641 (1914).

Guardian as Trustee:

A guardian is a trustee and is held to the strict accountability attaching to a trustee. Smith v. Smith, 210 F 947 (D.C. Mont. 1914), affirmed in 224 F 1 (1915).

Where a guardian who had used his ward's money in payment of his debts concealed this fact from the Court in applying for authority to borrow his ward's money at a low rate of interest, the order so procured by fraud and imposition was voidable and afforded no protection to the guardian, and he was liable for legal interest both before and after the order granting such authority, there having been no such disclosure as is required by 72-20-204 (now repealed). Smith v. Smith, 210 F 947 (D.C. Mont. 1914), affirmed in 224 F 1 (1915).

Purchase of Property by Fiduciary — Director of Mining Corporation: The directors of a mining corporation are not allowed to profit by virtue of their position, and a breach of official duty on their part is fraud in law. A director who purchases the property of the corporation at a judicial sale must not be permitted to obtain a dishonest advantage over the corporation or its stockholders. Coombs v. Barker, 31 M 526, 79 P 1 (1905).

72-38-801. Duty to administer trust.

Official Comments

This section confirms that a primary duty of a trustee is to follow the terms and purposes of the trust and to do so in good faith. Only if the terms of a trust are silent or for some reason invalid on a particular issue does this Code govern the trustee's duties. This section also confirms that a trustee does not have a duty to act until the trustee has accepted the trusteeship. For the procedure for accepting a trusteeship, see Section 701 [72-38-701].

In administering the trust, the trustee must not only comply with this section but also with the other duties specified in this article, particularly the obligation not to place the interests of others above those of the beneficiaries (Section 802 [72-38-802]), the duty to act with prudence (Section 804 [72-38-804]), and the duty to keep the qualified beneficiaries reasonably informed about the administration of the trust (Section 813 [72-38-813]).

While a trustee generally must administer a trust in accordance with its terms and purposes, the purposes and particular terms of the trust can on occasion conflict. If such a conflict occurs because of circumstances not anticipated by the settlor, it may be appropriate for the trustee to petition under Section 412 [72-38-412] to modify or terminate the trust. Pursuant to Section 404 [72-38-404], the trustee is not required to perform a duty prescribed by the terms of the trust if performance would be impossible, illegal or contrary to public policy.

For background on the trustee's duty to administer the trust, see Restatement (Second) of Trusts §§164-169 (1959).

CASES DECIDED AFTER ADOPTION OF 1989 TRUST CODE

Breach of Fiduciary Duty of Trust Board to Establish, Improve, and Maintain Museum From Trust Proceeds: Alberta Bair's will established a charitable trust and directed the board overseeing the trust proceeds to establish, improve, and maintain a museum to display the family's historical artifacts. The museum was to be funded from the principal and interest of the trust for philanthropic purposes. The trust agreement provided that the museum had first priority on income distributed from the trust, but also empowered the board to sell, transfer, or relocate the museum 5 years after Bair's death if the board determined that the museum no longer served its purposes. The board initially established a museum and contracted with another museum for operations, but subsequently determined that the necessity for additional resources, without the likelihood of any return in terms of greater attendance or educational possibilities, made continuing the museum unfeasible, so the board ordered that the museum be closed. Friends of the museum sued the board for breach of its trust duties. The District Court found no breach of the board's fiduciary duty, but on appeal, the Supreme Court disagreed. The museum constituted the trust's primary purpose, and the board was required to spend the amount of trust funds necessary to establish, improve, and maintain the museum and breached its fiduciary duty to administer the trust by failing to do so, although delegating management to another museum was not a breach given the board's inexperience in museum management. The board also breached its duty by distributing more trust money through charitable grants than it spent on the museum, despite the museum "first priority" spending requirement. The board's trust duty was also breached when the board failed to substantiate that the public and educational purposes of the museum were no longer met. The District Court's finding that the board did not breach its trust duties was reversed, and the trustee was directed to appoint a new board to follow the directives of the trust agreement and to give the museum a fair opportunity to succeed. In re Bair Family Trust, 2008 MT 144, 343 M 138, 183 P3d 61 (2008), followed in Lane v. Caler, 2013 MT 108, 370 Mont. 30, 299 P.3d 827.

Trust Necessary for Support — Necessity Construed: The trust that the decedent set up for his wife, an Alzheimer's sufferer, provided in part that "The purposes of this Trust are to provide for and assure, so far as possible, the generous care and support of my said wife ... and to provide for funeral ... and any other expenses attendant upon ... her death. ... The trustee shall ... pay ... as much ... as Trustee deems necessary for her support, care and health .... The discretion ... shall be exercised liberally in favor of my said wife, it being my intention that she shall have, in addition to the necessities, a reasonable number of the luxuries of life, if she desires them." It was improper for the trustee to deny every request of the wife's guardian and conservator for aid on the basis that no financial need was shown and that the wife must spend her whole personal estate before the trust could be used. The trustee and lower court improperly used the trust's use of the word "necessary" to support the trustee's interpretation. The trustee's intent and the trust's wording on the whole showed this interpretation to be erroneous. The trust was ordered to pay the wife's living, medical, funeral, and burial expenses and to repay the conservator for amounts that the conservator had paid for care since the trustee's death. In the absence of statutory or contractual authority and absent bad faith or malicious behavior, the conservator was denied attorney fees. In re Estate of Lindgren, 268 M 96, 885 P2d 1280, 51 St. Rep. 1182 (1994).

72-38-802. Duty of loyalty.

Official Comments

This section addresses the duty of loyalty, perhaps the most fundamental duty of the trustee. Subsection (a) [72-38-802(1)] states the general principle, which is copied from Restatement (Second) of Trusts Section 170(1) (1959). A trustee owes a duty of loyalty to the beneficiaries, a principle which is sometimes expressed as the obligation of the trustee not to place the trustee's own interests over those of the beneficiaries. Most but not all violations of the duty of loyalty concern transactions involving the trust property, but breaches of the duty can take other forms. For a discussion of the different types of violations, see George G. Bogert & George T. Bogert, The Law of Trusts and Trustees Section 543 (Rev. 2d ed. 1993); and 2A Austin W. Scott & William F. Fratcher, The Law of Trusts Sections 170-170.24 (4th ed. 1987). The "interests of the beneficiaries" to which the trustee must be loyal are the beneficial interests as provided in the terms of the trust. See Section 103(8) [72-38-103(9)].

The duty of loyalty applies to both charitable and noncharitable trusts, even though the beneficiaries of charitable trusts are indefinite. In the case of a charitable trust, the trustee must administer the trust solely in the interests of effectuating the trust's charitable purposes. See Restatement (Second) of Trusts Section 379 cmt. a (1959).

Duty of loyalty issues often arise in connection with the settlor's designation of the trustee. For example, it is not uncommon that the trustee will also be a beneficiary. Or the settlor will name a friend or family member who is an officer of a company in which the settlor owns stock. In such cases, settlors should be advised to consider addressing in the terms of the trust how such conflicts are to be handled. Section 105 [72-38-105] authorizes a settlor to override an otherwise applicable duty of loyalty in the terms of the trust. Sometimes the override is implied. The grant to a trustee of authority to make a discretionary distribution to a class of beneficiaries that includes the trustee implicitly authorizes the trustee to make distributions for the trustee's own benefit.

Subsection (b) [72-38-802(2)] states the general rule with respect to transactions involving trust property that are affected by a conflict of interest. A transaction affected by a conflict between the trustee's fiduciary and personal interests is voidable by a beneficiary who is affected by the transaction. Subsection (b) [72-38-802(2)] carries out the "no further inquiry" rule by making transactions involving trust property entered into by a trustee for the trustee's own personal account voidable without further proof. Such transactions are irrebuttably presumed to be affected by a conflict between personal and fiduciary interests. It is immaterial whether the trustee acts in good faith or pays a fair consideration. See Restatement (Second) of Trusts Section 170 cmt. b (1959).

The rule is less severe with respect to transactions involving trust property entered into with persons who have close business or personal ties with the trustee. Under subsection (c) [72-38-802(3)], a transaction between a trustee and certain relatives and business associates is presumptively voidable, not void. Also presumptively voidable are transactions with corporations or other enterprises in which the trustee, or a person who owns a significant interest in the trustee, has an interest that might affect the trustee's best judgment. The presumption is rebutted if the trustee establishes that the transaction was not affected by a conflict between personal and fiduciary interests. Among the factors tending to rebut the presumption are whether the consideration was fair and whether the other terms of the transaction are similar to those that would be transacted with an independent party.

Even where the presumption under subsection (c) [72-38-802(3)] does not apply, a transaction may still be voided by a beneficiary if the beneficiary proves that a conflict between personal and fiduciary interests existed and that the transaction was affected by the conflict. The right of a beneficiary to void a transaction affected by a conflict of interest is optional. If the transaction proves profitable to the trust and unprofitable to the trustee, the beneficiary will likely allow the transaction to stand. For a comparable provision regulating fiduciary investments by national banks, see 12 C.F.R. Section 9.12(a).

As provided in subsection (b) [72-38-802(2)], no breach of the duty of loyalty occurs if the transaction was authorized by the terms of the trust or approved by the court, or if the beneficiary failed to commence a judicial proceeding within the time allowed or chose to ratify the transaction, either prior to or subsequent to its occurrence. In determining whether a beneficiary has consented to a transaction, the principles of representation from Article 3 [Title 72, ch. 38, pt. 3] may be applied.

Subsection (b)(5) [72-38-802(2)(e)], which is derived from Section 3-713(1) of the Uniform Probate Code, allows a trustee to implement a contract or pursue a claim that the trustee entered into or acquired before the person became or contemplated becoming trustee. While this subsection allows the transaction to proceed without automatically being voidable by a beneficiary, the transaction is not necessarily free from scrutiny. In implementing the contract or pursuing the claim, the trustee must still complete the transaction in a way that avoids a conflict between the trustee's fiduciary and personal interests. Because avoiding such a conflict will frequently be difficult, the trustee should consider petitioning the court to appoint a special fiduciary, as authorized by subsection (i) [72-38-802(9)], to work out the details and complete the transaction.

Subsection (d) [72-38-802(4)] creates a presumption that a transaction between a trustee and a beneficiary not involving trust property is an abuse by the trustee of a confidential relationship with the beneficiary. This subsection has limited scope. If the trust has terminated, there must be proof that the trustee's influence with the beneficiary remained. Furthermore, whether or not the trust has terminated, there must be proof that the trustee obtained an advantage from the relationship. The fact the trustee profited is insufficient to show an abuse if a third party would have similarly profited in an arm's length transaction. Subsection (d) [72-38-802(4)] is based on Cal. Prob. Code Section16004(c). See also 2A Austin W. Scott & William F. Fratcher Section 170.25 (4th ed. 1987), which states the same principle in a slightly different form: "Where he deals directly with the beneficiaries, the transaction may stand, but only if the trustee makes full disclosure and takes no advantage of his position and the transaction is in all respects fair and reasonable."

Subsection (e) [72-38-802(5)], which allows a beneficiary to void a transaction entered into by the trustee that involved an opportunity belonging to the trust, is based on Restatement (Second) of Trusts Section 170 cmt. k (1959). While normally associated with corporations and with their directors and officers, what is usually referred to as the corporate opportunity doctrine also applies to other types of fiduciary. The doctrine prohibits the trustee's pursuit of certain business activities, such as entering into a business in direct competition with a business owned by the trust, or the purchasing of an investment that the facts suggest the trustee was expected to purchase for the trust. For discussion of the corporate opportunity doctrine, see Kenneth B. Davis, Jr., Corporate Opportunity and Comparative Advantage, 84 Iowa L. Rev. 211 (1999); and Richard A. Epstein, Contract and Trust in Corporate Law: The Case of Corporate Opportunity, 21 Del. J. Corp. L. 5 (1996). See also Principles of Corporate Governance: Analysis and Recommendations Section 5.05 (American Law Inst. 1994).

Subsection (f) [72-38-802(6)] creates an exception to the no further inquiry rule for trustee investment in mutual funds. This exception applies even though the mutual fund company pays the financial-service institution trustee a fee for providing investment advice and other services, such as custody, transfer agent, and distribution, that would otherwise be provided by agents of the fund. Mutual funds offer several advantages for fiduciary investing. By comparison with common trust funds, mutual fund shares may be distributed in-kind when trust interests terminate, avoiding liquidation and the associated recognition of gain for tax purposes. Mutual funds commonly offer daily pricing, which gives trustees and beneficiaries better information about performance. Because mutual funds can combine fiduciary and nonfiduciary accounts, they can achieve larger size, which can enhance diversification and produce economies of scale that can lower investment costs.

Mutual fund investment also has a number of potential disadvantages. It adds another layer of expense to the trust, and it causes the trustee to lose control over the nature and timing of transactions in the fund. Trustee investment in mutual funds sponsored by the trustee, its affiliate, or from which the trustee receives extra fees has given rise to litigation implicating the trustee's duty of loyalty, the duty to invest with prudence, and the right to receive only reasonable compensation. Because financial institution trustees ordinarily provide advisory services to and receive compensation from the very funds in which they invest trust assets, the contention is made that investing the assets of individual trusts in these funds is imprudent and motivated by the effort to generate additional fee income. Because the financial institution trustee often will also charge its regular fee for administering the trust, the contention is made that the financial institution trustee's total compensation, both direct and indirect, is excessive.

Subsection (f) [72-38-802(6)] attempts to retain the advantages of mutual funds while at the same time making clear that such investments are subject to traditional fiduciary responsibilities. Nearly all of the States have enacted statutes authorizing trustees to invest in funds from which the trustee might derive additional compensation. Portions of subsection (f) [72-38-802(6)] are based on these statutes. Subsection (f) [72-38-802(6)] makes clear that such dual investment-fee arrangements are not automatically presumed to involve a conflict between the trustee's personal and fiduciary interests, but subsection (f) [72-38-802(6)] does not otherwise waive or lessen a trustee's fiduciary obligations. The trustee, in deciding whether to invest in a mutual fund, must not place its own interests ahead of those of the beneficiaries. The investment decision must also comply with the enacting jurisdiction's prudent investor rule. To obtain the protection afforded by subsection (f) [72-38-802(6)], the trustee must disclose at least annually to the beneficiaries entitled to receive a copy of the trustee's annual report the rate and method by which the additional compensation was determined. Furthermore, the selection of a mutual fund, and the resulting delegation of certain of the trustee's functions, may be taken into account under Section 708 [72-38-708] in setting the trustee's regular compensation. See also Uniform Prudent Investor Act Sections 7 and 9 and Comments; Restatement (Third) of Trusts: Prudent Investor Rule Section 227 cmt. m (1992).

Subsection (f) [72-38-802(6)] applies whether the services to the fund are provided directly by the trustee or by an affiliate. While the term "affiliate" is not used in subsection (c) [72-38-802(3)], the individuals and entities listed there are examples of affiliates. The term is also used in the regulations under ERISA. An "affiliate" of a fiduciary includes (1) any person who directly or indirectly, through one or more intermediaries, controls, is controlled by, or is under common control with the fiduciary; (2) any officer, director, partner, employee, or relative of the fiduciary, and any corporation or partnership of which the fiduciary is an officer, director or partner. See 29 C.F.R. Section 2510.3-21(e).

Subsection (g) [72-38-802(7)] addresses an overlap between trust and corporate law. It is based on Restatement of Trusts (Second) Section 193 cmt. a (1959), which provides that "[i]t is the duty of the trustee in voting shares of stock to use proper care to promote the interest of the beneficiary," and that the fiduciary responsibility of a trustee in voting a control block "is heavier than where he holds only a small fraction of the shares." Similarly, the Department of Labor construes ERISA's duty of loyalty to make share voting a fiduciary function. See 29 C.F.R. Section 2509.94-2. When the trust owns the entirety of the shares of a corporation, the corporate assets are in effect trust assets that the trustee determines to hold in corporate form. The trustee may not use the corporate form to escape the fiduciary duties of trust law. Thus, for example, a trustee whose duty of impartiality would require the trustee to make current distributions for the support of current beneficiaries may not evade that duty by holding assets in corporate form and pleading the discretion of corporate directors to determine dividend policy. Rather, the trustee must vote for corporate directors who will follow a dividend policy consistent with the trustee's trust-law duty of impartiality.

Subsection (h) [72-38-802(8)] contains several exceptions to the general duty of loyalty, which apply if the transaction was fair to the beneficiaries. Subsections (h)(1)-(2) [72-38-802(8)(a)-(8)(b)] clarify that a trustee is free to contract about the terms of appointment and rate of compensation. Consistent with Restatement (Second) of Trusts Section 170 cmt. r (1959), subsection (h)(3) [72-38-802(8)(c)] authorizes a trustee to engage in a transaction involving another trust of which the trustee is also trustee, a transaction with a decedent's estate or a conservatorship estate of which the trustee is personal representative or conservator, or a transaction with another trust or other fiduciary relationship in which a beneficiary of the trust has an interest. The authority of a trustee to deposit funds in a financial institution operated by the trustee, as provided in subsection (h)(4) [72-38-802(8)(d)], is recognized as an exception to the duty of loyalty in a number of state statutes although deemed to be a breach of trust in Restatement (Second) of Trusts Section 170 cmt. m (1959). The power to deposit funds in its own institution does not negate the trustee's responsibility to invest prudently, including the obligation to earn a reasonable rate of interest on deposits. Subsection (h)(5) [72-38-802(8)(e)] authorizes a trustee to advance money for the protection of the trust. Such advances usually are of small amounts and are made in emergencies or as a matter of convenience. Pursuant to Section 709(b) [72-38-709(2)], the trustee has a lien against the trust property for any advances made.

2003 Amendment. The amendment revises subsection (f) [72-38-802(6)] to clarify that compensation received from a mutual fund for providing services to the fund is in addition to the trustee's regular compensation. It also clarifies that the trustee obligation to notify certain of the beneficiaries of compensation received from the fund applies only to compensation received for providing investment management or advisory services. The amendment conforms subsection (f) [72-38-802(6)] to the drafters' original intent.

Subsection (f) formerly provided:

(f) An investment by a trustee in securities of an investment company or investment trust to which the trustee, or its affiliate, provides services in a capacity other than as trustee is not presumed to be affected by a conflict between personal and fiduciary interests if the investment complies with the prudent investor rule of [Article] 9. The trustee may be compensated by the investment company or investment trust for providing those services out of fees charged to the trust if the trustee at least annually notifies the persons entitled under Section 813 to receive a copy of the trustee's annual report of the rate and method by which the compensation was determined.

2004 Amendment. Section 802(f) [72-38-802(6)] creates an exception to the prohibition on self-dealing for certain investments in mutual funds in which the trustee, or its affiliate, provides services in a capacity other than that as trustee. As originally drafted, Section 802(f) [72-38-802(6)] provided that the exception applied only if the investment complied with the Uniform Prudent Investor Act and the trustee notified the qualified beneficiaries of the additional compensation received for providing the services. However, the Uniform Prudent Investor Act itself contains its own duty of loyalty provision (Section 5), thereby arguably limiting or undoing this exception to the UTC's loyalty provision. The amendment, by providing that the investment does not violate the duty of loyalty under the UTC if it "otherwise" complies with the Uniform Prudent Investor Act, is intended to negate the implication that the investment must also comply with the Uniform Prudent Investor Act's own duty of loyalty provision.

Breach of Fiduciary Duty of Trust Board to Establish, Improve, and Maintain Museum From Trust Proceeds: Alberta Bair's will established a charitable trust and directed the board overseeing the trust proceeds to establish, improve, and maintain a museum to display the family's historical artifacts. The museum was to be funded from the principal and interest of the trust for philanthropic purposes. The trust agreement provided that the museum had first priority on income distributed from the trust, but also empowered the board to sell, transfer, or relocate the museum 5 years after Bair's death if the board determined that the museum no longer served its purposes. The board initially established a museum and contracted with another museum for operations, but subsequently determined that the necessity for additional resources, without the likelihood of any return in terms of greater attendance or educational possibilities, made continuing the museum unfeasible, so the board ordered that the museum be closed. Friends of the museum sued the board for breach of its trust duties. The District Court found no breach of the board's fiduciary duty, but on appeal, the Supreme Court disagreed. The museum constituted the trust's primary purpose, and the board was required to spend the amount of trust funds necessary to establish, improve, and maintain the museum and breached its fiduciary duty to administer the trust by failing to do so, although delegating management to another museum was not a breach given the board's inexperience in museum management. The board also breached its duty by distributing more trust money through charitable grants than it spent on the museum, despite the museum "first priority" spending requirement. The board's trust duty was also breached when the board failed to substantiate that the public and educational purposes of the museum were no longer met. The District Court's finding that the board did not breach its trust duties was reversed, and the trustee was directed to appoint a new board to follow the directives of the trust agreement and to give the museum a fair opportunity to succeed. In re Bair Family Trust, 2008 MT 144, 343 M 138, 183 P3d 61 (2008), followed in Lane v. Caler, 2013 MT 108, 370 Mont. 30, 299 P.3d 827.

Conservator's Exercise of Reasonable Judgment Regarding Lease of Estate Property — Remand for Audit of Leasing Arrangement: The District Court appointed Saylor's stepson, Tim, as temporary guardian. Saylor and her brother, Deane, both filed written objections to the appointment, and the District Court then approved an agreement that made Deane the limited guardian and conservator of Saylor's out-of-state property and Tim the conservator of Saylor's Montana property. Saylor and Deane subsequently moved to remove Tim as conservator based on his failure to disclose certain financial documents relating to his administration of the estate. Tim had entered a grazing lease on Saylor's property that Saylor contended provided no material benefit to the estate. The District Court found no good cause to remove Tim as conservator and dismissed the petition for removal. On appeal, the Supreme Court noted that conservators are under the same duties as trustees and held that Tim exercised reasonable judgment regarding the lease arrangement and did not breach his duty as conservator so as to require his removal. Saylor's proposed substitute model lease was unrealistic. However, as a matter of equity, the Supreme Court remanded with instructions that the District Court order an audit of the lease arrangement to ensure that the figures attached to the lease conform to actualities and to allow the District Court to revise its prior determinations should the audit reveal facts that would require revision. In re Guardianship & Conservatorship of Saylor, 2005 MT 236, 328 M 415, 121 P3d 532 (2005).

Findings That Constructive Trust Improperly Administered Not Erroneous: Bradshaw placed an annuity in his mother's name to hold in trust for the benefit of others. Bradshaw later died intestate, leaving two minor children and no surviving spouse. The District Court concluded that the trust should have been expended on behalf of the minor children and found that the mother violated her fiduciary obligation by originally taking the position that the annuity was to be distributed among various members of Bradshaw's family and only later deciding that each of the minor children was also entitled to a share. Bradshaw's children were properly the beneficiaries of the trust, and the District Court did not err in finding the mother in violation of her duty as trust administrator. In re Estate of Bradshaw, 2001 MT 92, 305 M 178, 24 P3d 211 (2001).

Self-Dealing During Agency Relationship — Proof of Undue Influence and Constructive Fraud — Shift of Burden of Proof — Agent Prohibited From Acting as Trustee Would Have Been Prohibited: Alice, a good friend of Maggie, lived near her and undertook to manage Maggie's financial affairs when Maggie's health began failing. As Maggie became more afflicted with dementia, Alice moved in with Maggie to care for her and began writing all of Maggie's checks for her. Alice also began selling Maggie's securities, depositing the proceeds into her own account, and writing checks to herself for purposes that sometimes involved Maggie. During this time, Maggie's physician found her mental capacity to be steadily diminishing and urged Alice to take Maggie to a nursing home. After Alice had depleted Maggie's financial resources from approximately $200,000 to approximately $20,000, Maggie's sister, Ida, discovered that Maggie had been moved to a nursing home and discovered that her money had been spent by Alice. Maggie died shortly thereafter, and the personal representative brought an action against Alice for an accounting of Maggie's funds. The Supreme Court held that all of the criteria for proof of undue influence established in Christensen v. Britton, 240 M 393, 784 P2d 908 (1989), had been satisfied and that the District Court therefore erred in not shifting the burden of proof to Alice to prove that the financial transactions involving Alice were fair and voluntary. Likewise, the Supreme Court also held, because of the agency or fiduciary relationship between Alice and Maggie, that the District Court erred in placing the burden on the estate to prove constructive fraud. The Supreme Court held that under statutory provisions of agency law, Alice was not authorized to do any act that a trustee would be prohibited by Title 72, ch. 34 (repealed in part and replaced by Title 72, ch. 38), from doing and found that such a prohibition still existed under 28-10-407(3), even though 72-20-208 had been repealed. The Supreme Court therefore remanded the case to the District Court for a new trial. Luke v. Gager, 2000 MT 377, 303 M 474, 16 P3d 377, 57 St. Rep. 1599 (2000).

CASES DECIDED PRIOR TO ADOPTION OF 1989 TRUST CODE

Conservator Who Benefits From Dealings Not Excused Due to Similar Actions Prior to Establishment of Trust: The lower court accepted the dealings of a son acting as conservator for his parents on the basis that, prior to the establishment of the trust, he had acted in the same self-serving manner and his parents had promised to give him the farm. The Supreme Court reversed, stating that once the trust had been set up, the conservator must perform his duties only in the best interests of the protected persons. In re Estate of Clark, 237 M 179, 772 P2d 299, 46 St. Rep. 718 (1989).

Obligations of Trustee to Beneficiary: A prejudgment Writ of Attachment brought by an auto dealer against a property division settlement in a marital dissolution was vacated by the Supreme Court upon finding that the attorney for the auto dealer was also the attorney for the husband making payments. The court held that when the attorney received money as trustee in satisfaction of the husband's contractual obligations to the wife, the attorney was bound to act in good faith toward the wife as beneficiary. The attorney was prohibited from dealing with the trust property for any purpose not connected with the trust. Pursuant to his duty under Rule 1.15 of the Rules of Professional Conduct, the attorney was required to promptly deliver the money to the wife, even though he had fully disclosed his relationship to both the husband and the auto dealer. The attorney was directed to pay over the full trust amount, plus interest, to the wife. Wild W. Motors, Inc. v. Lingle, 224 M 76, 728 P2d 412, 43 St. Rep. 2030 (1986).

Purchase of Mortgage:

Trustee did not violate his fiduciary duties in buying mortgage outstanding against trust property to protect trustor who had entrusted 5% royalty for sale by trustee to raise money needed by trustor, and when trustor thereafter elected to permit trustee to retain unsold royalty in satisfaction of mortgage, title to the royalty vested in the trustee. Iverson v. Rehal, 132 M 295, 317 P2d 869 (1957).

Where trustee purchased a mortgage against the property to protect the beneficiary and the royalty purchasers and held it for some 18 months, the effect was to continue the fiduciary relationship. Iverson v. Rehal, 132 M 295, 317 P2d 869 (1957).

Voidable Transfer: A sale or transfer of trust property to the trustee with full knowledge by the beneficiary at a fair price without influence is voidable only. Iverson v. Rehal, 132 M 295, 317 P2d 869 (1957).

Bank Trustee Purchasing Bonds: When a bank while acting as trustee of an estate had purchased bonds with its own funds and after holding them for about a month transferred them to the estate, retaining accrued interest for that month, the estate receiving the interest from the date the bonds were charged to it, claim of the cestui que trust that the bank profited from the use of estate funds, contrary to the provisions of 72-20-203 (now repealed), was held to be of no merit. In re Harper's Estate, 98 M 356, 40 P2d 51 (1934).

Director of Corporation: The rule declared by 72-20-205 (now repealed) that a trustee may not undertake a trust adverse in its nature to the interest of his beneficiary without the consent of the latter does not preclude a director of a corporation from becoming interested in another concern engaged in a business similar to, but not interfering with, that of his corporation. So long as he acts in good faith to the corporation and its shareholders and violates no legal or moral duty which he owes to it and them, he is free to engage in an independent competitive business. Greer v. Stannard, 85 M 78, 277 P 622, 64 ALR 772 (1929).

Business Trust:

Since a trustee cannot take part in any transaction concerning the trust in which he is interested (72-20-204, now repealed), a contract entered into between a common-law trust at a meeting of its board of trustees attended by only two of its three members, and a company of which one of the two was the virtual owner was a nullity, and the fact that the third member in writing subsequently gave his approval did not render it valid for the reason that under 72-24-207 (now repealed), the board could act only as a board when assembled as such and not through the individuals composing it. Williard v. Campbell Oil Co., 77 M 30, 248 P 219 (1926).

A trustee of a business trust cannot vote as such upon the approval of a claim of his own against the trust; hence where only two of the three trustees constituting the board were present at one of its meetings when the individual claim of one of the two was presented for allowance and an alleged account stated agreed upon, the action was void for want of competent representation of the trust. Gordon Campbell Petroleum Co. v. Gordon Campbell-Kevin Synd., 75 M 261, 242 P 540 (1926), distinguished in Bentall v. Koenig Bros., Inc., 140 M 339, 372 P2d 91 (1962).

Administrator Continuing Business of Decedent: Generally, an administrator is not permitted to engage the assets of the estate under his control in trade or business; where he does so without authority of Court beyond the time required in winding up its affairs and makes a profit, it inures to the estate, and if he meets with loss, he must bear it. In re Jennings' Estate, 74 M 449, 241 P 648 (1925), distinguished in Grauman v. Chambers, 122 M 31, 198 P2d 629 (1948).

Existence of Trust — Fiduciary Relation: The term "fiduciary or confidential relation" is one founded upon trust or confidence reposed by one person in the integrity and fidelity of another and precludes the idea of profit or advantage resulting from the dealings of the parties and the person in whom the confidence is reposed. In such relation the party in whom the confidence is reposed, if he voluntarily accepts it, may take no advantage of the other party without the latter's knowledge or consent. Kerrigan v. O'Meara, 71 M 1, 227 P 819 (1924).

Misappropriation by Attorney of Funds of Client: When an attorney endorsed a check belonging to his client, deposited it in bank, and used the proceeds in the discharge of his private obligations, repaying it only after being called to account by the client some 4 months later, he was guilty of a fraud upon the latter under 72-20-203 (now repealed). In re Lunke, 56 M 226, 182 P 126 (1919).

Accounting — Accumulations From Use of Trust Funds: The Supreme Court has emphasized this statutory rule by declaring that the trustee must account for all accumulations from the use of trust funds and that under no circumstances will he be permitted to profit from their use. In re Allard Guardianship, 49 M 219, 141 P 661 (1914); Butte v. Goodwin, 47 M 155, 134 P 670 (1913); In re Davis' Estate, 35 M 273, 88 P 957 (1907).

Malversation of Trust Fund: It has been a recognized rule in equity for a century or more that a trustee shall not deal with the trust funds for any purpose not connected with the trust and shall not profit by malversation of the trust fund. In re Allard Guardianship, 49 M 219, 141 P 661 (1914).

72-38-803. Impartiality.

Official Comments

The duty of impartiality is an important aspect of the duty of loyalty. This section is identical to Section 6 of the Uniform Prudent Investor Act, except that this section also applies to all aspects of trust administration and to decisions by a trustee with respect to distributions. The Prudent Investor Act is limited to duties with respect to the investment and management of trust property. The differing beneficial interests for which the trustee must act impartially include those of the current beneficiaries versus those of beneficiaries holding interests in the remainder; and among those currently eligible to receive distributions. In fulfilling the duty to act impartially, the trustee should be particularly sensitive to allocation of receipts and disbursements between income and principal and should consider, in an appropriate case, a reallocation of income to the principal account and vice versa, if allowable under local law. For an example of such authority, see Uniform Principal and Income Act §104 (1997).

The duty to act impartially does not mean that the trustee must treat the beneficiaries equally. Rather, the trustee must treat the beneficiaries equitably in light of the purposes and terms of the trust. A settlor who prefers that the trustee, when making decisions, generally favor the interests of one beneficiary over those of others should provide appropriate guidance in the terms of the trust. See Restatement (Second) of §183 cmt. a (1959).

CASES DECIDED AFTER ADOPTION OF 1989 TRUST CODE

Repealed Statute Regarding Sale or Lease of School Trust Lands to School Districts — No Justiciable Controversy or Action Upon Which Relief Could Be Granted: Former 20-6-621(4) allowed the Board of Land Commissioners to sell, for appraised value, or to lease, for $1 a year, school trust lands to a school district. The Department of Natural Resources and Conservation stipulated that the provision was unconstitutional because it made state lands available for less than full market value. The District Court agreed, noting that leasing school trust lands to some school districts would favor only some of the beneficiaries and not the school trust as a whole. The Legislature concurred and repealed the subsection in 1999. Plaintiff subsequently sued the Department, the Board, and the state, contending that the Department unlawfully determined that the provision was unconstitutional and failed to defend the constitutionality of the provision. The state moved to dismiss the complaint on grounds that no justiciable controversy existed and that the complaint alleged no cause of action upon which relief could be granted. The District Court granted summary judgment for the state, and on appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed. Any determination that the Department exceeded its authority would have had no bearing on the existing rights or interests at issue, and a judgment granting the relief sought would not have effectively operated to resolve any issue in the case. Thus, there was no justiciable case or controversy, and the claim was properly dismissed. Advocates for Educ., Inc. v. Dept. of Natural Resources and Conservation, 2004 MT 230, 322 M 429, 97 P3d 553 (2004), following Mont.-Dak. Util. Co. v. Billings, 2003 MT 332, 318 M 862, 80 P3d 1247 (2003).

72-38-804. Prudent administration.

Official Comments

The duty to administer a trust with prudence is a fundamental duty of the trustee. This duty does not depend on whether the trustee receives compensation. The duty may be altered by the terms of the trust. See Section 105 [72-38-105]. This section is similar to Section 2(a) of the Uniform Prudent Investor Act and Restatement (Third) of Trusts: Prudent Investor Rule §227 (1992).

The language of this section diverges from the language of the previous Restatement. The prior Restatement can be read as applying the same standard - "man of ordinary prudence would exercise in dealing with his own property" - regardless of the type or purposes of the trust. See Restatement (Second) of Trusts §174 cmt. a (1959). This section appropriately bases the standard on the purposes and other circumstances of the particular trust.

A settlor who wishes to modify the standard of care specified in this section is free to do so, but there is a limit. Section 1008 [72-38-1008] prohibits a settlor from exculpating a trustee from liability for breach of trust committed in bad faith or with reckless indifference to the purposes of the trust or to the interests of the beneficiaries.

72-38-805. Costs of administration.

Official Comments

This section is similar to Section 7 of the Uniform Prudent Investor Act and is consistent with the rules concerning costs in Restatement (Third) of Trusts: Prudent Investor Rule §227(c)(3) (1992). For related rules concerning compensation and reimbursement of trustees, see Sections 708 [72-38-708] and 709 [72-38-709]. The duty not to incur unreasonable costs applies when a trustee decides whether and how to delegate to agents, as well as to other aspects of trust administration. In deciding whether and how to delegate, the trustee must be alert to balancing projected benefits against the likely costs. To protect the beneficiary against excessive costs, the trustee should also be alert to adjusting compensation for functions which the trustee has delegated to others. The obligation to incur only necessary or appropriate costs of administration has long been part of the law of trusts. See Restatement (Second) of Trusts §188 (1959).

72-38-807. Delegation by trustee.

Official Comments

This section permits trustees to delegate various aspects of trust administration to agents, subject to the standards of the section. The language is derived from Section 9 of the Uniform Prudent Investor Act. See also John H. Langbein, Reversing the Nondelegation Rule of Trust-Investment Law, 59 Mo. L. Rev. 105 (1994) (discussing prior law).

This section encourages and protects the trustee in making delegations appropriate to the facts and circumstances of the particular trust. Whether a particular function is delegable is based on whether it is a function that a prudent trustee might delegate under similar circumstances. For example, delegating some administrative and reporting duties might be prudent for a family trustee but unnecessary for a corporate trustee.

This section applies only to delegation to agents, not to delegation to a cotrustee. For the provision regulating delegation to a cotrustee, see Section 703(e) [72-38-703(5)].

CASES DECIDED AFTER ADOPTION OF 1989 TRUST CODE

Duties of Indenture Trustee Limited to Provisions of Small Tract Financing Act: Under the Small Tract Financing Act of Montana, an indenture trustee's duties are those related to properly conducting a foreclosure sale, including providing proper notice to affected parties, conducting the sale, and disposing of sale proceeds. In this case, plaintiff contended that broader duties of trustees, as set out in 72-34-113 (now repealed), also applied to indenture trustees. The Supreme Court disagreed. There is no indication that broader duties than those outlined in the Act were contemplated for indenture trustees, and the duties of indenture trustees are therefore limited to the statutory duties in the Act. Knucklehead Land Co., Inc. v. Accutitle, Inc., 2007 MT 301, 340 M 62, 172 P3d 116 (2007).

72-38-808. Powers to direct.

Subsection (a) [72-38-808(1)] is an application of Section 603(a) [72-38-603(1)], which provides that a revocable trust is subject to the settlor's exclusive control as long as the settlor has capacity. Because of the settlor's degree of control, subsection (a) [72-38-808(1)] of this section authorizes a trustee to rely on a direction from the settlor even if it is contrary to the terms of the trust. The direction of the settlor might be regarded as an amendment of the trust. Subsection (a) [72-38-808(1)] has limited application upon a settlor's incapacity. An agent, conservator, or guardian has authority to give the trustee instructions contrary to the terms of the trust only if the agent, conservator, or guardian succeeds to the settlor's powers with respect to revocation, amendment, or distribution as provided in Section 602(e) [72-38-602(5)].

Subsections (b)-(d) [72-38-808(2)-(4)] ratify the use of trust protectors and advisers. Subsections (b) [72-38-808(2)] and (d) [72-38-808(4)] are based in part on Restatement (Second) of Trusts §185 (1959). Subsection (c) [72-38-808(3)] is similar to Restatement (Third) of Trusts §64(2) (Tentative Draft No. 3, approved 2001). "Advisers" have long been used for certain trustee functions, such as the power to direct investments or manage a closely-held business. "Trust protector," a term largely associated with offshore trust practice, is more recent and usually connotes the grant of greater powers, sometimes including the power to amend or terminate the trust. Subsection (c) [72-38-808(3)] ratifies the recent trend to grant third persons such broader powers.

A power to direct must be distinguished from a veto power. A power to direct involves action initiated and within the control of a third party. The trustee usually has no responsibility other than to carry out the direction when made. But if a third party holds a veto power, the trustee is responsible for initiating the decision, subject to the third party's approval. A trustee who administers a trust subject to a veto power occupies a position akin to that of a cotrustee and is responsible for taking appropriate action if the third party's refusal to consent would result in a serious breach of trust. See Restatement (Second) of Trusts §185 cmt. g (1959); Section 703(g)(duties of cotrustees).

Frequently, the person holding the power is directing the investment of the holder's own beneficial interest. Such self-directed accounts are particularly prevalent among trusts holding interests in employee benefit plans or individual retirement accounts. See ERISA §404(c) (29 U.S.C. §1104(c)). But for the type of donative trust which is the primary focus of this Code, the holder of the power to direct is frequently acting on behalf of others. In that event and as provided in subsection (d) [72-38-808(4)], the holder is presumptively acting in a fiduciary capacity with respect to the powers granted and can be held liable if the holder's conduct constitutes a breach of trust, whether through action or inaction. Like a trustee, liability cannot be imposed if the holder has not accepted the grant of the power either expressly or informally through exercise of the power. See Section 701 [72-38-701].

Powers to direct are most effective when the trustee is not deterred from exercising the power by fear of possible liability. On the other hand, the trustee does have overall responsibility for seeing that the terms of the trust are honored. For this reason, subsection (b) [72-38-808(2)] imposes only minimal oversight responsibility on the trustee. A trustee must generally act in accordance with the direction. A trustee may refuse the direction only if the attempted exercise would be manifestly contrary to the terms of the trust or the trustee knows the attempted exercise would constitute a serious breach of a fiduciary duty owed by the holder of the power to the beneficiaries of the trust.

The provisions of this section may be altered in the terms of the trust. See Section 105 [72-38-105]. A settlor can provide that the trustee must accept the decision of the power holder without question. Or a settlor could provide that the holder of the power is not to be held to the standards of a fiduciary. A common technique for assuring that a settlor continues to be taxed on all of the income of an irrevocable trust is for the settlor to retain a nonfiduciary power of administration. See I.R.C. §675(4).

72-38-809. Control and protection of trust property.

Official Comments

This section codifies the substance of Sections 175 and 176 of the Restatement (Second) of Trusts (1959). The duty to take control of and safeguard trust property is an aspect of the trustee's duty of prudent administration as provided in Section 804 [72-38-804]. See also Sections 816(1) [72-38-816(1)] (power to collect trust property), 816(11) [72-38-816(11)] (power to insure trust property), and 816(12) [72-38-816(12)] (power to abandon trust property). The duty to take control normally means that the trustee must take physical possession of tangible personal property and securities belonging to the trust, and must secure payment of any choses in action. See Restatement (Second) of Trusts §175 cmt. a, c and d (1959). This section, like the other sections in this article, is subject to alteration by the terms of the trust. See Section 105 [72-38-105]. For example, the settlor may provide that the spouse may occupy the settlor's former residence rent free, in which event the spouse's occupancy would prevent the trustee from taking possession.

Conservator's Exercise of Reasonable Judgment Regarding Lease of Estate Property — Remand for Audit of Leasing Arrangement: The District Court appointed Saylor's stepson, Tim, as temporary guardian. CASES DECIDED PRIOR TO ADOPTION OF 1989 TRUST CODE

Trustee's Right to Appeal Court Order When Trustee Not a Party: Trustee-bank could appeal from court order directing trustee to pay all income due beneficiary to beneficiary's judgment creditors, even though the trustee was not a party to the action between the beneficiary and creditors. The trustee had a fiduciary duty to preserve and protect the trust assets. Lundgren v. Hoglund, 219 M 295, 711 P2d 809, 42 St. Rep. 2031 (1985).

Exchange of Trust Property: Courts hold that where the trust agreement gives the trustee authority to sell and dispose of property, as here, he may exchange it. Where all those interested in the trust property as beneficiaries consent thereto, there is no reason why a trustee may not exchange trust property for other property. Gray v. Corcoran, 127 M 572, 269 P2d 1091 (1954).

72-38-810. Recordkeeping and identification of trust property.

Official Comments

The duty to keep adequate records stated in subsection (a) [72-38-810(1)] is implicit in the duty to act with prudence (Section 804 [72-38-804]) and the duty to report to beneficiaries (Section 813 [72-38-813]). For an application, see Green v. Lombard, 343 A. 2d 905, 911 (Md. Ct. Spec. App. 1975). See also Restatement (Second) of Trusts §§172, 174 (1959).

The duty to earmark trust assets and the duty of a trustee not to mingle the assets of the trust with the trustee's own are closely related. Subsection (b) [72-38-810(2)], which addresses the duty not to mingle, is derived from Section 179 of the Restatement (Second) of Trusts (1959). Subsection (c) [72-38-810(3)] makes the requirement that assets be earmarked more precise than that articulated in Restatement (Second) §179 by requiring that the interest of the trust must appear in the records of a third party, such as a bank, brokerage firm, or transfer agent. Because of the serious risk of mistake or misappropriation even if disclosure is made to the beneficiaries, showing the interest of the trust solely in the trustee's own internal records is insufficient. Section 816(7)(B) [72-38-816(7)(b)], which allows a trustee to hold securities in nominee form, is not inconsistent with this requirement. While securities held in nominee form are not specifically registered in the name of the trustee, they are properly earmarked because the trustee's holdings are indicated in the records maintained by an independent party, such as in an account at a brokerage firm.

Earmarking is not practical for all types of assets. With respect to assets not subject to registration, such as tangible personal property and bearer bonds, arranging for the trust's ownership interest to be reflected on the records of a third-party custodian would not be feasible. For this reason, subsection (c) [72-38-810(3)] waives separate recordkeeping for these types of assets. Under subsection (b) [72-38-810(2)], however, the duty of the trustee not to mingle these or any other trust assets with the trustee's own remains absolute.

Subsection (d) [72-38-810(4)], following the lead of a number of state statutes, allows a trustee to use the property of two or more trusts to make joint investments, even though under traditional principles a joint investment would violate the duty to earmark. A joint investment frequently is more economical than attempting to invest the funds of each trust separately. Also, the risk of misappropriation or mistake is less when the trust property is invested jointly with the property of another trust than when pooled with the property of the trustee or other person.

CASES DECIDED AFTER ADOPTION OF 1989 TRUST CODE

Misrepresentation of Value of Estate Constituting Breach of Fiduciary Duty — Incomplete Inventory: A conservator knew, but failed to mention, that an estate included annuities and jointly held property that was not included in the final estate inventory. The District Court concluded that the conservator breached the fiduciary duty by acting in the conservator's best interest by failing to disclose all financial information regarding the estate. The Supreme Court affirmed. The conservator was required to make a full disclosure in order to meet the statutory duties of conservatorship, and failure to do so constituted a breach of fiduciary duty to preserve the protected person's property and provide a means by which the conservator's work could be independently verified by a court. Further, the District Court's finding that the conservatorship accountings and inventories were incomplete was also affirmed in that the final inventory made no reference to annuities and jointly held property. The District Court's conclusion that the conservator misrepresented the value of the estate was supported by substantial evidence and was affirmed. 72-38-811. Enforcement and defense claims.

Official Comments

This section codifies the substance of Sections 177 and 178 of the Restatement (Second) of Trusts (1959). It may not be reasonable to enforce a claim depending upon the likelihood of recovery and the cost of suit and enforcement. It might also be reasonable to settle an action or suffer a default rather than to defend an action. See also Section 816(14) [72-38-816(14)] (power to pay, contest, settle, or release claims).

72-38-812. Collecting trust property.

Official Comments

This section is a specific application of Section 811 [72-38-811] on the duty to enforce claims, which includes a claim for trust property held by a former trustee or others, and a claim against a predecessor trustee for breach of trust. The duty imposed by this section is not absolute. Pursuit of a claim is not required if the amount of the claim, costs of suit and enforcement, and likelihood of recovery, make such action uneconomic. Unlike Restatement (Second) of Trusts §223 (1959), this section only requires a successor trustee to redress breaches of trust "known" to have been committed by the predecessor. For the definition of "know," see Section 104 [72-38-104]. Limiting the successor's obligation to known breaches is a common feature of state trust statutes. See, e.g., Mo. Rev. Stat. §456.187.2.

As authorized by Section 1009 [72-38-1009], the beneficiaries may relieve the trustee from potential liability for failing to pursue a claim against a predecessor trustee or other person holding trust property. The obligation to pursue a predecessor trustee can also be addressed in the terms of the trust. See Section 105 [72-38-105].

72-38-813. Duty to inform and report.

Official Comments

The duty to keep the beneficiaries reasonably informed of the administration of the trust is a fundamental duty of a trustee. This duty, which is stated in subsection (a) [72-38-813(1)], is derived from Section 7-303(a) of the Uniform Probate Code, which was approved in 1969 and which has been enacted in about a third of the states. This provision of the UPC has also been enacted in states that have not otherwise enacted the Uniform Probate Code. See, e.g., Cal. Prob. Code. Sections 16060-16061. Unlike the cited provision of the UPC, subsection (a) [72-38-813(1)] of this section limits the duty to keep the beneficiaries informed to the qualified beneficiaries. For the definition of qualified beneficiary, see Section 103(13) [72-38-103(16)]. The result of this limitation is that the information need not be furnished to beneficiaries with remote remainder interests unless they have made a request to the trustee.

For the extent to which a settlor may waive the requirements of this section in the terms of the trust, see Section 105(b)(8)-(9) [not adopted].

Subsection (a) [72-38-813(1)] requires that the trustee keep the qualified beneficiaries of the trust reasonably informed about the administration of the trust and of the material facts necessary for them to protect their interests. This may include a duty to communicate to a qualified beneficiary information about the administration of the trust that is reasonably necessary to enable the beneficiary to enforce the beneficiary's rights and to prevent or redress a breach of trust. See Restatement (Second) of Trusts Section 173 cmt. c (1959). With respect to the permissible distributees, the duty articulated in subsection (a) [72-38-813(1)] would ordinarily be satisfied by providing the beneficiary with a copy of the annual report mandated by subsection (c) [72-38-813(c)]. Otherwise, the trustee is not ordinarily under a duty to furnish information to a beneficiary in the absence of a specific request for the information. See Restatement (Second) of Trusts Section 173 cmt. d (1959). However, special circumstances may require that the trustee take affirmative steps to provide additional information. For example, if the trustee is dealing with the beneficiary on the trustee's own account, the trustee must communicate material facts relating to the transaction that the trustee knows or should know. See Restatement (Second) of Trusts Section 173 cmt. d (1959). Furthermore, to enable the beneficiaries to take action to protect their interests, the trustee may be required to provide advance notice of transactions involving real estate, closely-held business interests, and other assets that are difficult to value or to replace. See In re Green Charitable Trust, 431 N.W. 2d 492 (Mich. Ct. App. 1988); Allard v. Pacific National Bank, 663 P.2d 104 (Wash. 1983). The trustee is justified in not providing such advance disclosure if disclosure is forbidden by other law, as under federal securities laws, or if disclosure would be seriously detrimental to the interests of the beneficiaries, for example, when disclosure would cause the loss of the only serious buyer.

Subsection (a) [72-38-813(1), adopted as modified] also requires that the trustee promptly respond to the request of any beneficiary, whether qualified or not, for information related to the administration of the trust. Performance is excused only if compliance is unreasonable under the circumstances. Within the bounds of the reasonableness limit, this provision allows the beneficiary to determine what information is relevant to protect the beneficiary's interest. Should a beneficiary so request, subsection (b)(1) [72-38-813(2)(a)] also requires the trustee to furnish the beneficiary with a complete copy of the trust instrument and not merely with those portions the trustee deems relevant to the beneficiary's interest. For a case reaching the same result, see Fletcher v. Fletcher, 480 S.E. 2d 488 (Va. Ct. App. 1997). Subsection (b)(1) [72-38-813(2)(a)] is more expansive Section 7-303(b) of the Uniform Probate Code, which provides that "[u]pon reasonable request, the trustee shall provide the beneficiary with a copy of the terms of the trust which describe or affect his interest. . . ."

The drafters of this Code decided to leave open for further consideration by the courts the extent to which a trustee may claim attorney-client privilege against a beneficiary seeking discovery of attorney-client communications between the trustee and the trustee's attorney. The courts are split because of the important values that are in tension on this question. "The [attorney-client] privilege recognizes that sound legal advice or advocacy serves public ends and that such advice or advocacy depends upon the lawyer's being fully informed by the client." Upjohn Co. v. United States, 449 U.S. 383 (1981). On the other hand, subsection (a) [72-38-813(1)] of this section requires that a trustee keep the qualified beneficiaries reasonably informed about the administration of the trust and of the material facts necessary for them to protect their interests, which could include facts that the trustee has revealed only to the trustee's attorney. There is authority for the view that the trustee is estopped from pleading attorney-client privilege in such circumstances. In the leading case, Riggs National Bank v. Zimmer, 355 A.2d 709, 713 (Del. Ch. 1976), the court reasoned that the beneficiary, not the trustee, is the attorney's client: "As a representative for the beneficiaries of the trust which he is administering, the trustee is not the real client . . . ." This beneficiary-as-client theory has been criticized on the ground that it conflicts with the trustee's fiduciary duty to implement the intentions of the settlor, which are sometimes in tension with the wishes of one or more beneficiaries. See Louis H. Hamel, Jr., Trustee's Privileged Counsel: A Rebuttal, 21 ACTEC Notes 156 (1995); Charles F. Gibbs & Cindy D. Hanson, The Fiduciary Exception to a Trustee's Attorney/Client Privilege, 21 ACTEC Notes 236 (1995). Prominent decisions in California and Texas have refused to follow Delaware in recognizing an exception for the beneficiary against the trustee's attorney-client privilege. Wells Fargo Bank v. Superior Court (Boltwood), 990 P.2d 591 (Cal. 2000); Huie v. De Shazo, 922 S.W. 2d 920 (Tex. 1996). The beneficiary-as-client theory continues to be applied to ERISA trusts. See, e.g., United States v. Mett, 178 F.3d 1058, 1062-64 (9th Cir. 1999). However, in a pension trust the beneficiaries are the settlors of their own trust because the trust is funded with their own earnings. Accordingly, in ERISA attorney-client cases "[t]here are no competing interests such as other stockholders or the intentions of the Settlor." Gibbs & Hanson, 21 ACTEC Notes at 238. For further discussion of the attorney-client privilege and whether there is a duty to disclose to the beneficiaries, see ACTEC Commentaries on the Model Rules of Professional Conduct, Commentary on MRPC 1.2 (3d ed. 1999); Rust E. Reid et al., Privilege and Confidentiality Issues When a Lawyer Represents a Fiduciary, 30 Real Prop. Prob. & Tr. J. 541 (1996).

To enable beneficiaries to protect their interests effectively, it is essential that they know the identity of the trustee. Subsection (b)(2) [72-38-813(2)(b)] requires that a trustee inform the qualified beneficiaries within 60 days of the trustee's acceptance of office and of the trustee's name, address and telephone number. Similar to the obligation imposed on a personal representative following admission of the will to probate, subsection (b)(3) [72-38-813(2)(c)] requires the trustee of a revocable trust to inform the qualified beneficiaries of the trust's existence within 60 days after the settlor's death. These two duties can overlap. If the death of the settlor happens also to be the occasion for the appointment of a successor trustee, the new trustee of the formerly revocable trust would need to inform the qualified beneficiaries both of the trustee's acceptance and of the trust's existence.

Subsection (b)(4) [72-38-813(2)(d)] deals with the sensitive issue of changes, usually increases, in trustee compensation. Changes can include changes in a periodic base fee, rate of percentage compensation, hourly rate, termination fee, or transaction charge. Regarding the standard for setting trustee compensation, see Section 708 [72-38-708] and Comment.

Subsection (c) [72-38-813(3)] requires the trustee to furnish the current beneficiaries and other beneficiaries who request it with a copy of a trustee's report at least annually and upon termination of the trust. Unless a cotrustee remains in office, the former trustee also must provide a report to all of the qualified beneficiaries upon the trustee's resignation or removal. If the vacancy occurred because of the former trustee's death or adjudication of incapacity, a report may, but need not be provided by the former trustee's personal representative, conservator, or guardian.

The Uniform Trust Code employs the term "report" instead of "accounting" in order to negate any inference that the report must be prepared in any particular format or with a high degree of formality. The reporting requirement might even be satisfied by providing the beneficiaries with copies of the trust's income tax returns and monthly brokerage account statements if the information on those returns and statements is complete and sufficiently clear. The key factor is not the format chosen but whether the report provides the beneficiaries with the information necessary to protect their interests. For model account forms, together with practical advice on how to prepare reports, see Robert Whitman, Fiduciary Accounting Guide (2d ed. 1998).

Subsection (d) [72-38-813(4)] allows trustee reports and other required information to be waived by a beneficiary. A beneficiary may also withdraw a consent. However, a waiver of a trustee's report or other information does not relieve the trustee from accountability and potential liability for matters that the report or other information would have disclosed.

Subsection (e) [72-38-813(5)], which was added to the Code in 2004, is discussed in 2004 Amendment below.

2004 Amendment. Subsection (b)(2) [72-38-813(2)(b)] and (b)(3) [72-38-813(2)(c)] require that certain notices be sent by the trustee to the qualified beneficiaries within 60 days of the trustee's acceptance of office, or within 60 days after the creation of an irrevocable trust or the date a revocable trust becomes irrevocable. Subsection (e) [72-38-813(5)] is added to make clear the drafting committee's intent that these requirements are not to be retroactively applied to trustee acceptances of office occurring prior to the effective date of the Code and to trusts which have become irrevocable prior to the effective date.

CASES DECIDED AFTER ADOPTION OF 1989 TRUST CODE

No Abuse of Discretion in Failure to Remove Trustee of Trust: The beneficiary of a trust contended that the District Court should have removed the trustee of the trust, primarily because the trustee failed to file an annual accounting for the trust. The Supreme Court found no abuse of the District Court's discretion in denying the removal, noting that although the law requires an annual accounting, in this case the trust had no income or disbursements, so there was nothing to account for. The trustee was directed to file an annual accounting in order to protect the rights of the parties. In re Baird Trust, 2009 MT 81, 349 M 501, 204 P3d 703 (2009). See also In re Gershcow's Will, 261 NW2d 335 (Minn. 1977).

Conservator's Exercise of Reasonable Judgment Regarding Lease of Estate Property — Remand for Audit of Leasing Arrangement: The District Court appointed Saylor's stepson, Tim, as temporary guardian. Saylor and her brother, Deane, both filed written objections to the appointment, and the District Court then approved an agreement that made Deane the limited guardian and conservator of Saylor's out-of-state property and Tim the conservator of Saylor's Montana property. Saylor and Deane subsequently moved to remove Tim as conservator based on his failure to disclose certain financial documents relating to his administration of the estate. Tim had entered a grazing lease on Saylor's property that Saylor contended provided no material benefit to the estate. The District Court found no good cause to remove Tim as conservator and dismissed the petition for removal. On appeal, the Supreme Court noted that conservators are under the same duties as trustees and held that Tim exercised reasonable judgment regarding the lease arrangement and did not breach his duty as conservator so as to require his removal. Saylor's proposed substitute model lease was unrealistic. However, as a matter of equity, the Supreme Court remanded with instructions that the District Court order an audit of the lease arrangement to ensure that the figures attached to the lease conform to actualities and to allow the District Court to revise its prior determinations should the audit reveal facts that would require revision. In re Guardianship & Conservatorship of Saylor, 2005 MT 236, 328 M 415, 121 P3d 532 (2005).

Inventory Requirement Mandatory — Verifiable Accountings Required — Audit: The 90-day inventory requirement in 72-5-424 is not discretionary for Montana courts and conservators as a matter of law, even when liabilities exceed assets. The requirement is mandatory because: (1) the overall purpose of a conservatorship is to preserve the property of the protected person, and a conservator will likely be appointed only when there are assets that should be managed; (2) the plain language of 72-5-424 requires that every conservator prepare and file with the appointing court a complete inventory of the estate; and (3) the purpose of the statutory inventory requirement is to furnish a means by which the conservator's management may be checked and accounts verified. In constructing the inventory, the conservator has discretion to decide what to include and how to value the items in the estate, but that discretion must be verifiable. Pursuant to the court's duty to ensure that a conservator is acting in the best interests of the protected person, verification must consist of a means by which a trial court can independently determine whether accountings are generally complete and accurate, and credibility is not sufficient as documentation of accountings. In the present case, the record did not contain a complete, accurate, and verifiable accounting to show that the conservator properly accounted for the estate, so the Supreme Court remanded for an audit pursuant to 72-5-438. Once the conservator meets the burden of showing proper management and accounting, such as the example in 72-34-128 (now repealed), the burden shifts to the protected person to show that the inventory is incorrect. Redies v. Cosner & Uerling, 2002 MT 86, 309 M 315, 48 P3d 697 (2002). See also In re Allard Guardianship, 49 M 219, 141 P 661 (1914), and In re Estate of Clark, 237 M 179, 772 P2d 299 (1989).

CASES DECIDED PRIOR TO ADOPTION OF 1989 TRUST CODE

Union Management Dispute — No Specific Form Required for Accounting Request: Generally the demand for accounting need not be in any particular form, so long as it is sufficiently explicit to leave no room for doubt in a defendant's mind that the plaintiff intended to demand an accounting. Local Union No. 400 v. Bosh, 220 M 304, 715 P2d 36, 43 St. Rep. 388 (1986).

Accounting by Trustee: Trustee may be compelled to make an accounting upon the application of any beneficiary under the trust. Attix v. Robinson, 155 F. Supp. 592 (D.C. Mont. 1957).

72-38-814. Discretionary powers — tax savings.

Official Comments

Despite the breadth of discretion purportedly granted by the wording of a trust, no grant of discretion to a trustee, whether with respect to management or distribution, is ever absolute. A grant of discretion establishes a range within which the trustee may act. The greater the grant of discretion, the broader the range. Pursuant to subsection (a) [72-38-814(1)], a trustee's exercise of discretion must be in good faith. Consistent with the trustee's duty to administer the trust (see Section 801 [72-38-801]), the trustee's exercise must also be in accordance with the terms and purposes of the trust and the interests of the beneficiaries. "Interests of the beneficiaries" means the beneficial interests provided in the terms of the trust. See Section 103(8) [72-38-103(9)]. Subsection (a) [72-38-814(1)] does not otherwise address the obligations of a trustee to make distributions, leaving that issue to the caselaw. Regarding the standards for exercising discretion and construing particular language of discretion, with numerous case citations, see Restatement (Third) of Trusts Section 50 (Tentative Draft No. 2, approved 1999); Restatement (Second) of Trusts Section 187 (1959). See also Edward C. Halbach, Jr., Problems of Discretion in Discretionary Trusts, 61 Colum. L. Rev. 1425 (1961). Under these standards, whether the trustee has a duty in a given situation to make a distribution depends on the exact language used, whether the standard grants discretion and its breadth, whether this discretion is coupled with a standard, whether the beneficiary has other available resources, and, more broadly, the overriding purposes of the trust. For example, distilling the results of scores of cases, the Restatement (Third) of Trusts concludes that there is a presumption that the "trustee's discretion should be exercised in a manner that will avoid either disqualifying the beneficiary for other benefits or expending trust funds for purposes for which public funds would otherwise be available." Restatement (Third) of Trusts Section 50 cmt. e & Reporter's Notes (Tentative Draft No. 2, 1999).

Subsection (a) [72-38-814(1)] requires a trustee exercise a discretionary power in good faith and in accordance with the terms and purposes of the trust and the interests of the beneficiaries. Similar to Restatement (Second) of Trusts Section 187 (1959), subsection (a) [72-38-814(1)] does not impose an obligation that a trustee's decision be within the bounds of a reasonable judgment, although such an interpretive standard may be imposed by the courts if the document adds a standard whereby the reasonableness of the trustee's judgment can be tested. Restatement (Second) of Trusts Section 187 cmt. f (1959).

The obligation of a trustee to act in good faith is a fundamental concept of fiduciary law although there are different ways that it can be expressed. Sometimes different formulations appear in the same source. Scott, in his treatise on trusts, states that the court will not interfere with the trustee's exercise of discretion if the trustee "acts in good faith and does not act capriciously," but Scott then states that the trustee will interfere if the trustee "acts dishonestly or in good faith, or where he acts from an improper motive." 3 Austin W. Scott & William F. Fratcher, The Law of Trusts Section 187.2 (4th ed. 1988).

Sometimes different formulations are used in the same case: [If] the "sole discretion" vested in and exercised by the trustees in this case . . . were exercised fraudulently, in bad faith or in an abuse of discretion, it is subject to . . . review. Whether good faith has been exercised, or whether fraud, bad faith or an abuse of discretion has been committed is always subject to consideration by the court upon appropriate allegations and proof. In re Ferrall's Estate, 258 P.2d 1009 (Cal. 1953).

An abuse by the trustee of the discretion granted in the terms of the trust is a breach of trust that can result in surcharge. See Section 1001(b) [72-38-1001(2)] (remedies for breach of trust). The standard stated in subsection (a) [72-38-810(1)] applies only to powers which are to be exercised in a fiduciary as opposed to a nonfiduciary capacity.

Subsections (b) [72-38-814(2)] through (d) [72-38-814(4)] rewrite the terms of a trust that might otherwise result in adverse estate and gift tax consequences to a beneficiary-trustee. This Code does not generally address the subject of tax curative provisions. These are provisions that automatically rewrite the terms of trusts that might otherwise fail to qualify for probable intended tax benefits. Such provisions, because they apply to all trusts using or failing to use specified language, are often overbroad, applying not only to trusts intended to qualify for tax benefits but also to smaller trust situations where taxes are not a concern. Enacting tax-curative provisions also requires special diligence by state legislatures to make certain that these provisions are periodically amended to account for the frequent changes in federal tax law. Furthermore, many failures to draft with sufficient care may be correctable by including a tax savings clause in the terms of the trust or by seeking modification of the trust using one or more of the methods authorized by Sections 411-417 [72-38-411 through 72-38-417]. Notwithstanding these reasons, the unintended inclusion of the trust in the beneficiary-trustee's gross estate is a frequent enough occurrence that the drafters concluded that it is a topic that this Code should address. It is also a topic on which numerous States have enacted corrective statutes.

A tax curative provision differs from a statute such as Section 416 [72-38-416] of this Code, which allows a court to modify a trust to achieve an intended tax benefit. Absent Congressional or regulatory authority authorizing the specific modification, a lower court decree in state court modifying a trust is controlling for federal estate tax purposes only if the decree was issued before the taxing event, which in the case of the estate tax would be the decedent's death. See Rev. Rul. 73-142, 1973-1 C.B. 405. There is specific federal authority authorizing modification of trusts for a number of reasons (see Comment to Section 416 [72-38-416]) but not on the specific issues addressed in this section. Subsections (b) [72-38-814(2)] through (d) [72-38-814(4)], by interpreting the original language of the trust instrument in a way that qualifies for intended tax benefits, obviates the need to seek a later modification of the trust.

Subsection (b)(1) [72-38-814(2)(a)] states the main rule. Unless the terms of the trust expressly indicate that the rule in this subsection is not to apply, the power to make discretionary distributions to a beneficiary-trustee is automatically limited by the requisite ascertainable standard necessary to avoid inclusion of the trust in the trustee's gross estate or result in a taxable gift upon the trustee's release or exercise of the power. Trusts of which the trustee-beneficiary is also a settlor are not subject to this subsection. In such a case, limiting the discretion of a settlor-trustee to an ascertainable standard would not be sufficient to avoid inclusion of the trust in the settlor's gross estate. See generally John J. Regan, Rebecca C. Morgan & David M. English, Tax, Estate and Financial Planning for the Elderly Section 17.07[2][h]. Furthermore, the inadvertent inclusion of a trust in a settlor-trustee's gross estate is a far less frequent and better understood occurrence than is the inadvertent inclusion of the trust in the estate of a nonsettlor trustee-beneficiary.

Subsection (b)(2) [72-38-814(2)(b)] addresses a common trap, the trustee who is not a beneficiary but who has power to make discretionary distributions to those to whom the trustee owes a legal obligation of support. Discretion to make distributions to those to whom the trustee owes a legal obligation of support, such as to the trustee's minor children, results in inclusion of the trust in the trustee's gross estate even if the power is limited by an ascertainable standard. The applicable regulation provides that the ascertainable standard exception applies only to distributions for the benefit of the decedent, not to distributions to those to whom the decedent owes a legal obligation of support. See Treas. Reg. Section 20.2041-1(c)(2).

Subsection (c) [72-38-814(3)] deals with cotrustees and adopts the common planning technique of granting the broader discretion only to the independent trustee. Cotrustees who are beneficiaries of the trust or who have a legal obligation to support a beneficiary may exercise the power only as limited by subsection (b) [72-38-814(2)]. If all trustees are so limited, the court may appoint a special fiduciary to make a decision as to whether a broader exercise is appropriate.

Subsection (d) [72-38-814(4)] excludes certain trusts from the operation of this section. Trusts qualifying for the marital deduction will be includable in the surviving spouse's gross estate regardless of whether this section applies. Consequently, if the spouse is acting as trustee, there is no need to limit the power of the spouse-trustee to make discretionary distributions for the spouse's benefit. Similar reasoning applies to the revocable trust, which, because of the settlor's power to revoke, is automatically includable in the settlor's gross estate even if the settlor is not named as a beneficiary.

QTIP marital trusts are subject to this section, however. QTIP trusts qualify for the marital deduction only if so elected on the federal estate tax return. Excluding a QTIP for which an election has been made from the operation of this section would allow the terms of the trust to be modified after the settlor's death. By not making the QTIP election, an otherwise unascertainable standard would be limited. By making the QTIP election, the trustee's discretion would not be curtailed. This ability to modify a trust depending on elections made on the federal estate tax return could itself constitute a taxable power of appointment resulting in inclusion of the trust in the surviving spouse's gross estate.

The exclusion of the Section 2503(c) minors trust is necessary to avoid loss of gift tax benefits. While preventing a trustee from distributing trust funds in discharge of a legal obligation of support would keep the trust out of the trustee's gross estate, such a restriction might result in loss of the gift tax annual exclusion for contributions to the trust, even if the trustee were otherwise granted unlimited discretion. See Rev. Rul. 69-345, 1969-1 C.B. 226.

2004 Amendment. The amendment substitutes "ascertainable standard" which is now a defined term in Section 103(2) [72-38-103(2)], for the former and identical definition in this section. No substantive change is intended.

72-38-815. General powers of trustee.

This section is intended to grant trustees the broadest possible powers, but to be exercised always in accordance with the duties of the trustee and any limitations stated in the terms of the trust. This broad authority is denoted by granting the trustee the powers of an unmarried competent owner of individually owned property, unlimited by restrictions that might be placed on it by marriage, disability, or cotenancy.

The powers conferred elsewhere in this Code that are subsumed under this section include all of the specific powers listed in Section 816 [72-38-816] as well as other powers described elsewhere in this Code. See Sections 108(c) [72-38-108(3)] (transfer of principal place of administration), 414(a) [72-38-414(1), adopted as modified] (termination of uneconomic trust with value less than $50,000), 417 [72-38-417] (combination and division of trusts), 703(e) [72-38-703(5)] (delegation to cotrustee), 802(h) [72-38-802(8)] (exception to duty of loyalty), 807 [72-38-807] (delegation to agent of powers and duties), 810(d) [72-38-810(4)] (joint investments), and Article 9 [Title 72, ch. 38, pt. 9] (Uniform Prudent Investor Act). The powers conferred by this Code may be exercised without court approval. If court approval of the exercise of a power is desired, a petition for court approval should be filed.

A power differs from a duty. A duty imposes an obligation or a mandatory prohibition. A power, on the other hand, is a discretion, the exercise of which is not obligatory. The existence of a power, however created or granted, does not speak to the question of whether it is prudent under the circumstances to exercise the power.

2003 Amendment. The amendment, which changes an "or" to an "and" between subsections (a)(1) [72-38-815(1)(a)] and (a)(2) [72-38-815(1)(b)], corrects an inadvertent style glitch. As the comments to Section 815 [72-38-815] make clear, the drafters intended that the trustee have both the powers stated in the terms of the trust and the powers specified in this Act, not that they be alternatives.

72-38-816. Specific powers of trustee.

Official Comments

This section enumerates specific powers commonly included in trust instruments and in trustee powers legislation. All the powers listed are subject to alteration in the terms of the trust. See Section 105 [72-38-105]. The powers listed are also subsumed under the general authority granted in Section 815(a)(2) [72-38-815(1)(b)] to exercise all powers over the trust property which an unmarried competent owner has over individually owned property, and any other powers appropriate to achieve the proper management, investment, and distribution of the trust property. The powers listed add little of substance not already granted by Section 815 [72-38-815] and powers conferred elsewhere in the Code, which are listed in the Comment to Section 815 [72-38-815]. While the Committee drafting this Code discussed dropping the list of specific powers, it concluded that the demand of third parties to see language expressly authorizing specific transactions justified retention of a detailed list.

As provided in Section 815(b) [72-38-815(2)], the exercise of a power is subject to fiduciary duties except as modified in the terms of the trust. The fact that the trustee has a power does not imply a duty that the power must be exercised.

Many of the powers listed in this section are similar to the powers listed in Section 3 of the Uniform Trustees' Powers Act (1964). Several are new, however, and other powers drawn from that Act have been updated. The powers enumerated in this section may be divided into categories. Certain powers, such as the powers to acquire or sell property, borrow money, and deal with real estate, securities, and business interests, are powers that any individual can exercise. Other powers, such as the power to collect trust property, are by their very nature only applicable to trustees. Other specific powers, particularly those listed in other sections of the Uniform Trust Code, modify a trustee duty that would otherwise apply. See, e.g., Sections 802(h) [72-38-802(8)] (exceptions to duty of loyalty) and 810(d) [72-38-810(4)] (joint investments as exception to earmarking requirement).

Paragraph (1) [72-38-816(1)] authorizes a trustee to collect trust property and collect or decline additions to the trust property. The power to collect trust property is an incident of the trustee's duty to administer the trust as provided in Section 801 [72-38-801]. The trustee has a duty to enforce claims as provided in Section 811 [72-38-811], the successful prosecution of which can result in collection of trust property. Pursuant to Section 812 [72-38-812], the trustee also has a duty to collect trust property from a former trustee or other person holding trust property. For an application of the power to reject additions to the trust property, see Section 816(13) [72-38-816(13)] (power to decline property with possible environmental liability).

Paragraph (2) [72-38-816(2)] authorizes a trustee to sell trust property, for cash or on credit, at public or private sale. Under the Restatement, a power of sale is implied unless limited in the terms of the trust. Restatement (Third) of Trusts: Prudent Investor Rule Section 190 (1992). In arranging a sale, a trustee must comply with the duty to act prudently as provided in Section 804 [72-38-804]. This duty may dictate that the sale be made with security.

Paragraph (4) [72-38-816(4)] authorizes a trustee to deposit funds in an account in a regulated financial-service institution. This includes the right of a financial institution trustee to deposit funds in its own banking department as authorized by Section 802(h)(4) [72-38-802(8)(d)].

Paragraph (5) [72-38-816(5)] authorizes a trustee to borrow money. Under the Restatement, the sole limitation on such borrowing is the general obligation to invest prudently. See Restatement (Third) of Trusts: Prudent Investor Rule Section 191 (1992). Language clarifying that the loan may extend beyond the duration of the trust was added to negate an older view that the trustee only had power to encumber the trust property for the period that the trust was in existence.

Paragraph (6) [72-38-816(6)] authorizes the trustee to continue, contribute additional capital to, or change the form of a business. Any such decision by the trustee must be made in light of the standards of prudent investment stated in Article 9.

Paragraph (7) [72-38-816(7)], regarding powers with respect to securities, codifies and amplifies the principles of Restatement (Second) of Trusts Section 193 (1959).

Paragraph (9) [72-38-816(9)], authorizing the leasing of property, negates the older view, reflected in Restatement (Second) of Trusts Section 189 cmt. c (1959), that a trustee could not lease property beyond the duration of the trust. Whether a longer term lease is appropriate is judged by the standards of prudence applicable to all investments.

Paragraph (10) [72-38-816(10), authorizing a trustee to grant options with respect to sales, leases or other dispositions of property, negates the older view, reflected in Restatement (Second) of Trusts Section 190 cmt. k (1959), that a trustee could not grant another person an option to purchase trust property. Like any other investment decision, whether the granting of an option is appropriate is a question of prudence under the standards of Article 9 [Title 72, ch. 38, pt. 9].

Paragraph (11) [72-38-816(11)], authorizing a trustee to purchase insurance, empowers a trustee to implement the duty to protect trust property. See Section 809 [72-38-809]. The trustee may also insure beneficiaries, agents, and the trustee against liability, including liability for breach of trust.

Paragraph (13) [72-38-816(13)]is one of several provisions in the Uniform Trust Code designed to address trustee concerns about possible liability for violations of environmental law. This paragraph collects all the powers relating to environmental concerns in one place even though some of the powers, such as the powers to pay expenses, compromise claims, and decline property, overlap with other paragraphs of this section (decline property, paragraph (1) [72-38-816(1)]; compromise claims, paragraph (14) [72-38-816(14)]; pay expenses, paragraph (15) [72-38-816(15)]). Numerous States have legislated on the subject of environmental liability of fiduciaries. For a representative state statute, see Tex. Prop. Code Ann. Section 113.025. See also Sections 701(c)(2) [72-38-701(3)(b)] (designated trustee may inspect property to determine potential violation of environmental or other law or for any purpose) and 1010(b) [72-38-1010(2)] (trustee not personally liable for violation of environmental law arising from ownership or control of trust property).

Paragraph (14) [72-38-816(14)] authorizes a trustee to pay, contest, settle, or release claims. Section 811 [72-38-811] requires that a trustee need take only "reasonable" steps to enforce claims, meaning that a trustee may release a claim not only when it is uncollectible, but also when collection would be uneconomic. See Restatement (Second) of Trusts Section 192 (1959) (power to compromise, arbitrate and abandon claims).

Paragraph (15) [72-38-816(15)], among other things, authorizes a trustee to pay compensation to the trustee and agents without prior approval of court. Regarding the standard for setting trustee compensation, see Section 708. See also Section 709 [72-38-709] (repayment of trustee expenditures). While prior court approval is not required, Section 813(b)(4) [72-38-813(2)(d)] requires the trustee to inform the qualified beneficiaries in advance of a change in the method or rate of compensation.

Paragraph (16) [72-38-816(16)] authorizes a trustee to make elections with respect to taxes. The Uniform Trust Code leaves to other law the issue of whether the trustee, in making such elections, must make compensating adjustments in the beneficiaries' interests.

Paragraph (17) [72-38-816(17)] authorizes a trustee to take action with respect to employee benefit or retirement plans, or annuities or life insurance payable to the trustee. Typically, these will be beneficiary designations which the settlor has made payable to the trustee, but this Code also allows the trustee to acquire ownership of annuities or life insurance.

Paragraphs (18) [72-38-816(18)] and (19) [72-38-816(19)] allow a trustee to make loans to a beneficiary or to guarantee loans of a beneficiary upon such terms and conditions as the trustee considers fair and reasonable. The determination of what is fair and reasonable must be made in light of the fiduciary duties of the trustee and the purposes of the trust. Frequently, a trustee will make loans to a beneficiary which might be considered less than prudent in an ordinary commercial sense although of great benefit to the beneficiary and which help carry out the trust purposes. If the trustee requires security for the loan to the beneficiary, adequate security under this paragraph may consist of a charge on the beneficiary's interest in the trust. See Restatement (Second) of Trusts Section 255 (1959). However, the interest of a beneficiary subject to a spendthrift restraint may not be pledged as security for a loan. See Section 502 [72-38-502].

Paragraph (20) [72-38-816(20)] authorizes the appointment of ancillary trustees in jurisdictions in which the regularly appointed trustee is unable or unwilling to act. Normally, an ancillary trustee will be appointed only when there is a need to manage real estate located in another jurisdiction. This paragraph allows the regularly appointed trustee to select the ancillary trustee and to confer on the ancillary trustee such powers and duties as may be necessary. The appointment of ancillary trustees is a topic which a settlor may wish to address in the terms of the trust.

Paragraph (21) [72-38-816(21)] authorizes a trustee to make payments to another person for the use or benefit of a beneficiary who is under a legal disability or who the trustee reasonably believes is incapacitated. Although an adult relative or other person receiving funds is required to spend it on the beneficiary's behalf, it is preferable that the trustee make the distribution to a person having more formal fiduciary responsibilities. For this reason, payment may be made to an adult relative only if the trustee does not know of a conservator, guardian, custodian, or custodial trustee capable of acting for the beneficiary.

Paragraph (22) [72-38-816(22)] authorizes a trustee to make non-pro-rata distributions and allocate particular assets in proportionate or disproportionate shares. This power provides needed flexibility and lessens the risk that a non-pro-rata distribution will be treated as a taxable sale.

Paragraph (23) [72-38-816(23)] authorizes a trustee to resolve disputes through mediation, arbitration or other methods of alternate dispute resolution. The drafters of this Code encourage the use of such alternate methods for resolving disputes. Arbitration is a form of nonjudicial settlement agreement authorized by Section 111. In representing beneficiaries and others in connection with arbitration or in approving settlements obtained through mediation or other methods of ADR, the representation principles of Article 3 may be applied. Settlors wishing to encourage use of alternate dispute resolution may draft to provide it. For sample language, see American Arbitration Association, Arbitration Rules for Wills and Trusts (1995).

Paragraph (24) [72-38-816(24)] authorizes a trustee to prosecute or defend an action. As to the propriety of reimbursement for attorney's fees and other expenses of an action or judicial proceeding, see Section 709 [72-38-709] and Comment. See also Section 811 [72-38-811] (duty to defend actions).

Paragraph (26) [72-38-816(26)], which is similar to Section 344 of the Restatement (Second) of Trusts (1959), clarifies that even though the trust has terminated, the trustee retains the powers needed to wind up the administration of the trust and distribute the remaining trust property.

CASES DECIDED PRIOR TO ADOPTION OF 1989 TRUST CODE

Exchange of Trust Property: Courts hold that where the trust agreement gives the trustee authority to sell and dispose of property, as here, he may exchange it. Where all those interested in the trust property as beneficiaries consent thereto, there is no reason why a trustee may not exchange trust property for other property. Gray v. Corcoran, 127 M 572, 269 P2d 1091 (1954).

72-38-817. Distribution upon termination.

Official Comments

This section contains several independent provisions governing distribution upon termination. Other provisions of the Uniform Trust Code relevant to distribution upon termination include Section 816(26) [72-38-816(26)] (powers upon termination to windup administration and distribution), and 1005 [72-38-1005] (limitation of action against trustee).

Subsection (a) [72-38-817(1)] is based on Section 3-906(b) of the Uniform Probate Code. It addresses the dilemma that sometimes arises when the trustee is reluctant to make distribution until the beneficiary approves but the beneficiary is reluctant to approve until the assets are in hand. The procedure made available under subsection (a) [72-38-817(1)] facilitates the making of non-pro-rata distributions. However, whenever practicable it is normally better practice to obtain the advance written consent of the beneficiaries to a proposed plan of distribution. Similar to other notices under the Code, the right of a beneficiary to object may be barred by delivery of the proposal to another person if that other person may represent and bind the beneficiary as provided in Article 3 [Title 72, ch. 38, pt. 3].

The failure of a beneficiary to object to a plan of distribution pursuant to subsection (a) [72-38-817(1)] is not a release as provided in subsection (c) [72-38-817(3)] or Section 1009 [72-38-1009]. A release requires an affirmative act by a beneficiary and is not accomplished upon a mere failure to object. Furthermore, a failure of a beneficiary to object does not preclude the beneficiary from bringing an action with respect to matters not disclosed in the proposal for distribution.

Subsection (b) [72-38-817(2)] recognizes that upon an event terminating or partially terminating a trust, expeditious distribution should be encouraged to the extent reasonable under the circumstances. However, a trustee is entitled to retain a reasonable reserve for payment of debts, expenses, and taxes. Sometimes these reserves must be quite large, for example, upon the death of the beneficiary of a QTIP trust that is subject to federal estate tax in the beneficiary's estate. Not infrequently, a substantial reserve must be retained until the estate tax audit is concluded several years after the beneficiary's death.

Subsection (c) [72-38-817(3)] is an application of Section 1009 [72-38-1009]. Section 1009 [72-38-1009] addresses the validity of any type of release that a beneficiary might give. Subsection (c) [72-38-817(3)] is more limited, dealing only with releases given upon termination of the trust. Factors affecting the validity of a release include adequacy of disclosure, whether the beneficiary had a legal incapacity and was not represented under Article 3 [Title 72, ch. 38, pt. 3], and whether the trustee engaged in any improper conduct. See Restatement (Second) of Trusts Section 216 (1959).

Uniform Prudent Investor Act

Part Official Comments

Because of the widespread adoption of the Uniform Prudent Investor Act, no effort has been made to disassemble and integrate the Uniform Prudent Investor Act into the Uniform Trust Code. States adopting the Uniform Trust Code that have previously enacted the Prudent Investor Act are encouraged to reenact their version of the Prudent Investor Act as Article 9 [Title 72, ch. 38, pt. 9] of the Uniform Trust Code. Reenacting the Uniform Prudent Investor Act as a unit will preserve uniformity with States that have enacted the Uniform Prudent Investor Act in free-standing form.

The Uniform Prudent Investor Act prescribes a series of duties relevant to the investment and management of trust property. The Uniform Trust Code, Article 8 [Title 72, ch. 38, pt. 8] contains duties and powers of a trustee relevant to the investment, administration, and distribution of trust property. There is therefore significant overlap between Article 8 [Title 72, ch. 38, pt. 8] and the Prudent Investor Act. Where the Uniform Prudent Investor Act and Uniform Trust Code are duplicative, enacting jurisdictions are encouraged to enact the Uniform Prudent Investor Act in this article but without the provisions already addressed in Article 8 [Title 72, ch. 38, pt. 8] of the Uniform Trust Code. The duplicative provisions of the Uniform Prudent Investor Act and Article 8 [Title 72, ch. 38, pt. 8] of this Code are as follows:

	Prudent Investor Act	Article 8
Special Skills	2(f)	806
Loyalty	5	802
Impartiality	6	803
Investment costs	7	805
Delegation	9	807

Deleting these duplicative provisions leaves the following sections of the Uniform Prudent Investor Act for enactment in this article:

Section 1	Prudent Investor Rule
Section 2(a)-(e)	Standard of Care; Portfolio Strategy; Risk and Return Objectives
Section 3	Diversification
Section 4	Duties at Inception of Trusteeship
Section 8	Reviewing Compliance
Section 10	Language Invoking Standard of [Act]

Part 10
Liability of Trustees and Rights of Persons Dealing with Trustee

Part Official Comments

Sections 1001 [72-38-1001] through 1009 [72-38-1009] identify the remedies for breach of trust, describe how money damages are to be determined, and specify potential defenses. Section 1001 [72-38-1001] lists the remedies for breach of trust and specifies when a breach of trust occurs. A breach of trust occurs when the trustee breaches one of the duties contained in Article 8 [Title 72, ch. 38, pt. 8] or elsewhere in the Code. The remedies for breach of trust in Section 1001 [72-38-1001] are broad and flexible. Section 1002 [72-38-1002] provides how money damages for breach of trust are to be determined. The standard for determining money damages rests on two principles: (1) the trust should be restored to the position it would have been in had the harm not occurred; and (2) the trustee should not be permitted to profit from the trustee's own wrong. Section 1003 [72-38-1003] holds a trustee accountable for profits made from the trust even in the absence of a breach of trust. Section 1004 [72-38-1004] reaffirms the court's power in equity to award costs and attorney's fees as justice requires.

Sections 1005 [72-38-1005] through 1009 [72-38-1009] deal with potential defenses. Section 1005 [72-38-1005] provides a statute of limitations on actions against a trustee. Section 1006 [72-38-1006] protects a trustee who acts in reasonable reliance on the terms of a written trust instrument. Section 1007 [72-38-1007] protects a trustee who has exercised reasonable care to ascertain the happening of events that might affect distribution, such as a beneficiary's marriage or death. Section 1008 [72-38-1008] describes the effect and limits on the use of an exculpatory clause. Section 1009 [72-38-1009] deals with the standards for recognizing beneficiary approval of acts of the trustee that might otherwise constitute a breach of trust.

Sections 1010 [72-38-1010] through 1013 [72-38-1013] address trustee relations with persons other than beneficiaries. The emphasis is on encouraging third parties to engage in commercial transactions to the same extent as if the property were not held in trust. Section 1010 [72-38-1010] negates personal liability on contracts entered into by the trustee if the fiduciary capacity was properly disclosed. The trustee is also relieved from liability for torts committed in the course of administration unless the trustee was personally at fault. Section 1011 [72-38-1011] negates personal liability for contracts entered into by partnerships in which the trustee is a general partner as long as the fiduciary capacity was disclosed in the contract or partnership certificate. Section 1012 [72-38-1012] protects persons other than beneficiaries who deal with a trustee in good faith and without knowledge that the trustee is exceeding or improperly exercising a power. Section 1013 [72-38-1013] permits a third party to rely on a certification of trust, thereby reducing the need for a third party to request a copy of the complete trust instrument.

Much of this article is not subject to override in the terms of the trust. The settlor may not limit the rights of persons other than beneficiaries as provided in Sections 1010 [72-38-1010] through 1013 [72-38-1013], nor interfere with the court's ability to take such action to remedy a breach of trust as [may] be necessary in the interests of justice. See Section 105 [72-38-105].

CASES DECIDED AFTER ADOPTION OF 1989 TRUST CODE

No Fiduciary Duty of Trustee Owed to Beneficiary When Person With Power to Revoke Competent: A possible beneficiary of a trust contended that the trustee bank breached its fiduciary duty to the beneficiary. The Supreme Court disagreed. Under 72-33-701 (now repealed), the trustee of a revocable trust owes a fiduciary duty only to the person holding the power to revoke during the time that the person is competent, not to the beneficiary. The person with the power to revoke was competent during the time in question, so the trustee owed no fiduciary duty to the beneficiary. Stanton v. Wells Fargo Bank Mont., N.A., 2007 MT 22, 335 M 384, 152 P3d 115 (2007).

Trust Necessary for Support — Necessity Construed: The trust that the decedent set up for his wife, an Alzheimer's sufferer, provided in part that "The purposes of this Trust are to provide for and assure, so far as possible, the generous care and support of my said wife ... and to provide for funeral ... and any other expenses attendant upon ... her death. ... The trustee shall ... pay ... as much ... as Trustee deems necessary for her support, care and health .... The discretion ... shall be exercised liberally in favor of my said wife, it being my intention that she shall have, in addition to the necessities, a reasonable number of the luxuries of life, if she desires them." It was improper for the trustee to deny every request of the wife's guardian and conservator for aid on the basis that no financial need was shown and that the wife must spend her whole personal estate before the trust could be used. The trustee and lower court improperly used the trust's use of the word "necessary" to support the trustee's interpretation. The trustee's intent and the trust's wording on the whole showed this interpretation to be erroneous. The trust was ordered to pay the wife's living, medical, funeral, and burial expenses and to repay the conservator for amounts that the conservator had paid for care since the trustee's death. In the absence of statutory or contractual authority and absent bad faith or malicious behavior, the conservator was denied attorney fees. In re Estate of Lindgren, 268 M 96, 885 P2d 1280, 51 St. Rep. 1182 (1994).

CASES DECIDED PRIOR TO ADOPTION OF 1989 TRUST CODE

Vesting of Beneficiary's Interest in Stock: When the settlor of a revocable trust purchased a stock certificate in his name as trustee for a certain beneficiary and reserved the right to change the beneficiary and to receive the income and to vote the stock, upon the declaration of the trust, the named beneficiary became vested with an equitable interest in the stock, which consisted essentially in a right to have the trustee perform the duties imposed on him by law and eventually to succeed to complete ownership of the stock. Investors Stock Fund, Inc. v. Roberts, 179 F. Supp. 185 (D.C. Mont. 1959), affirmed in 286 F2d 647 (9th Cir. 1961).

72-38-1001. Remedies for breach of trust.

Official Comments

This section codifies the remedies available to rectify or to prevent a breach of trust for violation of a duty owed to a beneficiary. The duties that a trust might breach include those contained in Article 8 [Title 72, ch. 38, pt. 8] in addition to those specified elsewhere in the Code.

This section identifies the available remedies but does not attempt to cover the refinements and exceptions developed in case law. The availability of a remedy in a particular circumstance will be determined not only by this Code but also by the common law of trusts and principles of equity. See Section 106 [72-38-106].

Beneficiaries and cotrustees have standing to bring a petition to remedy a breach of trust. Following a successor trustee's acceptance of office, a successor trustee has standing to sue a predecessor for breach of trust. See Restatement (Second) of Trusts §200 (1959). A person who may represent a beneficiary's interest under Article 3 [Title 72, ch. 38, pt. 3] would have standing to bring a petition on behalf of the person represented. In the case of a charitable trust, those with standing include the state attorney general, a charitable organization designated entitled to receive distributions under the terms of the trust, and other persons with a special interest. See Section 110 & Restatement (Second) of Trusts §391 (1959). A person appointed to enforce a trust for an animal or a trust for a noncharitable purpose would have standing to sue for a breach of trust. See Sections 110(b) [72-38-110(2)], 408 [72-38-408], 409 [72-38-409].

Traditionally, remedies for breach of trust at law were limited to suits to enforce unconditional obligations to pay money or deliver chattels. See Restatement (Second) of Trusts §198 (1959). Otherwise, remedies for breach of trust were exclusively equitable, and as such, punitive damages were not available and findings of fact were made by the judge and not a jury. See Restatement (Second) of Trusts §197 (1959). The Uniform Trust Code does not preclude the possibility that a particular enacting jurisdiction might not follow these norms.

The remedies identified in this section are derived from Restatement (Second) of Trusts §199 (1959). The reference to payment of money in subsection (b)(3) [72-38-1001(2)(c)] includes liability that might be characterized as damages, restitution, or surcharge. For the measure of liability, see Section 1002 [72-38-1002]. Subsection (b)(5) [72-38-1001(2)(e)] makes explicit the court's authority to appoint a special fiduciary, also sometimes referred to as a receiver. See Restatement (Second) of Trusts §199(d) (1959). The authority of the court to appoint a special fiduciary is not limited to actions alleging breach of trust but is available whenever the court, exercising its equitable jurisdiction, concludes that an appointment would promote administration of the trust. See Section 704(d) [72-38-704(4)] (special fiduciary may be appointed whenever court considers such appointment necessary for administration).

Subsection (b)(8) [72-38-1001(2)(h)], which allows the court to reduce or deny compensation, is in accord with Restatement (Second) of Trusts §243 (1959). For the factors to consider in setting a trustee's compensation absent breach of trust, see Section 708 [72-38-708] and Comment. In deciding whether to reduce or deny a trustee compensation, the court may wish to consider (1) whether the trustee acted in good faith; (2) whether the breach of trust was intentional; (3) the nature of the breach and the extent of the loss; (4) whether the trustee has restored the loss; and (5) the value of the trustee's services to the trust. See Restatement (Second) of Trusts §243 cmt. c (1959).

The authority under subsection (b)(9) [72-38-1001(2)(i)] to set aside wrongful acts of the trustee is a corollary of the power to enjoin a threatened breach as provided in subsection (b)(2) [72-38-1001(2)(b)]. However, in setting aside the wrongful acts of the trustee the court may not impair the rights of bona fide purchasers protected under Section 1012 [72-38-1012]. See Restatement (Second) of Trusts §284 (1959).

Cestui Que Trust's Remedies at Law Not Limited: While 72-20-203 (now repealed) would seem to provide only equitable remedies against the trustee in his fiduciary capacity, it does not limit the cestui que trust's remedies at law, as evidenced by 72-20-210 (now repealed). 72-38-1002. Damages for breach of trust.

Official Comments

Subsection (a) [72-38-1002(1), adopted as modified] is based on Restatement (Third) of Trusts: Prudent Investor Rule §205 (1992). If a trustee commits a breach of trust, the beneficiaries may either affirm the transaction or, if a loss has occurred, hold the trustee liable for the amount necessary to compensate fully for the consequences of the breach. This may include recovery of lost income, capital gain, or appreciation that would have resulted from proper administration. Even if a loss has not occurred, the trustee may not benefit from the improper action and is accountable for any profit the trustee made by reason of the breach.

For extensive commentary on the determination of damages, traditionally known as trustee surcharge, with numerous specific applications, see Restatement (Third) of Trusts: Prudent Investor Rule §§205-213 (1992). For the use of benchmark portfolios to determine damages, see Restatement (Third) of Trusts: Prudent Investor Rule Reporter's Notes to §§205 and 208-211 (1992). On the authority of a court of equity to reduce or excuse damages for breach of trust, see Restatement (Second) of Trusts §205 cmt. g (1959).

For purposes of this section and Section 1003 [72-38-1003], "profit" does not include the trustee's compensation. A trustee who has committed a breach of trust is entitled to reasonable compensation for administering the trust unless the court reduces or denies the trustee compensation pursuant to Section 1001(b)(8) [72-38-1001(2)(h)].

Subsection (b) [72-38-1002(2)] is based on Restatement (Second) of Trusts §258 (1959). Cotrustees are jointly and severally liable for a breach of trust if there was joint participation in the breach. Joint and several liability also is imposed on a nonparticipating cotrustee who, as provided in Section 703(g) [72-38-703(7)], failed to exercise reasonable care (1) to prevent a cotrustee from committing a serious breach of trust, or (2) to compel a cotrustee to redress a serious breach of trust. Joint and several liability normally carries with it a right in any trustee to seek contribution from a cotrustee to the extent the trustee has paid more than the trustee's proportionate share of the liability. Subsection (b) [72-38-1002(2)], consistent with Restatement (Second) of Trusts §258 (1959), creates an exception. A trustee who was substantially more at fault or committed the breach of trust in bad faith or with reckless indifference to the purposes of the trust or the interests of the beneficiaries is not entitled to contribution from the other trustees.

Determining degrees of comparative fault is a question of fact. The fact that one trustee was more culpable or more active than another does not necessarily establish that this trustee was substantially more at fault. Nor is a trustee substantially less at fault because the trustee did not actively participate in the breach. See Restatement (Second) of Trusts §258 cmt. e (195). Among the factors to consider: (1) Did the trustee fraudulently induce the other trustee to join in the breach? (2) Did the trustee commit the breach intentionally while the other trustee was at most negligent? (3) Did the trustee, because of greater experience or expertise, control the actions of the other trustee? (4) Did the trustee alone commit the breach with liability imposed on the other trustee only because of an improper delegation or failure to properly monitor the actions of the cotrustee? See Restatement (Second) of Trusts §258 cmt. d (1959).

72-38-1003. Damages in absence of breach.

Official Comments

The principle on which a trustee's duty of loyalty is premised is that a trustee should not be allowed to use the trust as a means for personal profit other than for routine compensation earned. While most instances of personal profit involve situations where the trustee has breached the duty of loyalty, not all cases of personal profit involve a breach of trust. Subsection (a) [72-38-1003(1)], which holds a trustee accountable for any profit made, even absent a breach of trust, is based on Restatement (Second) of Trusts §203 (1959). A typical example of a profit is receipt by the trustee of a commission or bonus from a third party for actions relating to the trust's administration. See Restatement (Second) of Trusts §203 cmt. a (1959).

A trustee is not an insurer. Similar to Restatement (Second) of Trusts §204 (1959), subsection (b) [72-38-1003(2)] provides that absent a breach of trust a trustee is not liable for a loss or depreciation in the value of the trust property or for failure to make a profit.

72-38-1004. Attorney fees and costs.

Official Comments

This section, which is based on Massachusetts General Laws chapter 215, §45, codifies the court's historic authority to award costs and fees, including reasonable attorney's fees, in judicial proceedings grounded in equity. The court may award a party its own fees and costs from the trust. The court may also charge a party's costs and fees against another party to the litigation. Generally, litigation expenses were at common law chargeable against another party only in the case of egregious conduct such as bad faith or fraud. With respect to a party's own fees, Section 709 [72-38-709] authorizes a trustee to recover expenditures properly incurred in the administration of the trust. The court may award a beneficiary litigation costs if the litigation is deemed beneficial to the trust. Sometimes, litigation brought by a beneficiary involves an allegation that the trustee has committed a breach of trust. On other occasions, the suit by the beneficiary is brought because of the trustee's failure to take action against a third party, such as to recover property properly belonging to the trust. For the authority of a beneficiary to bring an action when the trustee fails to take action against a third party, see Restatement (Second) of Trusts §§281-282 (1959). For the case law on the award of attorney's fees and other litigation costs, see 3 Austin W. Scott & William F. Fratcher, The Law of Trusts §§188.4 (4th ed. 1988).

72-38-1005. Limitation of action against trustee.

Official Comments

The one-year and five-year limitations periods under this section are not the only means for barring an action by a beneficiary. A beneficiary may be foreclosed by consent, release, or ratification as provided in Section 1009 [72-38-1009]. Claims may also be barred by principles such as estoppel and laches arising in equity under the common law of trusts. See Section 106 [72-38-106].

The representative referred to in subsection (a) [72-38-1005(1)] is the person who may represent and bind a beneficiary as provided in Article 3 [Title 72, ch. 38, pt. 3]. During the time that a trust is revocable and the settlor has capacity, the person holding the power to revoke is the one who must receive the report. See Section 603(a) [72-38-603(1)] (rights of settlor of revocable trust).

This section addresses only the issue of when the clock will start to run for purposes of the statute of limitations. If the trustee wishes to foreclose possible claims immediately, a consent to the report or other information may be obtained pursuant to Section 1009 [72-38-1009]. For the provisions relating to the duty to report to beneficiaries, see Section 813 [72-38-813].

Subsection (a) [72-38-1005(1)] applies only if the trustee has furnished a report. The one-year statute of limitations does not begin to run against a beneficiary who has waived the furnishing of a report as provided in Section 813(d) [72-38-813(4)].

Subsection (c) [72-38-1005(3)] is intended to provide some ultimate repose for actions against a trustee. It applies to cases in which the trustee has failed to report to the beneficiaries or the report did not meet the disclosure requirements of subsection (b) [72-38-1005(2)]. It also applies to beneficiaries who did not receive notice of the report, whether personally or through representation. While the five-year limitations period will normally begin to run on termination of the trust, it can also begin earlier. If a trustee leaves office prior to the termination of the trust, the limitations period for actions against that particular trustee begins to run on the date the trustee leaves office. If a beneficiary receives a final distribution prior to the date the trust terminates, the limitations period for actions by that particular beneficiary begins to run on the date of final distribution.

If a trusteeship terminates by reason of death, a claim against the trustee's estate for breach of fiduciary duty would, like other claims against the trustee's estate, be barred by a probate creditor's claim statute even though the statutory period prescribed by this section has not yet expired.

This section does not specifically provide that the statutes of limitations under this section are tolled for fraud or other misdeeds, the drafters preferring to leave the resolution of this question to other law of the State.

CASES DECIDED AFTER ADOPTION OF 1989 TRUST CODE

Statute of Limitations Applicable to Workers' Compensation Subrogation Right Created by Statute — Subrogation Agreement Not Created by Correspondence Between Attorneys for Claimant and Insurer: Roadarmel suffered an industrial injury and filed a workers' compensation claim against his employer, and the claim was defended by Royal Insurance Company (Royal). Roadarmel received a judgment and then filed a third-party action against two companies that had supplied the chemicals that injured him. Roadarmel's attorney, White, properly notified Royal that the third-party action was being commenced. Pursuant to 39-71-414, Roadarmel requested that Royal pay a portion of the costs, and Royal agreed to participate in the costs rather than waive its subrogation rights, tendering a check for $5,000 toward the costs. Roadarmel was successful in the third-party action, and White advised Royal that the third parties would appeal. The appeal was upheld, and White notified Royal of that fact, attaching copies of the settlement check and jury verdict forms, a breakdown of the actual costs of the third-party action, and a request that Royal determine its subrogation interest in a portion of the third-party proceeds. Royal independently computed the amount that it contended that it was owed and advised Roadarmel in letters that an action would be filed to determine Royal's subrogation interests. White did not respond to the letters, and 3 1/2 years passed before Royal filed a petition to determine its subrogation rights. Royal later learned through discovery that White had disbursed the third-party proceeds on the same day that Royal had been requested to determine its subrogation interest, allegedly instructing Roadarmel to hold the funds pending a subrogation determination. Royal then also filed a separate count against White for an alleged breach of the duty of trust owed Royal as a third-party beneficiary of the trust imposed on the third-party proceeds. The Workers' Compensation Court determined that a subrogation agreement had been formed in the exchange of letters between White and Royal's counsel, that the statute of limitations on the contract had not expired, and that Roadarmel and White were jointly and severally liable for $63,864.79 for breaching the subrogation contract and failing to honor Royal's first lien of the third-party judgment. Roadarmel and White appealed, contending that Royal's subrogation action was based on a statutory liability that was time-barred by the 2-year statute of limitations in 27-2-211 and that the 3-year statute of limitations in 72-34-511 (now repealed), which governs actions based on an alleged breach of trust, also barred Royal's action against White. Royal argued that the correspondence between the parties formed an enforceable contract that was subject to the longer statute of limitations in 27-2-202. The Supreme Court agreed with Roadarmel and White. The correspondence only confirmed in writing that which was required by and took place entirely in the context of the mandatory statutory procedures and did not create an enforceable contract. Although the court recognized the rights of equitable subrogation at common law, those rights were conceptually distinguished from an insurer's first lien against third-party proceeds recovered by an injured employee, which constitutes a statutory liability amounting to an unqualified right of reimbursement not found at common law. As set out in St. Paul Fire & Marine Ins. Co. v.

Glassing, 269 M 76, 887 P2d 218 (1994), the concept of subrogation merely gives the insurer the right to prosecute the cause of action that the insurer possessed, so the insurer's claim by subrogation, being purely derivative, is subject to the same statute of limitations as though the cause of action were sued upon by the insured. The statutory right to reimbursement or recoupment is distinguishable from the insurer's right of subrogation proper. Thus, Royal's claim against Roadarmel, being based on a liability created by statute, was time-barred under 27-2-211(1)(c). Further, Royal's breach of trust claim against White was time-barred by 72-34-511 (now repealed). Because Royal's statutory lien was extinguished as a matter of law 2 years after Royal received notice that the third-party action was settled, by the time that the statute of limitations on White's actions began to run, even if that time was determined to be the date on which he disbursed the third-party funds, he could no longer be characterized as a trustee, constructive or otherwise, of the third-party proceeds. The case was reversed and remanded for summary judgment in favor of Roadarmel and White. Royal Ins. Co. v. Roadarmel, 2000 MT 259, 301 M 508, 11 P3d 105, 57 St. Rep. 1080 (2000).

72-38-1006. Reliance on trust instrument.

Official Comments

It sometimes happens that the intended terms of the trust differ from the apparent meaning of the trust instrument. This can occur because the court, in determining the terms of the trust, is allowed to consider evidence extrinsic to the trust instrument. See Section 103(18) [72-38-103(21)] (definition of "terms of a trust"). Furthermore, if a trust is reformed on account of mistake of fact or law, as authorized by Section 415 [72-38-415], provisions of a trust instrument can be deleted or contradicted and provisions not in the trust instrument may be added. The concept of the "terms of a trust," both as defined in this Code and as used in the doctrine of reformation, is intended to effectuate the principle that a trust should be administered and distributed in accordance with the settlor's intent. However, a trustee should also be able to administer a trust with some dispatch and without concern that a reasonable reliance on the terms of the trust instrument is misplaced. This section protects a trustee who so relies on a trust instrument but only to the extent the breach of trust resulted from such reliance. This section is similar to Section 1(b) of the Uniform Prudent Investor Act, which protects a trustee from liability to the extent that the trustee acted in reasonable reliance on the provisions of the trust.

This section protects a trustee only if the trustee's reliance is reasonable. For example, a trustee's reliance on the trust instrument would not be justified if the trustee is aware of a prior court decree or binding nonjudicial settlement agreement clarifying or changing the terms of the trust.

72-38-1007. Event affecting administration or distribution.

Official Comments

This section, which is based on Washington Revised Code §11.98.100, is designed to encourage trustees to administer trusts expeditiously and without undue concern about liability for failure to ascertain external facts, often of a personal nature, that might affect administration or distribution of the trust. The common law, contrary to this section, imposed absolute liability against a trustee for misdelivery regardless of the trustee's level of care. See Restatement (Second) of Trusts §226 (1959). The events listed in this section are not exclusive. A trustee who has exercised reasonable care to ascertain the occurrence of other events, such as the attainment by a beneficiary of a certain age, is also protected from liability.

72-38-1008. Exculpation of trustee.

Official Comments

Even if the terms of the trust attempt to completely exculpate a trustee for the trustee's acts, the trustee must always comply with a certain minimum standard. As provided in subsection (a) [72-38-1008(1)], a trustee must always act in good faith with regard to the purposes of the trust and the interests of the beneficiaries. Subsection (a) [72-38-1008(1)] is consistent with the standards expressed in Sections 105 [72-38-105] and 814(a) [72-38-814(1)], which, similar to this section, place limits on the power of a settlor to negate trustee duties. This section is also similar to Section 222 of the Restatement (Second) of Trusts (1959), except that this Code, unlike the Restatement, allows a settlor to exculpate a trustee for a profit that the trustee made from the trust.

Subsection (b) [72-38-1008(2)] disapproves of cases such as Marsman v. Nasca, 573 N.E.2d 1025 (Mass. App. Ct. 1991), which held that an exculpatory clause in a trust instrument drafted by the trustee was valid because the beneficiary could not prove that the clause was inserted as a result of an abuse of a fiduciary relationship. For a later case where sufficient proof of abuse was present, see Rutanan v. Ballard, 678 N.E.2d 133 (Mass. 1997). Subsection (b) [72-38-1008(2)] responds to the danger that the insertion of such a clause by the fiduciary or its agent may have been undisclosed or inadequately understood by the settlor. To overcome the presumption of abuse in subsection (b) [72-38-1008(2)], the trustee must establish that the clause was fair and that its existence and contents were adequately communicated to the settlor. In determining whether the clause was fair, the court may wish to examine: (1) the extent of the prior relationship between the settlor and trustee; (2) whether the settlor received independent advice; (3) the sophistication of the settlor with respect to business and fiduciary matters; (4) the trustee's reasons for inserting the clause; and (5) the scope of the particular provision inserted. See Restatement (Second) of Trusts §222 cmt. d (1959).

The requirements of subsection (b) [72-38-1008(2)] are satisfied if the settlor was represented by independent counsel. If the settlor was represented by independent counsel, the settlor's attorney is considered the drafter of the instrument even if the attorney used the trustee's form. Because the settlor's attorney is an agent of the settlor, disclosure of an exculpatory term to the settlor's attorney is disclosure to the settlor.

72-38-1009. Beneficiary's consent, release, or ratification.

Official Comments

This section is based on Sections 216 through 218 of the Restatement (Second) of Trusts (1959). A consent, release, or affirmance under this section may occur either before or after the approved conduct. This section requires an affirmative act by the beneficiary. A failure to object is not sufficient. See Restatement (Second) of Trusts §216 cmt. a (1959). A consent is binding on a consenting beneficiary although other beneficiaries have not consented. See Restatement (Second) of Trusts §216 cmt. g (1959). To constitute a valid consent, the beneficiary must know of the beneficiary's rights and of the material facts relating to the breach. See Restatement (Second) of Trusts §216 cmt. k (1959). If the beneficiary's approval involves a self-dealing transaction, the approval is binding only if the transaction was fair and reasonable. See Restatement (Second) of Trusts §§170(2), 216(3) and cmt. n (1959).

An approval by the settlor of a revocable trust or by the holder of a presently exercisable power of withdrawal binds all the beneficiaries. See Section 603 [72-38-603]. A beneficiary is also bound to the extent an approval is given by a person authorized to represent the beneficiary as provided in Article 3 [Title 72, ch. 38, pt.3].

2001 Amendment. By a 2001 amendment, the limitation of this section to beneficiaries "having capacity" was deleted. This limitation was included by mistake. As indicated in the second paragraph of the comment, the drafting committee did not intend to prohibit the use of the representation provisions of Article 3 [Title 72, ch. 38, pt. 3], several of which address representation of and the giving of a binding consent on behalf of an incapacitated beneficiary.

72-38-1010. Limitation on personal liability of trustee.

Official Comments

This section is based on Section 7-306 of the Uniform Probate Code. However, unlike the Uniform Probate Code, which requires that the contract both disclose the representative capacity and identify the trust, subsection (a) [72-38-1010(1)] protects a trustee who reveals the fiduciary relationship either by indicating a signature as trustee or by simply referring to the trust. The protection afforded the trustee by this section applies only to contracts that are properly entered into in the trustee's fiduciary capacity, meaning that the trustee is exercising an available power and is not violating a duty. This section does not excuse any liability the trustee may have for breach of trust.

Subsection (b) [72-38-1010(2)] addresses trustee liability arising from ownership or control of trust property and for torts occurring incident to the administration of the trust. Liability in such situations is imposed on the trustee personally only if the trustee was personally at fault, either intentionally or negligently. This is contrary to Restatement (Second) of Trusts §264 (1959), which imposes liability on a trustee regardless of fault, including liability for acts of agents under respondeat superior. Responding to a particular concern of trustees, subsection (b) [72-38-1010(2)] specifically protects a trustee from personal liability for violations of environmental law such as CERCLA (42 U.S.C. §9607) or its state law counterparts, unless the trustee was personally at fault. See also Sections 701(c)(2) [72-38-701(3)(b)] (nominated trustee may investigate trust property to determine potential violation of environmental law without having accepted trusteeship) and 816(13) [72-38-816(13)] (trustee powers with respect to possible liability for violation of environmental law).

Subsection (c) [72-38-1010(3)] alters the common law rule that a trustee could not be sued in a representative capacity if the trust estate was not liable.

Responsibility to Third Persons: The effect of 72-23-307 (now repealed), viewed in connection with 28-10-702, stating when the agent is responsible to third persons as a principal for his acts in the course of his agency, is either that the trust estate is to be considered an entity chargeable as a principal for the acts of the trustee, its agent, or that the legal incidents of the trustee's authorized acts, so far as the parties are concerned, are the same as those which would attach to an agent's authorized transactions for his principal. Suits Against Trustee in Representative Capacity to Enforce Claim Against Trust Property: A testator left residue of estate to bank in trust for support and maintenance of his daughter who became an invalid. Plaintiff's assignor furnished the requisite care and medical attention and, upon trustee bank's refusal to pay, brought suit at law on the theory of its personal liability, as distinguished from its liability as trustee. The District Court properly sustained a general demurrer (demurrer abolished, former Rule 7(c), now superseded, the remedy being against the trustee bank in its representative capacity to obtain a judgment enforceable against the trust property. 72-38-1011. Interest as general partner.

Official Comments

Section 1010 [72-38-1010] protects a trustee from personal liability on contracts that the trustee enters into on behalf of the trust. Section 1010 [72-38-1010] also absolves a trustee from liability for torts committed in administering the trust unless the trustee was personally at fault. It does not protect a trustee from personal liability for contracts entered into or torts committed by a general or limited partnership of which the trustee was a general partner. That is the purpose of this section, which is modeled after Ohio Revised Code §1339.65. Subsection (a) [72-38-1011(1)] protects the trustee from personal liability for such partnership obligations whether the trustee signed the contract or it was signed by another general partner. Subsection (b) [72-38-1011(2)] protects a trustee from personal liability for torts committed by the partnership unless the trustee was personally at fault. Protection from the partnership's contractual obligations is available under subsection (a) [72-38-1011(1)] only if the other party is on notice of the fiduciary relationship, either in the contract itself or in the partnership certificate on file.

Special protection is not needed for other business interests that the trustee may own, such as an interest as a limited partner, a membership interest in an LLC, or an interest as a corporate shareholder. In these cases the nature of the entity or the interest owned by the trustee carries with it its own limitation on liability.

Certain exceptions apply. The section is not intended to be used as a device for individuals or their families to shield assets from creditor claims. Consequently, subsection (c) [not adopted] excludes from the protections provided by this section trustees who own an interest in the partnership in another capacity or if an interest is owned by the trustee's spouse or the trustee's descendants, siblings, parents, or the spouse of any of them.

Nor can a revocable trust be used as a device for avoiding claims against the partnership. Subsection (d) [72-38-1011(3)] imposes personal liability on the settlor for partnership contracts and other obligations of the partnership the same as if the settlor were a general partner.

This section has been placed in brackets to alert enacting jurisdictions to consider modifying the section to conform it to the State's specific laws on partnerships and other forms of unincorporated businesses.

Source: This section modifies section 1011 of the Uniform Law Commission's Uniform Trust Code by adding language that using "trustee" or "as trustee" is a satisfactory disclosure of the fiduciary capacity in subsection (1) and by removing an exception that provides that immunity is not applicable if an interest in the partnership is held by the trustee in a capacity other than that of trustee or is held by one of the trustee's relatives.

72-38-1012. Protection of person dealing with trustee.

Official Comments

This section is derived from Section 7 of the Uniform Trustee Powers Act.

Subsection (a) [72-38-1012(1)] protects two different classes; persons other than beneficiaries who assist a trustee with a transaction, and persons other than beneficiaries who deal with the trustee for value. As long as the assistance was provided or the transaction was entered into in good faith and without knowledge, third persons in either category are protected in the transaction even if the trustee was exceeding or improperly exercising the power. For the definition of "know," see Section 104 [72-38-104]. This Code does not define "good faith" for purposes of this and the next section. Defining good faith with reference to the definition used in the State's commercial statutes would be consistent with the purpose of this section, which is to treat commercial transactions with trustees similar to other commercial transactions.

Subsection (b) [72-38-1012(2)] confirms that a third party who is acting in good faith is not charged with a duty to inquire into the extent of a trustee's powers or the propriety of their exercise. The third party may assume that the trustee has the necessary power. Consequently, there is no need to request or examine a copy of the trust instrument. A third party who wishes assurance that the trustee has the necessary authority instead should request a certification of trust as provided in Section 1013 [72-38-1013]. Subsection (b) [72-38-1012(2)], and the comparable provisions enacted in numerous States, are intended to negate the rule, followed by some courts, that a third party is charged with constructive notice of the trust instrument and its contents. The cases are collected in George G. Bogert & George T. Bogert, The Law of Trusts and Trustees §897 (Rev. 2d ed. 1995); and 4 Austin W. Scott & William F. Fratcher, The Law of Trusts §297 (4th ed. 1989).

Subsection (c) [72-38-1012(3)] protects any person, including a beneficiary, who in good faith delivers property to a trustee. The standard of protection in the Restatement is phrased differently although the result is similar. Under Restatement (Second) of Trusts §321 (1959), the person delivering property to a trustee is liable if at the time of the delivery the person had notice that the trustee was misapplying or intending to misapply the property.

Subsection (d) [72-38-1012(4)] extends the protections afforded by the section to assistance provided to or dealings for value with a former trustee. The third party is protected the same as if the former trustee still held the office.

Subsection (e) [72-38-1012(5)] clarifies that a statute relating to commercial transactions controls whenever both it and this section could apply to a transaction. Consequently, the protections provided by this section are superseded by comparable protective provisions of these other laws. The principal statutes in question are the various articles of the Uniform Commercial Code, including Article 8 on the transfer of securities, as well as the Uniform Simplification of Fiduciary Securities Transfer Act.

72-38-1013. Certification of trust.

Official Comments

This section, derived from California Probate Code §18100.5, is designed to protect the privacy of a trust instrument by discouraging requests from persons other than beneficiaries for complete copies of the instrument in order to verify a trustee's authority. Even absent this section, such requests are usually unnecessary. Pursuant to Section 1012(b) [72-38-1012(2)], a third person proceeding in good faith is not required to inquire into the extent of the trustee's powers or the propriety of their exercise. This section adds another layer of protection.

Third persons frequently insist on receiving a copy of the complete trust instrument solely to verify a specific and narrow authority of the trustee to engage in a particular transaction. While a testamentary trust, because it is created under a will, is a matter of public record, an inter vivos trust instrument is private. Such privacy is compromised, however, if the trust instrument must be distributed to third persons. A certification of trust is a document signed by a currently acting trustee that may include excerpts from the trust instrument necessary to facilitate the particular transaction. A certification provides the third party with an assurance of authority without having to disclose the trust's dispositive provisions. Nor is there a need for third persons who may already have a copy of the instrument to pry into its provisions. Persons acting in reliance on a certification may assume the truth of the certification even if they have a complete copy of the trust instrument in their possession.

Subsections (a) [72-38-1013(1)] through (c) [72-38-1013(3)] specify the required contents of a certification. Subsection (d) [72-38-1013(4)] clarifies that the certification need not include the trust's dispositive terms. A certification, however, normally will contain the administrative terms of the trust relevant to the transaction. Subsection (e) [72-38-1013(5)] provides that the third party may make this a condition of acceptance. Subsections (f) [72-38-1013(6)] and (g) [72-38-1013(7)] protect a third party who relies on the certification. The third party may assume that the certification is true, and is not charged with constructive knowledge of the terms of the trust instrument even if the third party has a copy.

To encourage compliance with this section, a person demanding a trust instrument after already being offered a certification may be liable under subsection (h) [72-38-1013(8)] for damages if the refusal to accept the certification is determined not to have been in good faith. A person acting in good faith would include a person required to examine a complete copy of the trust instrument pursuant to due diligence standards or as required by other law. Examples of such due diligence and legal requirements include (1) in connection with transactions to be executed in the capital markets where documentary standards have been established in connection with underwriting concerns; (2) to satisfy documentary requirements established by state or local government or regulatory agency; (3) to satisfy documentary requirements established by a state or local government or regulatory agency; and (4) where the insurance rates or premiums or other expenses of the party would be higher absent the availability of the documentation.

The Uniform Trust Code leaves to other law the issue of how damages for a bad faith refusal are to be computed and whether attorney's fees might be recoverable. For a discussion of the meaning of "good faith," see Section 1012 [72-38-1012] Comment.

Miscellaneous Provisions

Part Official Comments

Comment

Section 1105 of the Uniform Trust Code was not adopted and the Official Comment to Section 1105 is included here:

For the reasons why the above Uniform Acts should be repealed upon enactment of the Uniform Trust Code, see the Prefatory Note. Enacting jurisdictions that have not enacted one or more of the specified Uniform Acts should repeal their comparable legislation. Because of the comprehensive scope of the Uniform Trust Code, many States will have trust provisions not based on any Uniform Act that will need to be repealed upon enactment of this Code. This section does not attempt to list the types of conforming amendments, whether in the enacting State's probate code or elsewhere, that need to be made upon enactment of this Code.

Comment

Section 1106 of the Uniform Trust Code was not adopted and the Official Comment to Section 1106 is included here:

The Uniform Trust Code is intended to have the widest possible effect within constitutional limitations. Specifically, the Code applies to all trusts whenever created, to judicial proceedings concerning trusts commenced on or after its effective date, and unless the court otherwise orders, to judicial proceedings in progress on the effective date. In addition, any rules of construction or presumption provided in the Code apply to preexisting trusts unless there is a clear indication of a contrary intent in the trust's terms. By applying the Code to preexisting trusts, the need to know two bodies of law will quickly lessen.

This Code cannot be fully retroactive, however. Constitutional limitations preclude retroactive application of rules of construction to alter property rights under trusts that became irrevocable prior to the effective date. Also, rights already barred by a statute of limitation or rule under former law are not revived by a possibly longer statute or more liberal rule under this Code. Nor is an act done before the effective date of the Code affected by the Code's enactment.

The Uniform Trust Code contains an additional effective date provision. Pursuant to Section 602(a) [72-38-602(1)], prior law will determine whether a trust executed prior to the effective date of the Code is presumed to be revocable or irrevocable.

For a comparable uniform law effective date provision, see Uniform Probate Code §8-101.

72-38-1102. Electronic records and signatures.

Official Comments

This section, which is being inserted in all Uniform Acts approved in 2000 or later, preempts the federal Electronic Signatures in Global and National Commerce Act. Section 102(a)(2)(B) of that Act provides that the federal law can be preempted by a later statute of the State that specifically refers to the federal law. The effect of this section, when enacted as part of this Code, is to leave to state law the procedures for obtaining and validating an electronic signature. The Uniform Trust Code does not require that any document be in paper form, allowing all documents under this Code to be transmitted in electronic form. A properly directed electronic message is a valid method of notice under the Code as long as it is reasonably suitable under the circumstances and likely to result in receipt of the notice or document. See Section 109(a) [72-38-109(1)].

72-38-1111. Effects on real property transactions.

Official Comments

This section is new [in 1989], but to a great extent codifies existing law and practice, including former M.C.A. sections 72-24-201 and 72-24-209 (1987). It also makes clear that the protection of a bona fide purchaser in the conveyance of real property has no direct effect upon the existence of a trust or the rights and remedies of those interested in the trust, as among themselves. It also makes clear that the simple designation of a grantee in a conveyance, as a trustee, with nothing more, is sufficient for conveyancing purposes and title standards, but may not be sufficient alone to create a valid trust under Title 72, Chapter 33, Part 2 [now repealed] (particularly section 16 [72-33-208, now repealed, see 72-38-407]) of this code [T. 72, chapter 38].

2013 Amendment: Chapter 264 in (1) and (2) in two places substituted "Title 72, chapter 38" for references to Title 72, chapters 33 through 36. Amendment effective October 1, 2013.

2009 Amendment: Chapter 56 made section gender neutral; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective October 1, 2009.

1993 Amendment: Chapter 494 at end of (1) deleted "This section does not affect conveyances recorded prior to October 1, 1989"; and made minor changes in style.

Retroactive Applicability: Section 135, Ch. 494, L. 1993, provided: "The amendment to 72-36-206(1) applies retroactively, within the meaning of 1-2-109, to conveyances recorded on or before October 1, 1989. The amendment also applies to conveyances recorded after October 1, 1989."

Saving Clause: Section 136, Ch. 494, L. 1993, was a saving clause.

1991 Amendment: Inserted (8) clarifying that the designation of a trust in a conveyance vests the estate in the trustee. Amendment effective April 27, 1991.

Case Notes

No Legal Interest or Equitable Estate in Trust Property by Beneficiaries of Express Trust: Four siblings were to receive their father's trust property upon their mother's death. One daughter predeceased the mother, and her husband entered into an agreement with the remaining siblings that he would receive the share of the daughter. The husband then established a trust, conveying his future share by grant deed to a third party. The husband then predeceased the mother, and the third party claimed his portion. The District Court held that only the three remaining siblings had an interest in the trust property, and the third party appealed. The Supreme Court affirmed, holding that under the plain and unambiguous language of this section, the beneficiaries of the express trust did not have either a legal or an equitable estate of interest in the trust property; instead, they would only be allowed to enforce the performance of the trust. Because the remainder beneficiaries, including the husband, did not have an estate or interest in the trust property, there was no interest that could be transferred to another trust and then to a third party. Further, the siblings' claim that the third party did not acquire an interest was not barred by judicial admissions, collateral estoppel, res judicata, or judicial estoppel. (Case decided under 72-24-201, now repealed and replaced by this section.) In re George Trust, 1999 MT 223, 296 M 56, 986 P2d 427, 56 St. Rep. 879 (1999), distinguishing Cascade v. Initiative Banning Cyanide Mining — Reverse Condemnation Against State Not Justiciable in Federal Court: Initiative Measure No. 137, codified as 82-4-390, which banned the use of open-pit mining using cyanide leaching except as to mines operating with existing permits, could not be the basis of a reverse condemnation action in federal court because such an action is jurisdictionally barred by the 11th amendment to the U.S. Constitution. Eleventh amendment immunity cannot be avoided by the application of Ex parte Young, 209 US 123 (1908), since a reverse condemnation action is a form of retroactive relief and not a claim for prospective relief. Seven Up Pete Venture v. Schweitzer, 523 F3d 948 (9th Cir. 2008).

Eleventh Amendment Immunity as Preventing Federal Court Enforcement of MEPA and NEPA Against State or State Agency: The Fund for Animals, Inc., sued the state and the Department of Fish, Wildlife, and Parks, alleging violations of the National Environmental Policy Act of 1969 and the Montana Environmental Policy Act in the failure of the Department to prepare an environmental impact statement before adopting a plan to kill bison leaving Yellowstone National Park to wander into the state. The Ninth Circuit Court of Appeals held that the 11th amendment bars the U.S. courts from entertaining challenges against state officials brought under state law and also bars the same courts from hearing suits brought directly against the state or one of its agencies for violation of a federal law unless the state has consented to suit. The court held that nothing in the record showed that Montana had waived its 11th amendment immunity by consenting to be sued in federal court. Fund for Animals, Inc. v. Lujan, 962 F2d 1391 (9th Cir. 1992).

Federal Law Applied to Road Building and Logging in National Forest: The U.S. District Court discussed the applicability of federal law to road building and logging activities in certain portions of Beaverhead National Forest. The case examined long-range management guidance, environmental assessments, environmental impact statements, the effects of a finding of no significant impact, and regeneration of timber sale areas as affected by the 1978 Beaverhead National Forest Land Management Plan, the Roadless Area Review Evaluation (RARE II), the Montana Wilderness Study Act of 1977, the National Environmental Policy Act, the National Forest Management Act of 1976, and the Multiple-Use Sustained-Yield Act of 1960. requires a hearing in a preliminary environmental review. Titeca v. St., 194 M 209, 634 P2d 1156, 38 St. Rep. 1533 (1981).

MEPA Mandate Superseded: In an action for declaratory and injunctive relief against a proposed subdivision development in which plaintiffs alleged that the Environmental Impact Statement (EIS) issued by the Department of Health and Environmental Sciences (now Department of Environmental Quality) pursuant to the Montana Environmental Policy Act (MEPA) was defective, the Supreme Court held that the legislative intent of the Sanitation in Subdivisions Act was to place control of the decisionmaking process with local governments. This was held to preclude any state level attempt to exercise authority over subdivisions except where explicitly required under the Sanitation in Subdivisions Act. Mont. Wilderness Ass'n v. Bd. of Health & Environmental Sciences, 171 M 477, 559 P2d 1157 (1976). (Mr. Chief Justice Haswell dissenting, MEPA imposes a supplementary responsibility to consider environmental factors not explicitly enumerated in existing permit granting statutes.)

2003 Amendment: Chapter 361 inserted (1) relating to constitutional obligations and legislative intent; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective April 16, 2003.

Preamble: The preamble attached to Ch. 361, L. 2003, provided: "WHEREAS, Article II, section 3, of the Montana Constitution enumerates certain inalienable individual rights, including the right to a clean and healthful environment, the right of pursuing life's basic necessities, the right of enjoying and defending an individual's life and liberty, the right of acquiring, possessing, and protecting property, and the right of seeking individual safety, health, and happiness in all lawful ways; and

WHEREAS, the constitutionally enumerated rights are by their very nature bound to result in competing interests in specific fact situations; and

WHEREAS, Article IX, section 1, of the Montana Constitution provides that the state and each person shall maintain and improve a clean and healthful environment in Montana for present and future generations and directs the Legislature to provide for the administration and enforcement of this duty and also directs the Legislature to provide adequate remedies for the protection of the environmental life support system from degradation and to provide adequate remedies to prevent unreasonable depletion and degradation of natural resources; and

WHEREAS, the Legislature has reviewed the intent of the framers of the 1972 Montana Constitution as evidenced in the verbatim transcripts of the constitutional convention; and

WHEREAS, there is no indication that one enumerated inalienable right is intended to supersede other inalienable rights, including the right to use property in all lawful means; and

WHEREAS, the Legislature, mindful of its constitutional obligation to provide for the administration and enforcement of the constitution, has enacted a comprehensive set of laws to accomplish the goals of the constitution, including the Montana Clean Indoor Air Act of 1979, Title 50, chapter 40, part 1, MCA; the Montana Environmental Policy Act, Title 75, chapter 1, parts 1 through 3, MCA; the Clean Air Act of Montana, Title 75, chapter 2, parts 1 through 4, MCA; water quality laws, Title 75, chapter 5, MCA; The Natural Streambed and Land Preservation Act of 1975, Title 75, chapter 7, part 1, MCA; The Montana Solid Waste Management Act, Title 75, chapter 10, part 2, MCA; The Montana Hazardous Waste Act, Title 75, chapter 10, part 4, MCA; the Comprehensive Environmental Cleanup and Responsibility Act, Title 75, chapter 10, part 7, MCA; the Montana Megalandfill Siting Act, sections 75-10-901 through 75-10-945, MCA; the Montana Underground Storage Tank Installer and Inspector Licensing and Permitting Act, Title 75, chapter 11, part 2, MCA; the Montana Underground Storage Tank Act, Title 75, chapter 11, part 5, MCA; the Montana Major Facility Siting Act, Title 75, chapter 20, MCA; the Open-Space Land and Voluntary Conservation Easement Act, Title 76, chapter 6, MCA; the Environmental Control Easement Act, Title 76, chapter 7, MCA; The Strip and Underground Mine Siting Act, Title 82, chapter 4, part 1, MCA; The Montana Strip and Underground Mine Reclamation Act, Title 82, chapter 4, part 2, MCA; The Opencut Mining Act, Title 82, chapter 4, part 4, MCA; and The Nongame and Endangered Species Conservation Act, Title 87, chapter 5, part 1, MCA."

Severability: Section 39, Ch. 361, L. 2003, was a severability clause.

Retroactive Applicability: Section 41, Ch. 361, L. 2003, provided: "[This act] applies retroactively, within the meaning of 1-2-109, to actions for judicial review or other causes of action challenging the issuance of a permit, petition for review, amendment, license, arbitration, action, certificate, or inspection that are pending but not yet decided on or after [the effective date of this act]." Effective April 16, 2003.

1995 Amendment: Chapter 352 near beginning, after "environment", inserted "to protect the right to use and enjoy private property free of undue government regulation"; and made minor changes in style.

1995 Statement of Intent: The statement of intent attached to Ch. 352, L. 1995, provided: "Whenever Montana Environmental Policy Act analysis is required, it is the intent of the legislature that actions that regulate the use of private property are evaluated to ensure that alternatives that reduce, minimize, or eliminate regulatory restrictions are considered. It is not the intent of the legislature to affect in any manner other economic or social considerations or any other analysis conducted under the Montana Environmental Policy Act."

Case Notes

Allowance of Change in Grazing Permit Not Ministerial Act — EIS Required: Shoberg transferred his grazing permit to Madden, and Madden changed from grazing cattle to grazing sheep. The Department of State Lands (now Department of Natural Resources and Conservation) allowed the grazing of sheep to continue, notwithstanding that the Department had information indicating that the grazing of sheep would adversely impact upon bighorn sheep reintroduced into the area. The plaintiffs brought an action to require the completion of an environmental impact statement (EIS). The Supreme Court held that an EIS was required because the Department was allowing an action, grazing of sheep, to go forward that could have a significant effect upon the quality of the human environment, notwithstanding statutes requiring the Department to protect the best interests of the state, including consideration of consequences to environment and wildlife. Ravalli County Fish & Game Ass'n, Inc. v. Dept. of State Lands, 273 M 371, 903 P2d 1362, 52 St. Rep. 996 (1995).

Maximization of Income From School Trust Lands Not to Preclude Nonagricultural Uses: Shoberg transferred his grazing permit to Madden, and Madden changed from grazing cattle to grazing sheep. The plaintiffs brought an action to require the completion of an environmental impact statement (EIS). The Supreme Court held that an EIS was required and that the Department's duty to maximize income from school trust lands did not exempt the Department from its obligation to comply with state environmental statutes. The Supreme Court also held that maximizing income is "a" consideration but not "the" consideration regarding school trust lands and is not paramount to the exclusion of wildlife or environmental considerations. WHEREAS, the Legislature, mindful of its constitutional obligation to provide for the administration and enforcement of the constitution, has enacted a comprehensive set of laws to accomplish the goals of the constitution, including the Montana Clean Indoor Air Act of 1979, Title 50, chapter 40, part 1, MCA; the Montana Environmental Policy Act, Title 75, chapter 1, parts 1 through 3, MCA; the Clean Air Act of Montana, Title 75, chapter 2, parts 1 through 4, MCA; water quality laws, Title 75, chapter 5, MCA; The Natural Streambed and Land Preservation Act of 1975, Title 75, chapter 7, part 1, MCA; The Montana Solid Waste Management Act, Title 75, chapter 10, part 2, MCA; The Montana Hazardous Waste Act, Title 75, chapter 10, part 4, MCA; the Comprehensive Environmental Cleanup and Responsibility Act, Title 75, chapter 10, part 7, MCA; the Montana Megalandfill Siting Act, sections 75-10-901 through 75-10-945, MCA; the Montana Underground Storage Tank Installer and Inspector Licensing and Permitting Act, Title 75, chapter 11, part 2, MCA; the Montana Underground Storage Tank Act, Title 75, chapter 11, part 5, MCA; the Montana Major Facility Siting Act, Title 75, chapter 20, MCA; the Open-Space Land and Voluntary Conservation Easement Act, Title 76, chapter 6, MCA; the Environmental Control Easement Act, Title 76, chapter 7, MCA; The Strip and Underground Mine Siting Act, Title 82, chapter 4, part 1, MCA; The Montana Strip and Underground Mine Reclamation Act, Title 82, chapter 4, part 2, MCA; The Opencut Mining Act, Title 82, chapter 4, part 4, MCA; and The Nongame and Endangered Species Conservation Act, Title 87, chapter 5, part 1, MCA."

Severability: Section 39, Ch. 361, L. 2003, was a severability clause.

Retroactive Applicability: Section 41, Ch. 361, L. 2003, provided: "[This act] applies retroactively, within the meaning of 1-2-109, to actions for judicial review or other causes of action challenging the issuance of a permit, petition for review, amendment, license, arbitration, action, certificate, or inspection that are pending but not yet decided on or after [the effective date of this act]." Effective April 16, 2003.

1995 Amendment: Chapter 352 in (1), near middle after "development", inserted "and further recognizing that governmental regulation may unnecessarily restrict the use and enjoyment of private property" and near end, after "harmony", inserted "to recognize the right to use and enjoy private property free of undue government regulation"; inserted (2)(d) regarding the right to use and enjoy private property free of undue government regulation; in (3), near middle after "healthful environment", inserted "that each person is entitled to use and enjoy that person's private property free of undue government regulation"; and made minor changes in style.

1995 Statement of Intent: The statement of intent attached to Ch. 352, L. 1995, provided: "Whenever Montana Environmental Policy Act analysis is required, it is the intent of the legislature that actions that regulate the use of private property are evaluated to ensure that alternatives that reduce, minimize, or eliminate regulatory restrictions are considered. It is not the intent of the legislature to affect in any manner other economic or social considerations or any other analysis conducted under the Montana Environmental Policy Act."

Case Notes

Maximization of Income From School Trust Lands Not to Preclude Nonagricultural Uses: Shoberg transferred his grazing permit to Madden, and Madden changed from grazing cattle to grazing sheep. The Department of State Lands (now Department of Natural Resources and Conservation) allowed the grazing of sheep to continue, notwithstanding that the Department had information indicating that the grazing of sheep would adversely impact upon bighorn sheep reintroduced into the area. The plaintiffs brought an action to require the completion of an environmental impact statement (EIS). The Supreme Court held that an EIS was required and that the Department's duty to maximize income from school trust lands did not exempt the Department from its obligation to comply with state environmental statutes. The Supreme Court also held that maximizing income is "a" consideration but not "the" consideration regarding school trust lands and is not paramount to the exclusion of wildlife or environmental considerations. Case Notes

No Violation of Clear Legal Duty to Consult With County Under MEPA — Writ of Mandamus and Injunction Improper — Action Against DEQ Dismissed: After an exchange of information between the Department of Environmental Quality (DEQ) and Jefferson County about the Mountain States Transmission Intertie (MSTI), a proposed electric transmission line that would transect Jefferson County, the county filed a petition for a writ of mandamus and injunctive relief seeking to compel DEQ to satisfy its legal duty under the Montana Environmental Protection Act (MEPA) to consult with local government prior to issuing a draft Environmental Impact Statement (EIS) and to enjoin DEQ from issuing the draft EIS until after it had complied with its duty to consult. After a series of evidentiary hearings, the District Court concluded that DEQ had not satisfied its duty to consult with the county under MEPA and enjoined it from issuing a draft EIS on the MSTI project until DEQ had more thoroughly consulted with the county, and DEQ appealed. The Supreme Court concluded that the District Court had erred in issuing a writ of mandamus to compel DEQ to more thoroughly consult with the county because MEPA does not establish a clear legal duty for DEQ to consult with a local government to any specified degree. It also ruled that the writ of mandamus was improper because the county had other remedies available to it once DEQ rendered a final decision on the project. Because neither MEPA nor related regulations define the word "consult," DEQ is afforded some discretion in determining the extent to which it consults with a local government under 75-1-104. Because MEPA allows for some discretion on the part of DEQ on how to consult with local government, the Supreme Court held the requirement to consult was not ministerial and therefore did not establish a clear legal duty under MEPA. Accordingly, the Supreme Court remanded the matter to the District Court with instructions to dismiss without prejudice. Jefferson County v. Dept. of Environmental Quality, 2011 MT 265, 362 Mont. 311, 264 P.3d 715.

MEPA Mandate Superseded: In an action for declaratory and injunctive relief against a proposed subdivision development in which plaintiffs alleged that the Environmental Impact Statement (EIS) issued by the Department of Health and Environmental Sciences (now Department of Environmental Quality) pursuant to the Montana Environmental Policy Act (MEPA) was defective, the Supreme Court held that the legislative intent of the Sanitation in Subdivisions Act was to place control of the decisionmaking process with local governments. This was held to preclude any state level attempt to exercise authority over subdivisions except where explicitly required under the Sanitation in Subdivisions Act. Mont. Wilderness Ass'n v. Bd. of Health & Environmental Sciences, 171 M 477, 559 P2d 1157 (1976). (Mr. Chief Justice Haswell dissenting, MEPA imposes a supplementary responsibility to consider environmental factors not explicitly enumerated in existing permit-granting statutes.)

2011 Amendment: Chapter 396 in (1)(b) inserted reference to (3); in (1)(b)(i)(A) inserted "for a state-sponsored project", "Montana", and "by projects in Montana"; in (1)(b)(ii) inserted "for state-sponsored projects"; in (1)(b)(iii) and (1)(b)(iv) inserted "in Montana"; in (1)(b)(iv)(B) substituted "effects on Montana's environment" for "environmental effects"; deleted former (1)(b)(iv)(C)(III) that read: "if the project sponsor believes that an alternative is not reasonable as provided in subsection (1)(b)(iv)(C)(I), the project sponsor may request a review by the appropriate board, if any, of the agency's determination regarding the reasonableness of the alternative. The appropriate board may, at its discretion, submit an advisory recommendation to the agency regarding the issue. The agency may not charge the project sponsor for any of its activities associated with any review under this section. The period of time between the request for a review and completion of a review under this subsection may not be included for the purposes of determining compliance with the time limits established for environmental review in 75-1-208"; in (1)(b)(v) inserted second and third sentences regarding alternatives analysis; in (1)(b)(vi) substituted "potential" for "national and", substituted "impacts in Montana" for "problems", after "maximize" deleted "national", and substituted "Montana's" for "the world"; in (1)(b)(vii) substituted "Montana's environment" for "the environment"; in (1)(b)(ix) inserted "legislature and the"; in (1)(c) in three places inserted reference to Montana; inserted (2) regarding environmental review; deleted former (3) and (4) that read: "(3) (a) In any action challenging or seeking review of an agency's decision that a statement pursuant to subsection (1)(b)(iv) is not required or that the statement is inadequate, the burden of proof is on the person challenging the decision. Except as provided in subsection (3)(b), in a challenge to the adequacy of a statement, a court may not consider any issue relating to the adequacy or content of the agency's environmental review document or evidence that was not first presented to the agency for the agency's consideration prior to the agency's decision. A court may not set aside the agency's decision unless it finds that there is clear and convincing evidence that the decision was arbitrary or capricious or not in compliance with law. A customer fiscal impact analysis pursuant to 69-2-216 or an allegation that the customer fiscal impact analysis is inadequate may not be used as the basis of any action challenging or seeking review of the agency's decision.

(b) When new, material, and significant evidence or issues relating to the adequacy or content of the agency's environmental review document are presented to the district court that had not previously been presented to the agency for its consideration, the district court shall remand the new evidence or issue relating to the adequacy or content of the agency's environmental review document back to the agency for the agency's consideration and an opportunity to modify its findings of fact and administrative decision before the district court considers the evidence or issue relating to the adequacy or content of the agency's environmental review document within the administrative record under review. Immaterial or insignificant evidence or issues relating to the adequacy or content of the agency's environmental review document may not be remanded to the agency. The district court shall review the agency's findings and decision to determine whether they are supported by substantial, credible evidence within the administrative record under review.

(4) To the extent that the requirements of subsections (1)(b)(iv)(C)(I) and (1)(b)(iv)(C)(III) are inconsistent with federal requirements, the requirements of subsections (1)(b)(iv)(C)(I) and (1)(b)(iv)(C)(III) do not apply to an environmental review that is being prepared by a state agency pursuant to this part and a federal agency pursuant to the National Environmental Policy Act or to an environmental review that is being prepared by a state agency to comply with the requirements of the National Environmental Policy Act"; inserted (6) regarding judicial remedies in legal action alleging noncompliance; inserted (7) regarding inconsistency with National Environmental Policy Act; and made minor changes in style. Amendment to temporary version effective May 12, 2011, and amendment to contingent version effective on occurrence of contingency.

The amendments to this section made by sec. 2, Ch. 396, L. 2011, were rendered void by sec. 6, Ch. 396, L. 2011, a coordination instruction.

Severability: Section 8, Ch. 396, L. 2011, was a severability clause.

Chapter 131 in (1)(c) at end of first sentence inserted "and with any local government, as defined in 7-12-1103, that may be directly impacted by the project". Amendment effective March 26, 2003.

Applicability: Section 4, Ch. 131, L. 2003, provided: "[This act] applies to environmental impact statements commenced on or after [the effective date of this act]." Effective March 26, 2003.

2001 Amendments — Composite Section: Chapter 186 in (3)(a) in second sentence near middle after "may not consider any issue" inserted "relating to the adequacy or content of the agency's environment review document"; in (3)(b) in four places inserted references to issues relating to the adequacy or content of the agency's environmental review document; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective October 1, 2001.

Chapter 267 inserted (1)(b)(i)(B) providing that all state agencies, with exceptions, must to the fullest extent possible use a systematic, interdisciplinary approach that ensures that an environmental review that is not subject to subsection (1)(b)(iv) for which an agency considers alternatives has an alternative analysis in compliance with subsections (1)(b)(iv)(C)(I) through (1)(b)(iv)(C)(III) and, if requested by the project sponsor or if determined by the agency to be necessary, subsection (1)(b)(iv)(C)(IV); in (1)(b)(iv)(C) inserted "An analysis of any alternative included in the environmental review must comply with the following criteria:

(I) any alternative proposed must be reasonable, in that the alternative must be achievable under current technology and the alternative must be economically feasible as determined solely by the economic viability for similar projects having similar conditions and physical locations and determined without regard to the economic strength of the specific project sponsor;

(II) the agency proposing the alternative shall consult with the project sponsor regarding any proposed alternative, and the agency shall give due weight and consideration to the project sponsor's comments regarding the proposed alternative;

(III) if the project sponsor believes that an alternative is not reasonable as provided in subsection (1)(b)(iv)(C)(I), the project sponsor may request a review by the appropriate board, if any, of the agency's determination regarding the reasonableness of the alternative. The appropriate board may, at its discretion, submit an advisory recommendation to the agency regarding the issue. The agency may not charge the project sponsor for any of its activities associated with any review under this section. The period of time between the request for a review and completion of a review under this subsection may not be included for the purposes of determining compliance with the time limits established for environmental review in 75-1-208.

(IV) the agency shall complete a meaningful no-action alternative analysis. The no-action alternative analysis must include the projected beneficial and adverse environmental, social, and economic impact of the project's noncompletion"; inserted (1)(b)(iv)(G) relating to "the details of the beneficial aspects of the proposed project, both short-term and long-term, and the economic advantages and disadvantages of the proposal"; at beginning of (1)(b)(v) inserted "in accordance with the criteria set forth in subsection (1)(b)(iv)(C)"; inserted (4) providing: "To the extent that the requirements of subsections (1)(b)(iv)(C)(I) and (1)(b)(iv)(C)(III) are inconsistent with federal requirements, the requirements of subsections (1)(b)(iv)(C)(I) and (1)(b)(iv)(C)(III) do not apply to an environmental review that is being prepared by a state agency pursuant to this part and a federal agency pursuant to the National Environmental Policy Act or to an environmental review that is being prepared by a state agency to comply with the requirements of the National Environmental Policy Act"; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective October 1, 2001.

Chapter 268 inserted (5) providing that the agency may not withhold, deny, or impose conditions on a permit or other authority to act based on parts 1 through 3 of this chapter, that subsection (5) does not prevent a project sponsor and an agency from mutually developing measures that may, at the request of the project sponsor, be incorporated into a permit or other authority to act, and that parts 1 through 3 of this chapter do not confer authority to an agency that is a project sponsor to modify a proposed project or action. Amendment effective April 20, 2001.

Chapter 299 in (1)(b) at beginning inserted "under this part"; inserted (6) providing that challenge to agency action may be brought only against final agency action in district or federal court, requiring action alleging failure to comply with part 2 to be brought within 60 days, and requiring action or proceeding to take precedence over other cases in district court; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective October 1, 2001.

Chapter 300 inserted (7) requiring responsible agency directors to endorse determination or recommendation for determination of significance; and inserted (8) authorizing a project sponsor to request a review of a significance determination, allowing a board to submit an advisory recommendation, and establishing that time for the review may not be included in determining compliance with time limits for environmental reviews. Amendment effective April 20, 2001.

Applicability: Section 16, Ch. 299, L. 2001, provided: "[This act] applies to environmental reviews that are begun after [the effective date of this act]." Effective October 1, 2001.

1999 Amendment: Chapter 223 inserted (1)(d) exempting transfer of ownership interest from review if no material change in terms or conditions; in (3)(a) near middle of first sentence inserted "or that the statement is inadequate" and inserted second sentence limiting court's review to issues or evidence presented to agency; inserted (3)(b) requiring new, material, and significant evidence to be remanded by court for agency consideration; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective April 1, 1999.

Retroactive Applicability: Section 5, Ch. 223, L. 1999, provided: "[This act] applies retroactively, within the meaning of 1-2-109, to all matters pending before an agency on [the effective date of this act]." Effective April 1, 1999.

1995 Amendments: Chapters 331, 352, 418, and 545 deleted former (3) that read: "(3) (a) Until the board of oil and gas conservation adopts a programmatic environmental statement, but no later than December 31, 1989, the issuance of a permit to drill a well for oil or gas is not a major action of state government as that term is used in subsection (1)(b)(iii).

(b) The board of oil and gas conservation shall adopt a programmatic statement by December 31, 1989, that must include but not be limited to:

(i) such environmental impacts as may be found to be associated with the drilling for and production of oil and gas in the major producing basins and ecosystems in Montana;

(ii) such methods of accomplishing drilling and production of oil and gas as may be found to be necessary to avoid permanent impairment of the environment or to mitigate long-term impacts so that the environment and renewable resources of the ecosystem may be returned to either conditions similar to those existing before drilling or production occurs or conditions that reflect a natural progression of environmental change;

(iii) the process that will be employed by the board of oil and gas conservation to evaluate such environmental impacts of individual drilling proposals as may be found to exist;

(iv) an appropriate method for incorporating such environmental review as may be found to be necessary into the board's rules and drill permitting process and for accomplishing the review in an expedient manner;

(v) the maximum time periods that will be required to complete the drill permitting process, including any environmental review; and

(vi) a record of information and analysis for the board of oil and gas conservation to rely upon in responding to public and private concerns about drilling and production.

(c) The governor shall direct and have management responsibility for the preparation of the programmatic statement, including responsibility on behalf of the board of oil and gas conservation for the disbursement and expenditure of funds necessary to complete the statement. The facilities and personnel of appropriate state agencies must be used to the extent the governor deems necessary to complete the statement. The governor shall forward the completed draft programmatic statement to the board of oil and gas conservation for hearing pursuant to the provisions of the Montana Administrative Procedure Act, Title 2, chapter 4. Following completion of a final programmatic statement, the governor shall forward the statement to the board for adoption and use in the issuance of permits to drill for oil and gas.

(d) Until the programmatic environmental statement is adopted, the board of oil and gas conservation shall prepare a written progress report after each regular meeting of the board and after any special board meeting that addresses the adoption or implementation of the programmatic environmental statement. A copy of each report must be sent to the environmental quality council."

Chapter 331 in (1)(b), after "except", inserted "the legislature and except"; in (1)(b)(iv), after "programs", deleted "legislation"; inserted (3) establishing burden of proof in action challenging agency decision that environmental impact statement is not required; and made minor changes in style.

Chapter 352 inserted (1)(b)(iii) requiring the identification and development of methods to ensure that state government actions that may impact the human environment are evaluated for regulatory restrictions on private property; inserted (1)(b)(iv)(D) requiring that regulatory impacts on property rights be included in every recommendation or report on proposals for major actions of state government involving regulation of private property; in (1)(c) inserted second sentence requiring consultation with regard to the regulation of private property; adjusted subsection references; and made minor changes in style.

Chapter 418 made minor changes in style. Amendment effective July 1, 1995.

Chapter 545 made minor changes in style. Amendment effective July 1, 1995.

1995 Statement of Intent: The statement of intent attached to Ch. 352, L. 1995, provided: "Whenever Montana Environmental Policy Act analysis is required, it is the intent of the legislature that actions that regulate the use of private property are evaluated to ensure that alternatives that reduce, minimize, or eliminate regulatory restrictions are considered. It is not the intent of the legislature to affect in any manner other economic or social considerations or any other analysis conducted under the Montana Environmental Policy Act."

Transition: Section 499, Ch. 418, L. 1995, provided: "The provisions of 2-15-131 through 2-15-137 apply to [this act]."

1995 Transition: Section 81, Ch. 545, L. 1995, provided: "(1) The members of the legislative council, as provided in 5-11-101, the members of the legislative finance committee, as provided in 5-12-202, the members of the legislative audit committee, as provided in 5-13-202, and the members of the environmental quality council, as provided in 5-16-101, must be appointed as soon as possible following [the effective date of this section] [effective April 27, 1995].

(2) To implement the changes provided in [this act], the office of the legislative council, the office of budget and program planning, and the department of administration shall establish all necessary authorizations during the accounting preparation process known as the "turnaround" process, beginning in April or May 1995, to administer the several appropriations made by any means to programs of the legislative branch agencies consolidated under [sections 3 and 4] [5-2-503 and 5-2-504] for fiscal year 1996 or 1997 or the biennium ending June 30, 1997, as appropriations to a single legislative agency while maintaining the specific identification, legislative intent, and purpose for which the appropriations were made. During this transition, the executive director may authenticate documents as required to accomplish the purposes of [this act]. Appropriate changes on the statewide budgeting and accounting system and the payroll, personnel, and position control system must also be made and authorized as required to accomplish the purposes of [this act].

(3) Personnel and property of the environmental quality council are transferred to the legislative services division effective July 1, 1995."

1989 Amendment: In (3)(a) and (3)(b) substituted "December 31, 1989" for "June 30, 1989"; and inserted (3)(d) relating to reporting requirements concerning programmatic environmental statements not yet adopted.

1987 Amendment: Inserted (3) providing that until June 30, 1989, the issuance of a permit to drill for oil and gas is not a major action requiring an environmental impact review until the Board adopts a programmatic environmental statement.

Case Notes

Leasing State Land Mineral Interests Without Environmental Review — No Violation of Right to Clean and Healthful Environment: Plaintiffs sought declaratory rulings that the State Land Board wrongfully failed to conduct environmental studies required by the Montana Constitution prior to entering leases with the coal company. Section 77-1-121(2) expressly exempts the State Land Board from conducting any environmental review under the Montana Environmental Policy Act (MEPA) prior to issuing a lease as long as the lease is subject to further state permitting regulations. The Supreme Court held that because the leases did not remove any action by the coal company from environmental review or regulation provided by Montana law, such environmental review was only deferred from the leasing stage to the permitting stage. The terms of the leases required the coal company to comply with all applicable state and federal laws and specifically with Montana laws regarding mine siting and reclamation as well as with the provisions of MEPA. Because the leases themselves did not allow for any degradation of the environment, the act of issuing the leases without environmental review under 77-1-121(2), did not violate Article II, section 3, or Article IX, section 1, 2, or 3, of the Montana Constitution. N. Plains Resource Council v. Mont. Bd. of Land Comm'rs, 2012 MT 234, 366 Mont. 399, 288 P.3d 169.

Environmental Assessment Adequate — Environmental Impact Statement Not Required: Plaintiffs appealed the Board of Oil and Gas Conservation's issuance of 23 gas well permits, arguing that the environmental assessments (EAs) prepared by the Board were inadequate because the Board failed to take a "hard look" at the environmental impacts and to "tier" or explicitly reference previous analyses relied upon in the EAs and that the Board was required to prepare an environmental impact statement. The Supreme Court affirmed, concluding that because the Board implicitly tiered the EAs to older analyses and considered cumulative impacts, the EAs were adequate and that the drilling of the wells in an existing field of over 1,000, with most infrastructure in place and minimum anticipated impacts, did not constitute a major state action necessitating an environmental impact statement. Mont. Wildlife Fed'n v. Bd. of Oil & Gas Conserv., 2012 MT 128, 365 Mont. 232, 280 P.3d 877.

Review of MEPA Case Proper: Plaintiffs appealed the District Court's application of 82-11-144 to a review, for compliance with the Montana Environmental Policy Act (MEPA), of the Board of Oil and Gas Conservation's issuance of gas well permits, arguing that 82-11-144 does not apply to a MEPA claim and that, in accordance with 75-1-201, the court should not have considered evidence outside of the administrative record. The Supreme Court affirmed, concluding that 82-11-144 applies to any act of the Board within its regulatory jurisdiction. Mont. Wildlife Fed'n v. Bd. of Oil & Gas Conserv., 2012 MT 128, 365 Mont. 232, 280 P.3d 877.

No Violation of Clear Legal Duty to Consult With County Under MEPA — Writ of Mandamus and Injunction Improper — Action Against DEQ Dismissed: After an exchange of information between the Department of Environmental Quality (DEQ) and Jefferson County about the Mountain States Transmission Intertie (MSTI), a proposed electric transmission line that would transect Jefferson County, the county filed a petition for a writ of mandamus and injunctive relief seeking to compel DEQ to satisfy its legal duty under the Montana Environmental Protection Act (MEPA) to consult with local government prior to issuing a draft Environmental Impact Statement (EIS) and to enjoin DEQ from issuing the draft EIS until after it had complied with its duty to consult. After a series of evidentiary hearings, the District Court concluded that DEQ had not satisfied its duty to consult with the county under MEPA and enjoined it from issuing a draft EIS on the MSTI project until DEQ had more thoroughly consulted with the county, and DEQ appealed. The Supreme Court concluded that the District Court had erred in issuing a writ of mandamus to compel DEQ to more thoroughly consult with the county because MEPA does not establish a clear legal duty for DEQ to consult with a local government to any specified degree. It also ruled that the writ of mandamus was improper because the county had other remedies available to it once DEQ rendered a final decision on the project. Because neither MEPA nor related regulations define the word "consult," DEQ is afforded some discretion in determining the extent to which it consults with a local government under 75-1-104. Because MEPA allows for some discretion on the part of DEQ on how to consult with local government, the Supreme Court held the requirement to consult was not ministerial and therefore did not establish a clear legal duty under MEPA. Accordingly, the Supreme Court remanded the matter to the District Court with instructions to dismiss without prejudice. Jefferson County v. Dept. of Environmental Quality, 2011 MT 265, 362 Mont. 311, 264 P.3d 715.

Challenge of Environmental Assessment — No Jurisdiction for Administrative Review: A grain company sought a permit to build a high-speed grain loading terminal near Pompeys Pillar national monument. The permit was granted and plaintiff, a nonprofit association supporting the monument's preservation, began administrative proceedings in an effort to overturn the permit issuance on grounds that the Department of Environmental Quality erred in its preparation of the environmental assessment related to the permit. An administrative law judge concluded that the Department acted arbitrarily and capriciously by issuing a permit without preparing an environmental impact statement. The Department filed exceptions to the administrative law judge's conclusions with the Board of Environmental Review. The Board ultimately affirmed the Department's decision to issue the permit, and plaintiff appealed to District Court. The Department contended that because the challenge to the administrative decisions did not contain any air quality issues, but only addressed environmental assessment issues governed by the Montana Environmental Policy Act (MEPA), and that because MEPA does not provide for administrative review of challenges to MEPA compliance, the administrative law judge and the Board did not have jurisdiction to preside over the appeal, nor did the District Court have jurisdiction to review the administrative proceedings. The District Court agreed and dismissed plaintiff's petition for lack of subject matter jurisdiction. Plaintiff appealed, but the Supreme Court affirmed. Had plaintiff challenged air quality issues, it would have been entitled to administrative proceedings. However, plaintiff's challenge pertained only to issues related to the environmental assessment, which is governed by MEPA. MEPA requires that a compliance challenge be brought in District Court, rather than through administrative proceedings. Thus, the administrative law judge and the Board did not have jurisdiction to preside over the appeal, nor did the District Court have jurisdiction to review the administrative proceedings. Plaintiff's petition was properly dismissed. Pompeys Pillar Historical Ass'n v. Dept. of Environmental Quality, 2002 MT 352, 313 M 401, 61 P3d 148 (2002).

Failure to Include Adequate Cumulative Impacts Analysis — Insufficient Environmental Impact Statement: The District Court held that the environmental impact statement (EIS) prepared for the Middle Soup Creek logging project was insufficient because it did not adequately analyze and discuss the cumulative impacts of the project in accordance with the definitions of cumulative impact and human environment in ARM 36.2.522 or include discussion of reconciliation of the proposed project with the state forest land management plan (SFLMP). The Department of Natural Resources and Conservation (DNRC) argued on appeal that the court failed to comprehend that a new course filter ecological analysis took into account all of the prevailing conditions of the affected lands and therefore incorporated a cumulative effects analysis into the EIS. The DNRC also contended that even though ARM 36.2.529 requires a cumulative impacts analysis, the rule does not dictate a particular methodology. The Supreme Court disagreed. ARM 36.2.529 clearly states that the EIS must contain a description of the cumulative impacts and does not allow a mere analysis implicit within the EIS. The public is not benefited by reviewing an EIS that does not explicitly set forth the actual cumulative impacts analysis and the facts that form the basis for the analysis. Further, ARM 36.2.524 requires consideration of potential conflicts with formal plans, such as the SFLMP. Here, the EIS discussed old growth and fragmentation as concerns, but did not discuss the SFLMP objective to preserve old growth, reduce fragmentation, and protect unique habitat. The District Court did not err when it held that the DNRC violated MEPA as a result of its failure to include an adequate cumulative impacts analysis in the EIS. Friends of the Wild Swan v. Dept. of Natural Resources and Conservation, 2000 MT 209, 301 M 1, 6 P3d 972, 57 St. Rep. 816 (2000).

Substantial Economic Change as Basis for Supplemental EIS: The District Court held that a supplemental environmental impact statement (EIS) was required for the Middle Soup Creek logging project in light of changed economic circumstances of the sale. The sale was originally proposed as a revenue source for the school trust, before revenue reestimation revealed that the sale would actually cost the state about $150,000. The state contended that a supplemental EIS was not required absent proof that a reduction in the total timber sale revenue would result in physical impact to the environment, arguing that ARM 36.2.522 does not compel preparation of a supplemental EIS based on economic impacts alone. The Supreme Court disagreed, noting that nothing in ARM 36.2.533 requires that a substantial change must result in additional environmental impact before a supplemental EIS is required, nor is there a limitation on what may be considered a substantial change. Thus, a substantial economic change in a project can serve as the basis for requiring a supplemental EIS. Here, a timber sale that would ultimately cost the state money rather than raise revenue as originally anticipated was considered a substantial change sufficient to warrant a supplemental EIS, and the state erred in not preparing one. Friends of the Wild Swan v. Dept. of Natural Resources and Conservation, 2000 MT 209, 301 M 1, 6 P3d 972, 57 St. Rep. 816 (2000).

New Circumstances Requiring Supplemental Environmental Impact Statement — Arbitrary Agency Decision to Not Prepare Supplemental Constituting Reversible Error: Under ARM 18.2.247, an agency is required to prepare a supplemental EIS when there are significant new circumstances that change the basis for the agency's decision and the supplement is required to describe any impacts, alternatives, or other items that were not covered in the original statement or that must be revised based on the new information or circumstances concerning the proposed agency action. When an agency action is challenged for failure to prepare a supplemental EIS, the reviewing court must consider whether the agency made a reasoned decision based on its evaluation of the significance or lack of significance of the new information, whether the decision was based on a consideration of the relevant factors, and whether there has been a clear error of judgment. Here, the decision of the Department of Transportation to build the Forestvale interchange in the Helena Valley was challenged on grounds that the Department did not comply with the supplemental EIS requirements of ARM 18.2.247. The Department conducted an in-house review and determined in 1999 that a supplemental EIS to the original 1991 draft EIS was not necessary because the changes in the proposed project's scope of work and the new information did not result in any significant environmental impacts. The Supreme Court disagreed. The change in traffic patterns, the development around the Capitol interchange, the patterns of development in Helena, and the proposed alternatives to the Forestvale interchange were all significant new circumstances that required a supplemental EIS, and the Department's decision not to prepare one was arbitrary, constituting reversible error. Mont. Envtl. Information Center, Inc. v. Dept. of Transportation, 2000 MT 5, 298 M 1, 994 P2d 676, 57 St. Rep. 18 (2000), following N. Fork Preservation Ass'n v. Dept. of State Lands, 238 M 451, 778 P2d 862, 46 St. Rep. 1409 (1989), and Marsh v. Oreg. Natural Resources Council, 490 US 360 (1989).

Standard of Review Applicable to Noncontested Cases — Approval of Plan for Drilling Exploratory Well: The District Court incorrectly applied the "clearly erroneous" standard set out in 2-4-704 when reviewing whether the Department of State Lands (functions now transferred to Department of Natural Resources and Conservation) properly approved a plan proposing drilling of an exploratory well on a leased tract near Glacier Park. The court found that shortcomings in the approval procedure, coupled with the fact that information gathered by the Department indicating that the well would generate a significant environmental impact, necessitated preparation of an environmental impact statement. However, 2-4-704 was inapplicable because the case was not truly contested. No hearing was requested or held before the Department, there was no action initiated until after the Department had approved the operating plan, and there was no evidentiary record against which to measure the Department's decision and determine whether it was clearly erroneous. Rather, the proper standard of review was whether the record established that the Department acted arbitrarily, capriciously, or unlawfully. The fact that the Department conducted two preliminary environmental reviews, conditioned approval on 42 protective stipulations, and considered the concerns raised in the approval process and took significant steps to address them indicated that the decision to forego preparation of an environmental impact statement was not arbitrary, capricious, or illegal. N. Fork Preservation Ass'n v. Dept. of State Lands, 238 M 451, 778 P2d 862, 46 St. Rep. 1409 (1989), distinguishing Conner v. Burford, 605 F. Supp. 107 (D.C. Mont. 1985), and followed in Ravalli County Fish & Game Ass'n, Inc. v. Dept. of State Lands, 273 M 371, 903 P2d 1362, 52 St. Rep. 996 (1995), Mont. Envtl. Information Center, Inc. v. Dept. of Transportation, 2000 MT 5, 298 M 1, 994 P2d 676, 57 St. Rep. 18 (2000), and Friends of the Wild Swan v. Dept. of Natural Resources and Conservation, 2000 MT 209, 301 M 1, 6 P3d 972, 57 St. Rep. 816 (2000), in which omission of a cumulative impact analysis was directly related to the "unlawful" portion of the MEPA standard of review. See also Madison River R.V. Ltd. v. Ennis, 2000 MT 15, 298 M 91, 994 P2d 1098, 57 St. Rep. 84 (2000).

Environmental Impact Statements — Scope of Appellate Review of Findings of Sufficiency of Statement: Following the completion of an environmental impact statement under the Montana Environmental Policy Act, the Board of Natural Resources and Conservation (now Board of Environmental Review) issued a certificate of environmental compatibility and public need under the Montana Utility Siting Act of 1973 (now the Montana Major Facility Siting Act of 1975) for the construction of several powerlines. The Supreme Court refused to apply a de novo standard of review of the District Court's finding that the impact statement was sufficient. The court held that the correct scope of appellate review of agency decisions was stated in N. Plains Resources Council v. Bd. of Natural Resources and Conserv., 181 M 500, 594 P2d 297 (1979), to be whether the agency's decision was clearly erroneous in light of substantial evidence on the whole record. Mont. Wilderness Ass'n v. Bd. of Natural Resources and Conserv., 200 M 11, 648 P2d 734, 39 St. Rep. 1238 (1982).

Sufficiency of Environmental Impact Statement — Failure to Consider Alternatives — Failure to Prepare Cost Benefit Analysis: Following the completion of an environmental impact statement under the provisions of the Montana Environmental Policy Act (MEPA), the Board of Natural Resources and Conservation (now Board of Environmental Review) issued a certificate of environmental compatibility and public need under the Montana Utility Siting Act of 1973 (now the Montana Major Facility Siting Act of 1975) for the construction of a powerline. The Supreme Court affirmed the holding of the District Court that the impact statement sufficiently considered the alternative of "no action" and that neither the siting act nor MEPA explicitly requires a formal, mathematically expressed cost/benefit analysis. The language of the impact statement makes clear that the "no action" alternative was considered and rejected and that the relative costs and benefits of the proposed powerline were considered in the impact statement. (See 2001 amendment.) Mont. Wilderness Ass'n v. Bd. of Natural Resources and Conserv., 200 M 11, 648 P2d 734, 39 St. Rep. 1238 (1982).

Laches: An objection that various state and federal agencies failed to follow the requirements of the National Environmental Policy Act (NEPA) and the Montana Environmental Policy Act (MEPA) in initiating construction of a four-lane highway was not barred by laches on the grounds that the four-lane proposal had been before the public for 10 years. Here, respondents failed to consider secondary impacts and the alternative of constructing an improved two-lane road. Regarding the issue of laches, NEPA and MEPA by their very nature contemplate delay in implementing plans for construction of a highway. The expenditure of $1 million is not alone sufficient prejudice to warrant a finding of laches; a finding of prejudice depends on what Congress defines as prejudicial. Coalition for Canyon Preservation v. Bowers, 632 F2d 774 (9th Cir. 1980), overruling 479 F. Supp. 815 (D.C. Mont. 1979).

Federal Authority Interpreting MEPA: Federal case law is an appropriate guide in interpreting the Montana Environmental Policy Act (MEPA). Kadillak v. The Anaconda Co., 184 M 127, 602 P2d 147, 36 St. Rep. 1820 (1979), followed in Ravalli County Fish & Game Ass'n, Inc. v. Dept. of State Lands, 273 M 371, 903 P2d 1362, 52 St. Rep. 996 (1995).

Necessity for Statement — Conflict With MEPA Time Limit: Where Hard Rock Mining Act (HRMA) provision requires that the state Board of Land Commissioners (functions now transferred to Department of Environmental Quality) act within 60 days of receipt of complete application and reclamation plan and it would have been impossible to complete preparation of an Environmental Impact Statement (EIS) before taking action on HRMA application, the Montana Environmental Policy Act (MEPA) requirement is inapplicable. Kadillak v. The Anaconda Co., 184 M 127, 602 P2d 147, 36 St. Rep. 1820 (1979); following Flint Ridge Dev. Co. v. Scenic Rivers Ass'n of Oklahoma, 426 US 776 (1976).

Statutory Requirement Not Constitutionally Mandated: The requirement that an agency prepare an environmental impact statement was not constitutionally mandated because of a subsequent adoption of a constitutional provision in 1972 (Art. II, sec. 3, Mont. Const.), guaranteeing a clean and healthful environment. Kadillak v. The Anaconda Co., 184 M 127, 602 P2d 147, 36 St. Rep. 1820 (1979).

Attorney General's Opinions

When Environmental Impact Statement Required in Conjunction With Loan Participation Agreement: A determination by the Montana Board of Investments to enter into a loan participation agreement constitutes a major action of state government under the Montana Environmental Policy Act (MEPA). Therefore, the Board must comply with the environmental impact statement requirements of MEPA when considering whether to enter into a loan participation agreement when the underlying project benefiting from the agreement may significantly affect the quality of the human environment. 43 A.G. Op. 62 (1990).

Emergency Exception Inapplicable to Foreseeable Situations — Environmental Policy Act Applicable: The Department of Agriculture did not follow the directive of ARM 4.2.308 (repealed in 1988) in dealing with an emergency infestation of grasshoppers when it failed to file a report with the Governor and the Environmental Quality Council. While an emergency situation is a legitimate exception to the requirements of the Montana Environmental Policy Act (MEPA), the Department should comply with MEPA before participating in a grasshopper spraying program if the need for such a program is reasonably foreseeable. 42 A.G. Op. 62 (1988).

State Participation in Spraying Program — Environmental Policy Act Triggered: State participation in a grasshopper spraying program in which the state paid up to one-third of the costs and provided financial management and technical expertise was a major state action in which compliance with the Montana Environmental Policy Act was required. 42 A.G. Op. 62 (1988).

Interim Study of Hunting and Fishing License Statutes and Fees: Chapter 395, L. 2013, required the environmental quality council to conduct a study of Montana's hunting and fishing license statutes and fees, prepare a final report, and prepare draft legislation. Chapter 395 was effective May 6, 2013, and terminates December 31, 2014.

Preamble: The preamble attached to Ch. 395, L. 2013, provided: "WHEREAS, the Montana Legislature establishes hunting and fishing license fees; and

WHEREAS, hunting and fishing license fees provide approximately $34 million annually to fund most of the operations of the department of fish, wildlife, and parks; and

WHEREAS, hunting and fishing license fees are historically set at a stable level for 8 to 10 years, when revenue exceeds expenses and creates a surplus in the general license account; and

WHEREAS, revenue from hunting and fishing licenses no longer matches expenses, and the general license account has declined since fiscal year 2010; and

WHEREAS, the last major adjustment to hunting and fishing license fees was in 2005; and

WHEREAS, reduced cost hunting and fishing licenses for certain population groups result in approximately $4 million less in general license account revenue; and

WHEREAS, the sale of hunting and fishing licenses has declined in recent years, most notably in 2011; and

WHEREAS, the general license account may be close to a critical point, and hunting and fishing license fee increases may be necessary to fund current operations."

2003 Amendment: Chapter 33 in (10) at end of introductory clause after "committee for the" inserted "following executive branch agencies and the entities attached to the agencies for administrative purposes". Amendment effective February 18, 2003.

2001 Amendment: Chapter 210 in (10) inserted "draft legislation review". Amendment effective April 6, 2001.

1999 Amendment: Chapter 19 inserted (10) requiring the environmental quality council to act as an interim committee with respect to certain state agencies; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective February 17, 1999.

1995 Amendment: Chapter 545 in introductory clause substituted "The environmental quality council shall" for "It shall be the duty and function of the executive director and the staff to"; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective July 1, 1995.

1995 Transition: Section 81, Ch. 545, L. 1995, provided: "(1) The members of the legislative council, as provided in 5-11-101, the members of the legislative finance committee, as provided in

(3) Personnel and property of the environmental quality council are transferred to the legislative services division effective July 1, 1995."

1993 Amendment: Chapter 349 deleted (10) that read: "(10) annually, beginning July 1, 1972, transmit to the governor and the legislature and make available to the general public an environmental quality report concerning the state of the environment, which shall contain:

(a) the status and condition of the major natural, manmade, or altered environmental classes of the state, including but not limited to the air, the aquatic (including surface water and ground water) and the terrestrial environments, including but not limited to the forest, dryland, wetland, range, urban, suburban, and rural environments;

(b) the adequacy of available natural resources for fulfilling human and economic requirements of the state in the light of expected population pressures;

(c) current and foreseeable trends in the quality, management, and utilization of such environments and the effects of those trends on the social, economic, and other requirements of the state in the light of expected population pressures;

(d) a review of the programs and activities (including regulatory activities) of the state and local governments and nongovernmental entities or individuals, with particular reference to their effect on the environment and on the conservation, development, and utilization of natural resources; and

(e) a program for remedying the deficiencies of existing programs and activities, together with recommendations for legislation"; and made minor changes in style.

General Provisions and Administration

Preamble: The preamble attached to Ch. 502, L. 1993, provided: "WHEREAS, pursuant to Subchapter V of the federal Clean Air Act, 42 U.S.C. 7661, et seq., the State of Montana may be authorized by the U.S. Environmental Protection Agency to administer an operating permit program applicable to certain sources of air pollutants; and

WHEREAS, if the state fails to obtain authorization for an operating permit program from the federal government under the federal Clean Air Act, the program will be administered within the state by the U.S. Environmental Protection Agency and the state will be subjected to sanctions, including the loss of federal air program funding or highway funding; and

WHEREAS, the Legislature believes that it is in the best interests of both the citizens and businesses of this state for the Department of Health and Environmental Sciences [now Department of Environmental Quality] to seek and obtain authorization from the federal government to administer an operating permit program pursuant to Subchapter V of the federal Clean Air Act; and

WHEREAS, to provide the Department of Health and Environmental Sciences [now Department of Environmental Quality] with the statutory authority necessary to obtain authorization under Subchapter V, numerous amendments and additions to the Clean Air Act of Montana are necessary and appropriate, including significant amendments to existing permitting, fee, and enforcement authority and the adoption of new provisions governing the operating permit program and relating to assistance for small businesses."

1993 Statement of Intent: The statement of intent attached to Ch. 502, L. 1993, provided: "A statement of intent is provided for this bill because it extends current rulemaking authority of the board of health and environmental sciences [now board of environmental review] to adopt rules implementing a program for the issuance and renewal of air quality operating permits by the department of health and environmental sciences [now department of environmental quality] and amends several sections of the Clean Air Act of Montana for which the board currently has rulemaking authority, including the authority to adopt air quality permit fees to be collected by the department of health and environmental sciences [now department of environmental quality].

Section 75-2-204 and [section 9] [75-2-217] provide the authority to the board and department to create and administer an operating permit program for those sources subject to Subchapter V of the federal Clean Air Act. It is the desire of the legislature that the program be applied only to those sources covered by the statutory requirements of Subchapter V and that the department allow for operational flexibility at those sources, including provisions for minor permit modifications and off-permit changes. The legislature does not intend the operating permit program administered by the department to serve as a basis for imposition of any additional emission limitations, monitoring or reporting requirements, or other substantive requirements upon sources within the state, except as required by Subchapter V and implementing regulations. It is also the intent of the legislature that the operating permit program administered by the department for those sources subject to Subchapter V of the federal Clean Air Act be consistent with the operating permit framework and guidelines outlined in Subchapter V and implementing federal regulations. The legislature further intends that the operating permit program authorized by this bill, when viewed as a whole, should not invariably be limited to the minimum federal requirements but also should not invariably impose the strictest optional alternatives allowable under Subchapter V and implementing federal regulations. These sections and the amendments contained in 75-2-103(2) are also intended to clarify the department's existing authority to implement the provisions of the federal Clean Air Act relating to hazardous air pollutants, 42 U.S.C. 7412, as those provisions relate to the requirements of Subchapter V.

Section 75-2-211 contains amendments that clarify the authority of the department to continue to administer the air quality permitting program relating to the construction, installation, alteration, or use of air pollutant sources. It is the desire of the legislature that the department continue this permitting program in conjunction with the operating permit program under [sections 9 through 11] [75-2-217 through 75-2-219]. The clarifying amendments contained in this bill are not intended to expand the current authority of the department to administer an air quality permitting program relating to construction, installation, alteration, or use. This authority is currently used for conducting various state air quality permitting programs, as well as for operating federal permitting programs relating to prevention of significant deterioration and nonattainment, all of which are part of the state implementation plan for protecting air quality. In addition to these programs, the legislature intends that 75-2-211 serve as the authority needed to meet the requirements of the federal Clean Air Act relating to the construction, reconstruction, and modification of sources of hazardous air pollutants, 42 U.S.C. 7412.

[Section 12] [75-2-220] contains the department's existing authority to assess application and annual fees for permits issued under the Clean Air Act of Montana, Title 75, chapter 2. The placement of this authority in a separate section of the code emphasizes its general applicability to all permitting activities under that chapter. [Section 12(1), (2), and (3)] [75-2-220(1), (2), and (3)] contain amendments to the existing fee authority to ensure that the department will be able to collect fees sufficient to meet the requirements of Subchapter V of the federal Clean Air Act. [Section 12(5)] [75-2-220(5)] is intended to provide the department with an alternative to civil enforcement in addressing the delinquent payment of fees."

Preamble: The preamble attached to Ch. 361, L. 2003, provided: "WHEREAS, Article II, section 3, of the Montana Constitution enumerates certain inalienable individual rights, including the right to a clean and healthful environment, the right of pursuing life's basic necessities, the right of enjoying and defending an individual's life and liberty, the right of acquiring, possessing, and protecting property, and the right of seeking individual safety, health, and happiness in all lawful ways; and

WHEREAS, the constitutionally enumerated rights are by their very nature bound to result in competing interests in specific fact situations; and

WHEREAS, Article IX, section 1, of the Montana Constitution provides that the state and each person shall maintain and improve a clean and healthful environment in Montana for present and future generations and directs the Legislature to provide for the administration and enforcement of this duty and also directs the Legislature to provide adequate remedies for the protection of the environmental life support system from degradation and to provide adequate remedies to prevent unreasonable depletion and degradation of natural resources; and

WHEREAS, the Legislature has reviewed the intent of the framers of the 1972 Montana Constitution as evidenced in the verbatim transcripts of the constitutional convention; and

WHEREAS, there is no indication that one enumerated inalienable right is intended to supersede other inalienable rights, including the right to use property in all lawful means; and

WHEREAS, the Legislature, mindful of its constitutional obligation to provide for the administration and enforcement of the constitution, has enacted a comprehensive set of laws to accomplish the goals of the constitution, including the Montana Clean Indoor Air Act of 1979, Title 50, chapter 40, part 1, MCA; the Montana Environmental Policy Act, Title 75, chapter 1, parts 1 through 3, MCA; the Clean Air Act of Montana, Title 75, chapter 2, parts 1 through 4, MCA; water quality laws, Title 75, chapter 5, MCA; The Natural Streambed and Land Preservation Act of 1975, Title 75, chapter 7, part 1, MCA; The Montana Solid Waste

Amendment effective July 1, 1995.

Because Ch. 418 inserted a reference to the Board of Environmental Review and Ch. 546 deleted a reference to the Board of Health and Environmental Sciences, the codifier has reflected both the insertion and the deletion.

Section 571, Ch. 546, L. 1995, was a saving clause.

1993 Amendments — Composite Section: Chapter 129 inserted definitions of hazardous waste, incinerator, and solid waste; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective March 19, 1993.

Chapter 502 inserted definition of air pollutants; in definition of air pollution, after "presence", substituted "of air pollutants" for "in the outdoor atmosphere of one or more air contaminants"; in definition of person, before "subdivision", inserted "the state or a" and after "estate" inserted "an interstate body, the federal government or an agency of the federal government"; inserted definition of small business stationary source; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective April 24, 1993.

Chapter 639 inserted definitions of commercial hazardous waste incinerator, environmental protection law, hazardous waste, incinerator, medical waste, and principal. Amendment effective May 13, 1993.

The definition of hazardous waste contained in Ch. 129 differed from the definition contained in Ch. 639. The definition in Ch. 639 was broader, so the codifier codified the broader definition. The definition of incinerator in Ch. 129 was identical to the definition in Ch. 639.

1993 Statement of Intent: The statement of intent attached to Ch. 129, L. 1993, provided: "It is the intent of the legislature that the statutory size cutoff for incinerators that burn 200 pounds or less per hour, as provided for in 75-2-215, be eliminated and that the requirements of 75-2-215 be extended to boilers and industrial furnaces. As a result, the requirements of 75-2-215 would apply to all incinerators and all boilers and industrial furnaces subject to 75-10-406, regardless of size. In order to lessen the burden on the department of health and environmental sciences [now department of environmental quality], the board of health and environmental sciences [now board of environmental review] may provide by rule for general permits that apply to classes or categories of sources subject to the requirements of 75-2-215. The board shall use this authority to the greatest extent possible, consistent with its obligation to protect public health and the environment.

It is also the intent of the legislature to clarify the provisions of 75-2-215 by amending the definitions in 75-2-103. The definition of incinerator contains no reference to end use or economic value of the feed, but rather focuses on the process employed. The definition of solid waste is intended to be more encompassing than the use of that definition elsewhere in Title 75, and the reference to "marketable byproducts" contained in other definitions is intentionally omitted. The overriding purpose of this bill is to protect air quality, public health, and the physical environment, and the legislature does not believe it appropriate to draw distinctions in applicability based upon whether or not the incineration activity is, for example, associated with waste disposal or volume reduction in conjunction with recycling."

Failure to Allow Amendment of Affidavit Contesting Air Quality Permit — Prejudice to Substantial Rights Warranting Reversal: Plaintiffs moved to amend an affidavit contesting the issuance of an air quality permit. The Board of Environmental Review denied the motion and the District Court affirmed the Board's decision. On appeal, the Supreme Court reversed. Former Rule 15(c), M.R.Civ.P. Additionally, 75-2-211(10) did not bar amendment of the original affidavit. The Supreme Court noted that it would make little sense and would not foster resolution of contested cases on the merits to foreclose the possibility of amendments before significant discovery occurred. 1991 Amendment: In (5) inserted "and permit applications, consistent with"; and made minor change in style.

1991 Statement of Intent: The statement of intent attached to Ch. 652, L. 1991, provided: "A statement of intent is required for this bill because [section 1] [75-2-111] requires the board of health and environmental sciences [now board of environmental review] to adopt by rule fees for air quality permit applications. The purpose of this bill is to allow the collection of an ongoing annual fee to cover the costs associated with the development and administration, including implementation and enforcement, of an air quality permitting program. While there is a need for a fee system to cover these costs, it is not the legislature's intent that these fees be used to recover other costs not delineated in this bill. The legislature recognizes that the identification of actual costs associated with specific permits and permitting activities may be difficult and envisions that a fee schedule may be established with generic applicability. This may result in fees for classes of sources according to the type or amount of emissions or the type of source. For example, it may be determined that the costs associated with the development and administration of a permitting program vary directly with the amount or type of regulated pollutants emitted. In such a case, a fee based upon the tons of a regulated pollutant emitted may be appropriate. The board's rules defining the fee structure to be used by the department shall ensure that the fees charged will not collect, in the aggregate, more than is authorized and appropriated by the legislature to the department for the development and administration of the permitting program.

This bill also clarifies the authority of the department of health and environmental sciences [now department of environmental quality] to issue an operating permit for air contaminant sources. It is the legislature's intent that all air contaminant sources operating within the state obtain an operating permit, including those sources that are "grandfathered" under current air quality regulations. Reasonable exemptions from this requirement may be approved by the board and implemented based upon the size or nature of the source or its emissions.

For sources of air contaminants that are subject to Title V of the federal Clean Air Act, 42 U.S.C. 7401, et seq., as amended, the board may provide for the expiration and renewal of permits issued to those sources, as necessary to meet the requirements of Title V. To provide for the orderly transition to Title V permits for both current permitholders and grandfathered sources, the board shall establish a transition schedule. The transition schedule may not specify dates for obtaining Title V permits that are earlier than the times contained in the Act.

This bill also allows for the assessment of those fees necessary to fund activities of the department that are intended to address specific air quality problems in the state if the legislature authorizes the activities and appropriates the funds for the activities. For example, it may be necessary to conduct additional ambient monitoring in a particular geographic area in order to determine the compliance status of that area with applicable ambient air quality standards. The legislature intends that this provision be used only to fund those activities that examine specific problems in particular geographic areas. The assessments for funding should be levied in an equitable fashion and only upon those sources whose emissions are both of the type being focused upon and thought to impact the geographic area."

Effective Date — Rulemaking Authority: Section 4(1), Ch. 652, L. 1991, provided: "(1) [Section 1 [75-2-111], subsections (1) and (3) through (16) of section 2 [75-2-211], section 3, and this section] are effective October 1, 1991, but the department may proceed with the rulemaking process under Title 2, chapter 4, prior to that date. The effective date of any rule adopted to implement those parts of [this act] may be effective no earlier than October 1, 1991."

Statement of Intent: The statement of intent attached to HB 716 (Ch. 560, L. 1979) provided: "The Legislature intends to grant to the Board of Health and Environmental Sciences [now Board of Environmental Review] rulemaking authority to adopt a permit fee schedule, and to adopt a schedule of penalty assessments for noncompliance with respect to any source under sections 7 through 15 of this act."

Challenge of Environmental Assessment — No Jurisdiction for Administrative Review: A grain company sought a permit to build a high-speed grain loading terminal near Pompeys Pillar national monument. The permit was granted and plaintiff, a nonprofit association supporting the monument's preservation, began administrative proceedings in an effort to overturn the permit issuance on grounds that the Department of Environmental Quality erred in its preparation of the environmental assessment related to the permit. An administrative law judge concluded that the Department acted arbitrarily and capriciously by issuing a permit without preparing an environmental impact statement. The Department filed exceptions to the administrative law judge's conclusions with the Board of Environmental Review. The Board ultimately affirmed the Department's decision to issue the permit, and plaintiff appealed to District Court. The Department contended that because the challenge to the administrative decisions did not contain any air quality issues, but only addressed environmental assessment issues governed by the Montana Environmental Policy Act (MEPA), and that because MEPA does not provide for administrative review of challenges to MEPA compliance, the administrative law judge and the Board did not have jurisdiction to preside over the appeal, nor did the District Court have jurisdiction to review the administrative proceedings. The District Court agreed and dismissed plaintiff's petition for lack of subject matter jurisdiction. Plaintiff appealed, but the Supreme Court affirmed. Had plaintiff challenged air quality issues, it would have been entitled to administrative proceedings. However, plaintiff's challenge pertained only to issues related to the environmental assessment, which is governed by MEPA. MEPA requires that a compliance challenge be brought in District Court, rather than through administrative proceedings. Thus, the administrative law judge and the Board did not have jurisdiction to preside over the appeal, nor did the District Court have jurisdiction to review the administrative proceedings. Plaintiff's petition was properly dismissed. Pompeys Pillar Historical Ass'n v. Dept. of Environmental Quality, 2002 MT 352, 313 M 401, 61 P3d 148 (2002).

Standing of Local Air Pollution Control Board to Challenge Validity of State Administrative Rules: A local pollution control board is a person within the statutory definition in 2-4-102, and in the same way as a citizen of a local area is more particularly affected by actions of the state Board of Environmental Review than is a citizen of another area, the interest of a local board is distinguishable from and greater than the interest of the public generally. Because of threatened injury to a local board in the form of potential economic harm from additional expenses necessary to implement state administrative rules, a local board has standing to challenge the validity of administrative rules concerning air pollution applicable within its area of jurisdiction. Missoula City-County Air Pollution Control Bd. v. Bd. of Envtl. Review, 282 M 255, 937 P2d 463, 54 St. Rep. 338 (1997), followed in Mont. Envtl. Information Center v. Garbage Removal — Burning — Constitutional Law: A city may provide tax-supported garbage-hauling services. The service in Kalispell came under the Department of Health and Environmental Sciences (now Department of Environmental Quality) rules which also provide that the geographical area covered by a private hauler or tax-supported service is within the area where open burning is prohibited. Neither due process nor equal protection is violated by a prohibition of open burning in some areas when the object and tendency of the prohibiting legislation or a rule adopted thereunder is promotion of public health. 38 A.G. 1997 Repeal of "Hannah Amendment" — 1987 Ambient Air Quality Standards for Sulfur Dioxide Repealed: In sec. 1, Ch. 504, L. 1987, the 1987 Legislature amended ARM 16.8.820 (renumbered ARM 17.8.210) by adopting the federal annual average and 24-hour average standards for ambient air quality for sulfur dioxide in Yellowstone County. The 1987 act, known as the "Hannah Amendment", was repealed by sec. 1, Ch. 33, L. 1997. The effect of the 1997 repeal was to return sulfur dioxide ambient air quality standards to the pre-1987 state annual average and 24-hour average standards.

Preamble: The preamble attached to Ch. 502, L. 1993, provided: "WHEREAS, pursuant to Subchapter V of the federal Clean Air Act, 42 U.S.C. 7661, et seq., the State of Montana may be authorized by the U.S. Environmental Protection Agency to administer an operating permit program applicable to certain sources of air pollutants; and

WHEREAS, if the state fails to obtain authorization for an operating permit program from the federal government under the federal Clean Air Act, the program will be administered within the state by the U.S. Environmental Protection Agency and the state will be subjected to sanctions, including the loss of federal air program funding or highway funding; and

WHEREAS, the Legislature believes that it is in the best interests of both the citizens and businesses of this state for the Department of Health and Environmental Sciences [now Department of Environmental Quality] to seek and obtain authorization from the federal government to administer an operating permit program pursuant to Subchapter V of the federal Clean Air Act; and

WHEREAS, to provide the Department of Health and Environmental Sciences [now Department of Environmental Quality] with the statutory authority necessary to obtain authorization under Subchapter V, numerous amendments and additions to the Clean Air Act of Montana are necessary and appropriate, including significant amendments to existing permitting, fee, and enforcement authority and the adoption of new provisions governing the operating permit program and relating to assistance for small businesses."

1993 Statement of Intent: The statement of intent attached to Ch. 502, L. 1993, provided: "A statement of intent is provided for this bill because it extends current rulemaking authority of the board of health and environmental sciences [now board of environmental review] to adopt rules implementing a program for the issuance and renewal of air quality operating permits by the department of health and environmental sciences [now department of environmental quality] and amends several sections of the Clean Air Act of Montana for which the board currently has rulemaking authority, including the authority to adopt air quality permit fees to be collected by the department of health and environmental sciences [now department of environmental quality].

Section 75-2-204 and [section 9] [75-2-217] provide the authority to the board and department to create and administer an operating permit program for those sources subject to Subchapter V of the federal Clean Air Act. It is the desire of the legislature that the program be applied only to those sources covered by the statutory requirements of Subchapter V and that the department allow for operational flexibility at those sources, including provisions for minor permit modifications and off-permit changes. The legislature does not intend the operating permit program administered by the department to serve as a basis for imposition of any additional emission limitations, monitoring or reporting requirements, or other substantive requirements upon sources within the state, except as required by Subchapter V and implementing regulations. It is also the intent of the legislature that the operating permit program administered by the department for those sources subject to Subchapter V of the federal Clean Air Act be consistent with the operating permit framework and guidelines outlined in Subchapter V and implementing federal regulations. The legislature further intends that the operating permit program authorized by this bill, when viewed as a whole, should not invariably be limited to the minimum federal requirements but also should not invariably impose the strictest optional alternatives allowable under Subchapter V and implementing federal regulations. These sections and the amendments contained in 75-2-103(2) are also intended to clarify the department's existing authority to implement the provisions of the federal Clean Air Act relating to hazardous air pollutants, 42 U.S.C. 7412, as those provisions relate to the requirements of Subchapter V.

Section 75-2-211 contains amendments that clarify the authority of the department to continue to administer the air quality permitting program relating to the construction, installation, alteration, or use of air pollutant sources. It is the desire of the legislature that the department continue this permitting program in conjunction with the operating permit program under [sections 9 through 11] [75-2-217 through 75-2-219]. The clarifying amendments contained in this bill are not intended to expand the current authority of the department to administer an air quality permitting program relating to construction, installation, alteration, or use. This authority is currently used for conducting various state air quality permitting programs, as well as for operating federal permitting programs relating to prevention of significant deterioration and nonattainment, all of which are part of the state implementation plan for protecting air quality. In addition to these programs, the legislature intends that 75-2-211 serve as the authority needed to meet the requirements of the federal Clean Air Act relating to the construction, reconstruction, and modification of sources of hazardous air pollutants, 42 U.S.C. 7412.

[Section 12] [75-2-220] contains the department's existing authority to assess application and annual fees for permits issued under the Clean Air Act of Montana, Title 75, chapter 2. The placement of this authority in a separate section of the code emphasizes its general applicability to all permitting activities under that chapter. [Section 12(1), (2), and (3)] [75-2-220(1), (2), and (3)] contain amendments to the existing fee authority to ensure that the department will be able to collect fees sufficient to meet the requirements of Subchapter V of the federal Clean Air Act. [Section 12(5)] [75-2-220(5)] is intended to provide the department with an alternative to civil enforcement in addressing the delinquent payment of fees."

Legislative Repeal of Administrative Rule: In 1981, prior to the amendment of 2-4-412 (Ch. 164, L. 1983) the Legislature, in HJR 22, repealed Rule 16.8.1420 ARM, a rule promulgated pursuant to this section. HJR 22 read as follows: "WHEREAS, subsection (4) of section 75-2-203, MCA, allows the Board of Health and Environmental Sciences [now Board of Environmental Review] to adopt emission standards more stringent than federal emission standards only if the stricter state standards are "necessary in some localities in this state"; and

WHEREAS, in 1970 the Board of Health and Environmental Sciences [now Board of Environmental Review] adopted emission standards limiting fluoride and particulate emissions from existing primary aluminum reduction plants, which standards are designated as Rule 16.8.1420 of the Administrative Rules of Montana; and

WHEREAS, in 1976 the Board of Health and Environmental Sciences [now Board of Environmental Review] adopted as state standards the federal new source performance standards limiting fluoride and particulate emissions from new primary aluminum reduction plants, which standards are designated as Rule 16.8.1423 of the Administrative Rules of Montana; and

WHEREAS, the state standards adopted prior to the state's adoption of the federal standards are more restrictive than the federal standards adopted by the state; and

WHEREAS, the more stringent state standards tend to limit the expansion and economic growth of the affected industry by requiring additional expenditures for control equipment that are unnecessary in that the federal standards are designed to protect human health and welfare; and

WHEREAS, because both standards are state standards, the state has now adopted two different emission standards for particulate and fluoride emissions for new and existing primary aluminum reduction plants.

NOW, THEREFORE, BE IT RESOLVED BY THE SENATE AND THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES OF THE STATE OF MONTANA:

That the state standards limiting the fluoride and particulate emissions from existing primary aluminum reduction plants and designated as Rule 16.8.1420 of the Administrative Rules of Montana are repealed.

BE IT FURTHER RESOLVED, that the Board of Health and Environmental Sciences [now Board of Environmental Review] is directed to proceed within 30 days to promulgate new standards. The Board shall adopt the terms and provisions of the federal new source performance standards for fluoride and particulate emissions from primary existing aluminum reduction plants as its standard for all primary aluminum reduction plants in this state." House Joint Resolution 22 was approved March 25, 1981.

Case Notes

Delegation of Authority — Constitutional: Although 75-2-203 and 75-2-211 grant broad powers to the Board of Health and Environmental Sciences (now Board of Environmental Review), this delegation is not unconstitutional. Air pollution control is an emerging field for which detailed and precise standards have not been fully developed, and the authority granted must necessarily be phrased broadly. State ex rel. Dept. of Health & Environmental Sciences v. Lincoln County, 178 M 410, 584 P2d 1293, 35 St. Rep. 1402 (1978).

2003 Amendment: Chapter 231 at end after "part" inserted "or has registered the source of air contaminants with the department if the source is in a category for which only registration is required by the rules adopted to implement this part"; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective April 4, 2003.

1993 Amendment: Chapter 502 near beginning, after "alteration", inserted "operation" and at end inserted "under this part"; and made minor changes in style.

Effective Dates: Section 24(2), Ch. 502, L. 1993, provided that 75-2-105, 75-2-204, 75-2-211, 75-2-217 through 75-2-220, subsections (1) and (3) of 75-2-221, 75-2-301, 75-2-401, 75-2-412, 75-2-413, and 75-2-421 are effective October 1, 1993, but that the Board and Department may adopt rules under these sections upon passage and approval. Approved April 24, 1993. Rules adopted to implement these sections may not be effective before October 1, 1993.

Writ of Mandate Improper: Since the Legislature gave the Department of Health and Environmental Sciences (now Department of Environmental Quality) a discretionary duty under this section to control air pollution rather than a ministerial duty, a Writ of Mandate cannot properly be issued against the Department under this section. 2001 Amendment: Chapter 536 in (2)(a) near beginning after "only if" substituted remainder of (2)(a) through (2)(c) prohibiting the board of environmental review from approving or adopting rules that are more stringent than those imposed by the federal government unless certain requirements are met and providing for review of rules that may be more stringent than federal requirements for remainder of former (2) through (4) that read: "the board or department makes a written finding after a public hearing and public comment and based on evidence in the record that:

(a) the proposed state standard or requirement protects public health or the environment of the state; and

(b) the state standard or requirement to be imposed can mitigate harm to the public health or environment and is achievable under current technology.

(3) The written finding must reference information and peer-reviewed scientific studies contained in the record that forms the basis for the board's or department's conclusion. The written finding must also include information from the hearing record regarding the costs to the regulated community that are directly attributable to the proposed state standard or requirement.

(4) (a) A person affected by a rule of the board or department adopted after January 1, 1990, and before April 14, 1995, that that person believes to be more stringent than comparable federal regulations or guidelines may petition the board or department to review the rule. If the board or department determines that the rule is more stringent than comparable federal regulations or guidelines, the board or department shall comply with this section by either revising the rule to conform to the federal regulations or guidelines or by making the written finding, as provided under subsection (2), within a reasonable period of time, not to exceed 12 months after receiving the petition. A petition under this section does not relieve the petitioner of the duty to comply with the challenged rule. The board or department may charge a petition filing fee in an amount not to exceed $250.

(b) A person may also petition the board or department for a rule review under subsection (4)(a) if the board or department adopts a rule after January 1, 1990, in an area in which no federal regulations or guidelines existed and the federal government subsequently establishes comparable regulations or guidelines that are less stringent than the previously adopted board or department rule"; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective May 1, 2001.

Preamble: The preamble attached to Ch. 471, L. 1995, provided: "WHEREAS, the federal government frequently regulates areas that are also subject to state regulation; and

WHEREAS, differing state and federal policy goals and unique state prerogatives frequently result in different levels of regulation, different standards, and different requirements being imposed by state and federal programs covering the same subject matter; and

WHEREAS, Montana must simultaneously move toward reducing redundant and unnecessary regulation that dulls the state's competitive advantage while being ever vigilant in the protection of the public's health, safety, and welfare; and

WHEREAS, Montana's administrative agencies should consider applicable federal standards when adopting, readopting, or amending rules with analogous federal counterparts; and

WHEREAS, Montana's administrative agencies should analyze whether analogous federal standards sufficiently protect the health, safety, and welfare of Montana's citizens; and

WHEREAS, as part of the formal rulemaking process, the public should be advised of the agencies' conclusions about whether analogous federal standards sufficiently protect the health, safety, and welfare of Montana citizens."

1995 Statement of Intent: The statement of intent attached to Ch. 471, L. 1995, provided: "A statement of intent is required for this bill in order to provide guidance to the board of health and environmental sciences [now board of environmental review], the department of health and environmental sciences [now department of environmental quality], and local units of government in complying with [this act].

The legislature intends that in addition to all requirements imposed by existing law and rules, the board or the department include as part of the initial publication and all subsequent publications of a rule a written finding if the rule in question contains any standards or requirements that exceed the standards or requirements imposed by comparable federal law.

If the rules are more stringent than comparable federal law, the written finding must include but is not limited to a discussion of the policy reasons and an analysis that supports the board's or department's decision that the proposed state standards or requirements protect public health or the environment of the state and that the state standards or requirements to be imposed can mitigate harm to the public health or the environment and are achievable under current technology. The department is not required to show that the federal regulation is inadequate to protect public health. The written finding must also include information from the hearing record regarding the costs to the regulated community directly attributable to the proposed state standard or requirement."

Effective Date: Section 23, Ch. 471, L. 1995, provided that this section is effective on passage and approval. Approved April 14, 1995.

Applicability: Section 22(1) and (3), Ch. 471, L. 1995, provided: "(1) [Sections 1 through 3] are intended to apply to any rule that is in effect, adopted, or amended, and that regulates those resources or activities for which the state has been given primary authority to regulate by federal authority pursuant to Title 75, chapter 2; Title 75, chapter 3 [renumbered, except for part 6, as Title 50, chapter 79]; Title 75, chapter 5; Title 75, chapter 6; or Title 75, chapter 10, as of [the effective date of this act] [April 14, 1995].

(3) [This act] does not apply to the establishment of fees or public participation requirements."

2009 Amendments — Composite Section: Chapter 2 in (9)(b) near middle, in (9)(c) near middle, and in (12)(a) at end substituted "7661a" for "7661". Amendment effective October 1, 2009.

Chapter 445 in (10) in first sentence at beginning inserted exception clause, and substituted "directly and adversely affected" for "jointly or severally adversely affected"; in (11) inserted exception clause; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective May 5, 2009.

Severability: Section 10, Ch. 445, L. 2009, was a severability clause.

Applicability: Section 12, Ch. 445, L. 2009, provided: "[This act] applies to judicial and board of environmental review hearing and appeal proceedings initiated on or after [the effective date of this act]." Effective May 5, 2009.

2005 Amendments — Composite Section: Chapter 188 in (9)(b) at end after "application" inserted exception clause; in (10) in third sentence at end after "request" inserted "must be filed within 30 days after the department renders its decision"; inserted (13) requiring a rule to provide for a 15-day public comment period; inserted (14) providing for rules to allow extensions of comment and notification periods; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective July 1, 2005.

Chapter 236 in (2)(a) near beginning after "75-2-234" inserted "and subsections (2)(b) and (2)(c) of this section"; inserted (2)(b) through (2)(e) delaying the requirement to apply for an air quality permit for an oil or gas well facility to January 3, 2006, or 60 days after the initial well completions date, whichever is later, and requiring adoption of rules to regulate facilities until a permit is issued; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective January 1, 2006.

Chapter 337 near beginning of (9)(a) in exception clause inserted "75-1-205(4) and"; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective April 21, 2005.

Applicability: Section 22, Ch. 337, L. 2005, provided: "[This act] applies to environmental impact statements on which the agency responsible for preparation commenced preparation after December 31, 2004."

2003 Amendments — Composite Section: Chapter 99 in (9)(b) in first sentence near middle after "impact statement" inserted "is not subject to the provisions of 75-2-215, and is not subject to the federal air quality permitting provisions of 42 U.S.C. 7475, 7503, or 7661" and deleted former second, third, and fourth sentences that read: "The time for notification may be extended for 30 days by written agreement of the department and the applicant. Additional 30-day extensions may be granted by the department on request of the applicant. Notification of approval or denial may be served personally or by certified mail on the applicant or the applicant's agent"; inserted (9)(c) requiring the department to notify applicants subject to the provisions of 42 U.S.C. 7475, 7503, or 7661 of its approval or denial of the application within 75 days of receipt of the application; inserted (9)(d) requiring the department to notify applicants subject to the provisions of 75-2-215 of its approval or denial of the application within 75 days of receipt of the application; in (9)(e) near middle after "department shall" inserted requirement that the department prepare a single environment review document for licenses and permits and near end after "act on the" substituted "applications" for "permit application"; inserted (9)(f) providing for 30-day extensions of the time for notification and providing for service of the notification of approval or denial; in temporary version inserted (13) and in version effective July 1, 2005, inserted (12) requiring the board to provide by rule a 30-day period for the public to submit comments on draft air quality permits for applications that are subject to certain federal provisions or state provisions or that require an environmental impact statement; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective March 24, 2003.

Chapter 231 in exception clause in (2) inserted reference to 75-2-234; at end of (11)(a) after "decision" deleted "and there is no request for a hearing under this section" and deleted former second sentence that read: "The filing of a request for a hearing postpones the effective date of the department's decision until the conclusion of the hearing and issuance of a final decision by the board"; inserted (11)(b) providing that filing of hearing request does not stay department's decision and authorizing board to order stay upon receipt of petition and finding that person is entitled to relief or that continuing permit during appeal would cause great or irreparable injury to person requesting stay; inserted (11)(c) allowing board when granting stay to require undertaking by requestor to pay for costs and damages incurred and requiring board to use same procedures and limitations used for injunctions; inserted (14) in temporary version and (13) in version effective July 1, 2005, allowing board to adopt rules for issuance, modification, suspension, revocation, renewal, or creation of general and other permits and authorizing adoption of rules for construction and operation; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective April 4, 2003.

Severability: Section 9, Ch. 231, L. 2003, was a severability clause.

Retroactive Applicability: Section 11, Ch. 231, L. 2003, provided: "[Sections 3 and 4] [75-2-211 and 75-2-218] apply retroactively, within the meaning of 1-2-109, to a request for a hearing or an appeal filed on or after January 1, 2003."

2001 Amendments — Composite Section: Chapter 299 at beginning of (2) and (9)(a) inserted exception clause; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective October 1, 2001.

Chapter 588 in (2) at end after "department" inserted exception clause; and inserted (12) regarding permits for temporary power generation units. Amendment effective May 5, 2001, and terminates July 1, 2005.

Preamble: The preamble attached to Ch. 588, L. 2001, provided: "WHEREAS, the Legislature finds that it is necessary to meet Montana's constitutional mandate of a clean and healthful environment; and

WHEREAS, the Legislature finds it necessary to allow, in certain limited and controlled circumstances, temporary emergency operation of power generation units pending the completion of the state's air quality permitting process, as long as ambient air quality standards are not violated."

Applicability: Section 16, Ch. 299, L. 2001, provided: "[This act] applies to environmental reviews that are begun after [the effective date of this act]." Effective October 1, 2001.

Retroactive Applicability: Section 3, Ch. 588, L. 2001, provided: "[This act] applies retroactively, within the meaning of 1-2-109, to applications filed on or after January 1, 2001."

1999 Amendment: Chapter 221 inserted (5) exempting transfer of permits for portable emission sources from Montana Environmental Policy Act review process; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective March 31, 1999.

1997 Amendment: Chapter 273 inserted (8)(a)(iii) requiring notice within 30 days of issuance of the final environmental impact statement if the application is for a machine, equipment, a device, or a facility at an operation that requires a permit under Title 82, chapter 4, part 1, 2, or 3; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective April 16, 1997.

1995 Amendment: Chapter 85 in (8)(b) inserted second and third sentences providing for extensions of time for notification and additional 30-day extensions; and made minor changes in style.

1993 Amendments: Chapter 502 in (1) substituted "board" for "department", after "shall" inserted "by rule", and after "issuance" inserted "modification"; deleted former (2) that read: "(2) For all sources of air contaminants that are subject to the provisions of Title V of the federal Clean Air Act, 42 U.S.C. 7401, et seq., as amended, the provisions of this section apply in addition to the other applicable provisions of this chapter.

(a) The board shall by rule require that permits issued to sources described in subsection (2) be of limited duration, but it may not limit the duration of the permits beyond that required by the federal Clean Air Act, 42 U.S.C. 7401, et seq., as amended.

(b) The board shall by rule provide for the renewal of permits issued to the sources.

(c) The board shall by rule establish a transition schedule for air quality permits held by sources of air contaminants subject to the provisions of subsection (2). The transition schedule must specify dates for the expiration of the permits, absent an application for renewal by the source. The transition schedule may not specify expiration dates that are earlier in time than those required by Title V of the federal Clean Air Act, 42 U.S.C. 7401, et seq., as amended. The transition schedule established by the board also applies to existing sources of air contaminants that are subject to the provisions of Title V of the federal Clean Air Act, 42 U.S.C. 7401, et seq., as amended, and that do not hold an air quality permit from the department as of November 2, 1992"; deleted former (4) through (9) that read: "(4) Concurrent with the submittal of a permit application required by subsection (3) and annually for the duration of the permit, the applicant shall submit to the department a fee sufficient to cover the reasonable costs, both direct and indirect, of developing and administering the permitting requirements in this chapter, including the reasonable costs of:

(a) reviewing and acting upon the application;

(b) implementing and enforcing the terms and conditions of the permit if the permit is issued. However, this amount does not include any court costs or other costs associated with any enforcement action. If the permit is not issued, the department shall return this portion of the fee to the applicant.

(c) emissions and ambient monitoring;

(d) preparing generally applicable regulations or guidance;
(e) modeling, analysis, and demonstrations; and
(f) preparing inventories and tracking emissions.

(5) In addition to the fee required under subsection (4), the board may order the assessment of additional fees required to fund specific activities of the department that are directed at a particular geographic area if the legislature authorizes the activities and appropriates the funds for the activities, including emissions or ambient monitoring, modeling analysis or demonstrations, or emissions inventories or tracking. Additional assessments may be levied only on those sources that are within or are believed by the department to be impacting the geographic area. Before the board may require the assessments, it shall first determine, after opportunity for hearing, that the activities to be funded are necessary for the administration or implementation of this chapter, that the assessments apportion the required funding in an equitable manner, and that the department has obtained legislative authorization for the expenditure and the necessary appropriation.

(6) As a condition of the continuing validity of permits issued by the department under this part prior to October 1, 1991, the department may require the permitholder to pay an annual fee sufficient to cover the costs identified in subsection (4).

(7) For any existing source of air contaminants that is subject to Title V of the federal Clean Air Act, 42 U.S.C. 7401, et seq., as amended, and that is not required to hold an air quality permit from the department as of October 1, 1991, the board may, as a condition of continued operation, require by rule that the owner or operator of the source pay the annual fee provided for in subsection (4). Nothing in this subsection may be construed as allowing the department to charge any source of air contaminants more than one annual fee that is designed to cover the costs identified in subsection (4).

(8) The fees collected by the department pursuant to this section must be deposited in the state special revenue fund to be appropriated by the legislature to the department for the development and administration of the permitting requirements in this chapter.

(9) (a) The department shall give written notice of the amount of the fee to be assessed and the basis for the department's fee assessment under this section to the owner or operator of the air contaminant source. The owner or operator may appeal the department's fee assessment to the board within 20 days after receipt of the written notice.

(b) An appeal must be based upon the allegation that the fee assessment is erroneous or excessive. An appeal may not be based only on the amount of the fee schedule adopted by the board.

(c) If any part of the fee assessment is not appealed, it must be paid to the department upon receipt of the notice in subsection (9)(a).

(d) The contested case provisions of the Montana Administrative Procedure Act provided for in Title 2, chapter 4, apply to any hearing before the board under this subsection (9)"; inserted (3) relating to permit program requirements; in (7), after "fees", inserted "required under 75-2-220", after "subsections" inserted "(2)", and after "(3)" substituted "and (6)" for "through (7) and (12)"; in (8)(a) and (8)(b), near beginning, substituted "preparation" for "compilation"; in (8)(a), after "Act", inserted "Title 75, chapter 1, parts 1 through 3"; in (8)(a)(i), before "receipt", inserted "department's"; in (8)(a)(i) and (8)(b) substituted "provided in subsection (7)" for "defined in subsection (13)"; in (8)(b), before "certified mail", deleted "registered or"; inserted (8)(d) relating to Department failure to act and judicial remedies; in (9), in first sentence after "request", inserted "a hearing before the board. The request for hearing must be filed", in second sentence, after "decision", substituted "and must include an" for "upon" and after "grounds" substituted "for the request" for "therefor, a hearing before the board", and substituted third sentence relating to contested case hearing for former third sentence that read: "A hearing shall be held under the provisions of the Montana Administrative Procedure Act"; in (10), after "elapsed", inserted "from the date of the decision"; and made minor changes in style.

Chapter 639 in (8)(b), near beginning, substituted "preparation" for "compilation" and near end, before "certified mail", deleted "registered or"; inserted (8)(c) providing that a permit application for construction, installation, alteration, or use of a source required to obtain a license under 75-10-221 or a permit under 75-10-406 must be acted on within the time stated in 75-2-215(2)(e); and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective May 13, 1993.

Style changes in (8) were slightly different in the two chapters. The codifier chose the more appropriate of the two.

Retroactive Applicability: Section 23(1), Ch. 502, L. 1993, provided that 75-2-220(7) applies retroactively to all permits issued by the Department of Health and Environmental Sciences (now Department of Environmental Quality) pursuant to Title 75, chapter 2, prior to October 1, 1993. Section 23(2) provided that subsection (2) of 75-2-211, subsections (2) and (3) of 75-2-217, and subsection (8) of 75-2-220 apply retroactively to all activities identified in those subsections that are not subject to a permit issued by the Department of Health and Environmental Sciences (now Department of Environmental Quality) pursuant to Title 75, chapter 2, as of October 1, 1993.

Section 9, Ch. 639, L. 1993, provided: "(1) [This act] applies retroactively, within the meaning of 1-2-109, to all commercial medical waste incinerators that have applied for but have not received by [the effective date of this act] [effective May 13, 1993] a permit under Title 75, chapter 2, and a license under 75-10-221.

(2) [This act] applies retroactively, within the meaning of 1-2-109, to all commercial hazardous waste incinerators that have applied for but not received by [the effective date of this act] [effective May 13, 1993] a permit under Title 75, chapter 2, and a permit under 75-10-406."

Effective Dates: Section 24(2), Ch. 502, L. 1993, provided that 75-2-105, 75-2-204, 75-2-211, 75-2-217 through 75-2-220, subsections (1) and (3) of 75-2-221, 75-2-301, 75-2-401, 75-2-412, 75-2-413, and 75-2-421 are effective October 1, 1993, but that the Board and Department may adopt rules under these sections upon passage and approval. Approved April 24, 1993. Rules adopted to implement these sections may not be effective before October 1, 1993.

Severability: Section 8, Ch. 639, L. 1993, was a severability clause.

1991 Amendment: (Temporary version) At end of (1) substituted "part" for "section"; in (2), after "construction", substituted "installation, or alteration begins or as a condition of use" for "begins", after "air pollutants" deleted "and not later than 120 days before installation, alteration, or use begins", and at end deleted "and pay to the department a fee sufficient to cover:

(a) the reasonable costs of reviewing and acting upon the application for such permit; and

(b) the reasonable costs of implementing and enforcing the terms and conditions of such permit if the permit is granted (not including any court costs or other costs associated with any enforcement action). The fee shall be deposited in the state special revenue fund to be used by the department for administration of this section"; inserted (3) concerning annual fee to cover permitting requirements; inserted (4) concerning assessment of additional fees to fund specific activities; inserted (5) concerning validity of permits issued before October 1, 1991; inserted (6) concerning fee for certain air contaminant sources not required to obtain a permit; inserted (7) providing for deposit and appropriation of fees; inserted (8) providing for notice and appeal of fee assessment; in (12), after "submitted all", inserted "fees and" and after "subsections" extended reference to subsections (4), (5), (6), and (11); and in (13)(a)(i) and (b) changed subsection reference.

(Version effective November 1, 1992) At end of (1) substituted "part" for "section"; inserted (2) providing for limited duration air quality permits for sources of air contaminants subject to the federal Clean Air Act; in (3), after "construction", substituted "installation, or alteration begins or as a condition of use" for "begins", after "air pollutants" deleted "and not later than 120 days before installation, alteration, or use begins", and at end deleted "and pay to the department a fee sufficient to cover:

(a) the reasonable costs of reviewing and acting upon the application for such permit; and

(b) the reasonable costs of implementing and enforcing the terms and conditions of such permit if the permit is granted (not including any court costs or other costs associated with any enforcement action). The fee shall be deposited in the state special revenue fund to be used by the department for administration of this section"; inserted (4) concerning annual fee to cover permitting requirements; inserted (5) concerning assessment of additional fees to fund specific activities; inserted (6) concerning validity of permits issued before October 1, 1991; inserted (7) concerning fee for certain air contaminant sources not required to obtain a permit; inserted (8) providing for deposit and appropriation of fees; inserted (9) providing for notice and appeal of fee assessment; in (13), after "submitted all", inserted "fees and" and after "subsections" deleted reference to subsection (2) and extended reference to subsections (4), (6), (7), and (12); and in (14)(a)(i) and (14)(b) changed subsection reference.

1991 Statement of Intent: The statement of intent attached to Ch. 652, L. 1991, provided: "A statement of intent is required for this bill because [section 1] [75-2-111] requires the board of health and environmental sciences [now board of environmental review] to adopt by rule fees for air quality permit applications. The purpose of this bill is to allow the collection of an ongoing annual fee to cover the costs associated with the development and administration, including implementation and enforcement, of an air quality permitting program. While there is a need for a fee system to cover these costs, it is not the legislature's intent that these fees be used to recover other costs not delineated in this bill. The legislature recognizes that the identification of actual costs associated with specific permits and permitting activities may be difficult and envisions that a fee schedule may be established with generic applicability. This may result in fees for classes of sources according to the type or amount of emissions or the type of source. For example, it may be determined that the costs associated with the development and administration of a permitting program vary directly with the amount or type of regulated pollutants emitted. In such a case, a fee based upon the tons of a regulated pollutant emitted may be appropriate. The board's rules defining the fee structure to be used by the department shall ensure that the fees charged will not collect, in the aggregate, more than is authorized and appropriated by the legislature to the department for the development and administration of the permitting program.

This bill also clarifies the authority of the department of health and environmental sciences [now department of environmental quality] to issue an operating permit for air contaminant sources. It is the legislature's intent that all air contaminant sources operating within the state obtain an operating permit, including those sources that are "grandfathered" under current air quality regulations. Reasonable exemptions from this requirement may be approved by the board and implemented based upon the size or nature of the source or its emissions.

For sources of air contaminants that are subject to Title V of the federal Clean Air Act, 42 U.S.C. 7401, et seq., as amended, the board may provide for the expiration and renewal of permits issued to those sources, as necessary to meet the requirements of Title V. To provide for the orderly transition to Title V permits for both current permitholders and grandfathered sources, the board shall establish a transition schedule. The transition schedule may not specify dates for obtaining Title V permits that are earlier than the times contained in the Act.

This bill also allows for the assessment of those fees necessary to fund activities of the department that are intended to address specific air quality problems in the state if the legislature authorizes the activities and appropriates the funds for the activities. For example, it may be necessary to conduct additional ambient monitoring in a particular geographic area in order to determine the compliance status of that area with applicable ambient air quality standards. The legislature intends that this provision be used only to fund those activities that examine specific problems in particular geographic areas. The assessments for funding should be levied in an equitable fashion and only upon those sources whose emissions are both of the type being focused upon and thought to impact the geographic area."

Retroactive Applicability: Section 3, Ch. 652, L. 1991, provided: "(1) [Subsections (2) and (6) [subsection (5) of temporary version] of section 2] [75-2-211] apply retroactively, within the meaning of 1-2-109, to all permits issued by the department of health and environmental sciences [now department of environmental quality] pursuant to Title 75, chapter 2, and prior to [the effective date of those subsections [November 1, 1992, for subsection (2) and October 1, 1991, for subsection (6) (which is subsection (5) of temporary version)]].

(2) [Subsections (2), (3), and (7) [subsections (2) and (6) of temporary version] of section 2] [75-2-211] apply retroactively, within the meaning of 1-2-109, to all uses identified in those subsections that are not subject to a permit issued by the department of health and environmental sciences [now department of environmental quality] pursuant to Title 75, chapter 2, as of [the effective dates of those subsections]." Subsection (2) of 75-2-211 effective November 1, 1992, and subsections (3), (6), and (7) [subsections (2), (5), and (6) of temporary version] of 75-2-211 effective October 1, 1991.

Effective Date — Rulemaking Authority: Section 4, Ch. 652, L. 1991, provided: "(1) [Section 1 [75-2-111], subsections (1) and (3) through (16) [subsections (1) through (15) of temporary version] of section 2 [75-2-211], section 3, and this section] are effective October 1, 1991, but the department may proceed with the rulemaking process under Title 2, chapter 4, prior to that date. The effective date of any rule adopted to implement those parts of [this act] may be effective no earlier than October 1, 1991.

(2) [Subsection (2) of section 2] [75-2-211] is effective November 1, 1992, but the department may proceed with the rulemaking process under Title 2, chapter 4, prior to that date. The effective date of any rule adopted to implement those parts of [this act] may be effective no earlier than November 1, 1992."

1983 Amendments: Chapter 196, in (6), after "(3), and" substituted "(5)" for "(4)"; in (7)(a)(i) and (7)(b), after "subsection" substituted "(6)" for "(5)"; in (7)(a)(i), inserted "if the department prepares the environmental impact statement; or"; inserted (7)(a)(ii) requiring the Department to notify an applicant in writing of approval or denial of permit within 30 days after a final environmental impact statement has been issued by a nondepartment agency designated by the Governor; and rearranged phrases.

Chapter 277, in (2)(b), substituted reference to state special revenue fund for reference to earmarked revenue fund.

Case Notes

Burden of Proof on Party Asserting Claim in Contested Case Hearing to Present Evidence That Department Decision Violated Law: Plaintiffs requested a hearing before the Board of Environmental Review, contending that an air quality permit issued by the Department of Environmental Quality for a coal-fired power plant and the application for the permit suffered from various procedural and substantive deficiencies. The Board held a contested case hearing and, after establishing that plaintiffs had the burden of proof, approved the Department's decision to grant the permit. On appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed that, as the party asserting the claim in the contested case, plaintiffs had the burden of presenting evidence necessary to establish the fact that the Department's decision violated the law. Mont. Envtl. Information Center v. Dept. of Environmental Quality, 2005 MT 96, 326 M 502, 112 P3d 964 (2005).

Department Analysis of Visibility Impacts Required in Issuance of Air Quality Permit — Deference to Federal Land Manager Information Error: Although federal land managers (FLMs) have responsibility to protect visibility in Class I areas, the Department of Environmental Quality may not simply defer to the conclusions of FLMs regarding visibility impacts in Class I areas. The Department's own administrative rules preclude the issuance of an air quality permit unless the applicant affirmatively demonstrates to the Department that a proposed project will not contribute to an adverse visibility impact in Class I areas. Therefore, the Department must make its own independent determination of the visibility issue based on the information presented, including comments from the FLMs. Mont. Envtl. Information Center v. Dept. of Environmental Quality, 2005 MT 96, 326 M 502, 112 P3d 964 (2005).

Improper Standard of Review Applied by Board of Environmental Review in Contested Case Hearing — Remand: Plaintiffs requested a hearing before the Board of Environmental Review, contending that an air quality permit issued by the Department of Environmental Quality for a coal-fired power plant and the application for the permit suffered from various procedural and substantive deficiencies. The Board held a contested case hearing, addressed plaintiffs' contentions whether the Department's decision was erroneous, arbitrary, capricious, or an abuse of discretion, and approved the Department's decision to grant the permit. Plaintiffs petitioned for judicial review of the Board's order, and the District Court affirmed the Board's findings, conclusions, and order. On appeal, the Supreme Court noted that hearings related to the issuance of an air quality permit must be conducted under the contested case provisions of Title 2, ch. 4, part 6, rather than part 7, which sets out the standard of judicial review. The role of the Board was to receive evidence from the parties, enter findings of fact based on a preponderance of the evidence, and then enter conclusions of law based on the findings. The determination of whether an agency decision is erroneous, arbitrary, capricious, or an abuse of discretion is the role of the District Court. Thus, the Board applied a standard of review not legally available to it as the finder of fact in a contested case hearing. The District Court erred in determining that the Board applied the correct standard, so the case was remanded with instructions that the Board enter new findings of fact and conclusions of law in conformity with Title 2, ch. 4, part 6. Mont. Envtl. Information Center v. Dept. of Environmental Quality, 2005 MT 96, 326 M 502, 112 P3d 964 (2005).

Challenge of Environmental Assessment — No Jurisdiction for Administrative Review: A grain company sought a permit to build a high-speed grain loading terminal near Pompeys Pillar national monument. The permit was granted and plaintiff, a nonprofit association supporting the monument's preservation, began administrative proceedings in an effort to overturn the permit issuance on grounds that the Department of Environmental Quality erred in its preparation of the environmental assessment related to the permit. An administrative law judge concluded that the Department acted arbitrarily and capriciously by issuing a permit without preparing an environmental impact statement. The Department filed exceptions to the administrative law judge's conclusions with the Board of Environmental Review. The Board ultimately affirmed the Department's decision to issue the permit, and plaintiff appealed to District Court. The Department contended that because the challenge to the administrative decisions did not contain any air quality issues, but only addressed environmental assessment issues governed by the Montana Environmental Policy Act (MEPA), and that because MEPA does not provide for administrative review of challenges to MEPA compliance, the administrative law judge and the Board did not have jurisdiction to preside over the appeal, nor did the District Court have jurisdiction to review the administrative proceedings. The District Court agreed and dismissed plaintiff's petition for lack of subject matter jurisdiction. Plaintiff appealed, but the Supreme Court affirmed. Had plaintiff challenged air quality issues, it would have been entitled to administrative proceedings. However, plaintiff's challenge pertained only to issues related to the environmental assessment, which is governed by MEPA. MEPA requires that a compliance challenge be brought in District Court, rather than through administrative proceedings. Thus, the administrative law judge and the Board did not have jurisdiction to preside over the appeal, nor did the District Court have jurisdiction to review the administrative proceedings. Plaintiff's petition was properly dismissed. Pompeys Pillar Historical Ass'n v. Dept. of Environmental Quality, 2002 MT 352, 313 M 401, 61 P3d 148 (2002).

Delegation of Authority — Constitutional: Although 75-2-203 and 75-2-211 grant broad powers to the Board of Health and Environmental Sciences (now Board of Environmental Review), this delegation is not unconstitutional. Air pollution control is an emerging field for which detailed and precise standards have not been fully developed, and the authority granted must necessarily be phrased broadly. State ex rel. Dept. of Health and Environmental Sciences v. Lincoln County, 178 M 410, 584 P2d 1293, 35 St. Rep. 1402 (1978).

75-2-215. Solid or hazardous waste incineration — additional permit requirements.

Compiler's Comments

2001 Amendment: Chapter 354 in (3)(b) substituted "7-1-4127" for "7-1-4127(2) and 7-1-4128(2)". Amendment effective October 1, 2001.

1993 Amendments: Chapter 129 in (1), at beginning, inserted "Until the department has issued an air quality permit pursuant to 75-2-211 that includes the conditions required by this section", after "construct" substituted "install, alter, or use" for "modify, or operate", and after "incinerator" substituted "or a boiler or industrial furnace subject to the provisions of 75-10-406, except as provided in subsection (2)" for part of (1) and former (1)(a) and (1)(b) that read: "of any of the following categories until the department has issued an air quality permit pursuant to this chapter, including the conditions provided in this section:

(a) a new solid or hazardous waste incinerator that is designed to burn more than 200 pounds an hour of solid or hazardous waste; or

(b) an existing or permitted solid or hazardous waste incinerator that is designed to burn more than 200 pounds an hour of solid or hazardous waste and that incinerates or would incinerate solid or hazardous waste in an amount, form, kind, or content different from its designed or permitted operation or that incinerates or would incinerate any solid or hazardous waste that changes the nature, character, or composition of its emissions"; inserted (2)

subjecting an existing or permitted incinerator or boiler or furnace to air quality permitting only under certain conditions; in (3)(a)(i), after "existing", substituted "emission source" for "incineration"; in (3)(a)(ii), after "solid or hazardous waste", inserted "or the use of hazardous waste as fuel for a boiler or industrial furnace"; inserted (5) allowing the Board to provide for general air quality permits by rule; in (6), after "incinerator", inserted "or a boiler or industrial furnace"; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective March 19, 1993.

Chapter 639 inserted (3)(b) and (3)(c) stating that the Department may not issue a permit to a facility described in subsection (1) if a license is required under 75-10-221 or a permit is required under 75-10-406 until the applicant has published at least three notices and the Department has held a public hearing; and inserted (3)(e) providing that the Department may not issue a permit to a facility described in subsection (1) until the Department has issued a license under 75-10-221 or a permit under 75-10-406 if a license or permit is required and stating that the license issuance decision must be within 30 days of issuance of a 75-10-221 license or a 75-10-406 permit or within 90 days after receipt of a complete application for a permit or permit alteration under 75-2-211 and this section, whichever is later. Amendment effective May 13, 1993.

1993 Statement of Intent: The statement of intent attached to Ch. 129, L. 1993, provided: "It is the intent of the legislature that the statutory size cutoff for incinerators that burn 200 pounds or less per hour, as provided for in 75-2-215, be eliminated and that the requirements of 75-2-215 be extended to boilers and industrial furnaces. As a result, the requirements of 75-2-215 would apply to all incinerators and all boilers and industrial furnaces subject to 75-10-406, regardless of size. In order to lessen the burden on the department of health and environmental sciences [now department of environmental quality], the board of health and environmental sciences [now board of environmental review] may provide by rule for general permits that apply to classes or categories of sources subject to the requirements of 75-2-215. The board shall use this authority to the greatest extent possible, consistent with its obligation to protect public health and the environment.

It is also the intent of the legislature to clarify the provisions of 75-2-215 by amending the definitions in 75-2-103. The definition of incinerator contains no reference to end use or economic value of the feed, but rather focuses on the process employed. The definition of solid waste is intended to be more encompassing than the use of that definition elsewhere in Title 75, and the reference to "marketable byproducts" contained in other definitions is intentionally omitted. The overriding purpose of this bill is to protect air quality, public health, and the physical environment, and the legislature does not believe it appropriate to draw distinctions in applicability based upon whether or not the incineration activity is, for example, associated with waste disposal or volume reduction in conjunction with recycling."

Section 8, Ch. 639, L. 1993, was a severability clause.

Retroactive Applicability: Section 9, Ch. 639, L. 1993, provided: "(1) [This act] applies retroactively, within the meaning of 1-2-109, to all commercial medical waste incinerators that have applied for but have not received by [the effective date of this act] [effective May 13, 1993] a permit under Title 75, chapter 2, and a license under 75-10-221.

(2) [This act] applies retroactively, within the meaning of 1-2-109, to all commercial hazardous waste incinerators that have applied for but not received by [the effective date of this act] [effective May 13, 1993] a permit under Title 75, chapter 2, and a permit under 75-10-406."

1991 Amendment: Throughout section, after "solid", inserted "or hazardous"; in (1), near beginning before "operate", inserted "construct, modify, or"; in (1)(a), after "new", deleted "commercial" and after "incinerator" inserted "that is designed to burn more than 200 pounds an hour of solid or hazardous waste"; in (1)(b), at beginning before "permitted", inserted "an existing or", after "incinerator" inserted "that is designed to burn more than 200 pounds an hour of solid or hazardous waste", in two places, before "would", inserted "incinerates or", near middle, before "permitted", inserted "designed or", and after "any" substituted "solid or hazardous waste" for "material"; in (3), near beginning before "procedures", inserted "other operating", after "necessary to" deleted "satisfy the determination required under subsection (2)(c). The equipment, engineering, or procedures must", after "provide" deleted "particulate and gaseous emission", after "reductions" inserted "of air pollutants, including hazardous air pollutants", and after "technology" deleted "in addition to any other controls necessary to satisfy the determination required under subsection (2)(c)"; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective April 24, 1991.

1991 Statement of Intent: The statement of intent attached to Ch. 605, L. 1991, provided: "It is the intent of the legislature that the department of health and environmental sciences [now department of environmental quality] not issue an air quality permit for any new solid waste incinerator that is designed to burn more than 200 pounds an hour of solid waste and not authorize any existing or permitted solid waste incinerator that is designed to burn more than 200 pounds an hour of solid waste to change the amount, form, or content of the solid waste it incinerates or to incinerate any solid waste that would change the nature, character, or composition of its emissions until the department and the public have the necessary information to understand the composition and concentrations of emissions. It is also the intent of the legislature that the department apply the concept of best available control technology to all air pollutants, including hazardous air pollutants, when considering a permit application or modification for a solid waste incinerator. The legislature intends that these additional permit requirements be extended to hazardous waste incinerators as well. It is also the intent of the legislature that the department develop a reasonable and practical health risk assessment-based definition of the term "negligible risk" as used in 75-2-215(2)(c)."

1989 Statement of Intent: The statement of intent attached to Ch. 696, L. 1989, provided: "It is the intent of the legislature that the department of health and environmental sciences [now department of environmental quality] adopt rules establishing procedures for the determination and collection of the solid waste management fee provided for in [section 1] [75-10-115] and for the waiver of the fee when consistent with the criteria provided in [section 1(2)] [75-10-115(2)]. It is the intent of the legislature that the department be able to use this fee to bolster its solid waste management program in a manner, including the hiring of adequate staff, that will:

(1) protect the public health, welfare, and safety and the environment of Montana;

(2) provide assistance to local governments in meeting the pending federal solid waste management requirements;

(3) develop an effective and coordinated regional approach to solid waste management in Montana; and

(4) ensure a state and local capability to effectively manage the importation of solid waste into Montana for disposal purposes.

It is the intent of the legislature that the department of health and environmental sciences [now department of environmental quality] waive the fee for interregional solid waste incineration or disposal in situations where the incineration or disposal is consistent with state solid waste management goals and results in equivalent or improved protection of Montana's public health, safety, welfare, and environment when compared to the alternative of intraregional incineration or disposal. The incineration or disposal of solid waste at a licensed facility in the manner and quantity incinerated or disposed of before [the effective date of this act] [May 22, 1989] is exempt from the solid waste management fee and from the requirement for local government approval under [section 6] [75-10-218, now repealed].

It is the intent of the legislature that the department of health and environmental sciences [now department of environmental quality] not issue an air quality permit for any new commercial incinerator of solid waste and not authorize any existing incinerator to change the amount, form, kind, or content of the material it incinerates or to incinerate any material that would change the nature, character, or composition of the emissions until the department and the public have necessary information to understand the composition and concentrations of the emissions and until the emissions and projected ambient concentrations are known to constitute a negligible risk to the public health, safety, and welfare and to the environment. For a permitted solid waste incinerator, the department shall consider an increase in the amount of medical waste incinerated as sufficient to trigger the additional permit and review requirements provided in [section 5] [75-2-215], including consideration of emissions of hydrochloric acid, compounds deriving from plastic incineration, and other hazardous air pollutants."

1995 Amendment: Chapter 498 in (1), near beginning of first sentence after "potential", substituted "emission" for "formation"; in (1)(a), near middle after "potential", substituted "emission" for "creation" and after "furans" deleted "heavy metals"; in (1)(b), after "emission rate", deleted "except when best available control technology is adequate", after "prevent" inserted "the public health risk from air emissions or ambient concentrations from", after "exceeding the" inserted "negligible risk standard required by 75-2-215 and any applicable federal", after "allowable" deleted "daily", and at end substituted "hazardous air pollutants" for "carcinogens"; in (1)(d)(i), after "including", inserted "heavy metals and" and after "furans" deleted "heavy metals"; in (3), near middle after "risk from", inserted "air emissions or ambient concentrations of", after "heavy metals, and other" substituted "hazardous air pollutants will not exceed the negligible risk standard required by 75-2-215 and any applicable" for "carcinogens will not exceed appropriate", and after "allowable" deleted "daily"; in (4)(a) and (4)(b), after "allowable", deleted "daily"; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective April 14, 1995.

1995 Statement of Intent: The statement of intent attached to Ch. 498, L. 1995, provided: "A statement of intent is required for this bill because the bill gives the department authority to adopt administrative rules that specify meteorologic conditions that necessitate cessation of the burning of hazardous waste at a commercial hazardous waste incinerator if site-specific monitoring determines that inversion conditions exist."

It is the intent of the legislature that the department coordinate the application review process and issuance of permits between the air quality bureau and the solid and hazardous waste bureau for incinerators that must receive both an air quality permit and a solid waste management license or a hazardous waste permit. In coordinating the permitting process of these two bureaus, the department shall also coordinate the environmental review process conducted pursuant to Title 75, chapter 1, part 1. At the discretion of the department, this coordination may be accomplished by preparing a joint environmental review document.

The legislature has not provided for definitions of lowest achievable emission rate and best available control technology in this legislation. It is the intent of the legislature that these terms be construed and applied in a manner that is consistent with the definitions contained in the federal Clean Air Act, 42 U.S.C. 7401, et seq. In adopting rules to implement this legislation, the board shall include rules defining these terms.

Finally, the legislature understands that the retroactive applicability of this bill will subject permit applicants, who have begun but not completed the permitting process, to the provisions of this bill. While the legislature understands that compliance with the provisions of this bill will require additional time and resources from the applicant, it is not the intent of the legislature that this legislation unnecessarily delay the permitting process or unnecessarily increase the permitting costs."

Compiler's Comments

2001 Amendment: Chapter 536 in (3)(a)(i) at beginning substituted "subject to subsection (4), provides by rule, ordinance" for "provides by ordinance"; in (3)(b) near beginning after "approval of" substituted "a rule, ordinance" for "an ordinance" and at end substituted "subsection (4)" for "75-2-207"; inserted (4) allowing a local air pollution control program to adopt a rule, ordinance, or local law that is more stringent than comparable state or federal regulation or guidelines only under certain circumstances; inserted (13) requiring that local air pollution control programs provide procedures for public notice, public hearing, public comment, and appeal for any proposed new or revised rules, ordinances, or local laws and providing requirements for those procedures; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective May 1, 2001.

Applicability: Section 3, Ch. 536, L. 2001, provided: "[Section 2] [75-2-301] does not apply to proposals for new rules, ordinances, or local laws that have been noticed to the public and submitted to the local air pollution control program governing body before [the effective date of this act]." Effective May 1, 2001.

1995 Amendment: Chapter 471 inserted (3)(b) concerning Board approval of ordinance more stringent than state law; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective April 14, 1995.

Applicability: Section 22(3), Ch. 471, L. 1995, provided: "(3) [This act] does not apply to the establishment of fees or public participation requirements."

1993 Amendment: Chapter 502 in (3)(a) inserted "75-2-217 through 75-2-219"; in second sentence of (3)(c), after "provisions of", substituted "75-2-220" for "75-2-211"; in (4), (5), and two places in (9), after "air", substituted "pollutant" for "contaminant"; and made minor changes in style.

Effective Dates: Section 24(2), Ch. 502, L. 1993, provided that 75-2-105, 75-2-204, 75-2-211, 75-2-217 through 75-2-220, subsections (1) and (3) of 75-2-221, 75-2-301, 75-2-401, 75-2-412, 75-2-413, and 75-2-421 are effective October 1, 1993, but that the Board and Department may adopt rules under these sections upon passage and approval. Approved April 24, 1993. Rules adopted to implement these sections may not be effective before October 1, 1993.

1991 Amendment: In (1), at beginning, inserted "After public hearing", after "establish" inserted "and administer", near middle, after "control program", deleted "on being petitioned by 15% of the qualified electors in its jurisdiction and", and at end, after "board", deleted remainder of former subsection that read: "after a public hearing conducted under 75-2-111, may thereafter administer in its jurisdiction the air pollution control program which:

(a) provides by ordinance or local law for requirements compatible with, more stringent, or more extensive than those imposed by 75-2-203, 75-2-212, and 75-2-402 and rules issued under these sections;

(b) provides for the enforcement of these requirements by appropriate administrative and judicial process; and

(c) provides for administrative organization, staff, financial, and other resources necessary to effectively and efficiently carry out its program"; inserted (2) requiring county and municipal approval of a county program that encompasses all or part of a municipality; inserted (3) establishing program criteria; inserted (4) excepting the grant of authority of a program to control certain air contaminant sources, except in emergencies; in (6), near beginning after "believe that", inserted "any part of"; in (7), near beginning after "determines that", inserted "any part of"; in (8), at end of first sentence, inserted "including the terms contained in any applicable board order, that are necessary to correct the deficiencies found by the board", in third sentence substituted "department's action is" for "program shall be", and at end substituted "jurisdiction" for "municipality or county"; in (10), near beginning after "administers", inserted "all or part of" and changed subsection references; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective March 20, 1991.

Case Notes

Standing of Local Air Pollution Control Board to Challenge Validity of State Administrative Rules: A local pollution control board is a person within the statutory definition in 2-4-102, and in the same way as a citizen of a local area is more particularly affected by actions of the state Board of Environmental Review than is a citizen of another area, the interest of a local board is distinguishable from and greater than the interest of the public generally. Because of threatened injury to a local board in the form of potential economic harm from additional expenses necessary to implement state administrative rules, a local board has standing to challenge the validity of administrative rules concerning air pollution applicable within its area of jurisdiction. Missoula City-County Air Pollution Control Bd. v. Bd. of Envtl. Review, 282 M 255, 937 P2d 463, 54 St. Rep. 338 (1997), followed in Mont. Envtl. Information Center v. Case Notes

Appeal Rendered Moot by Filing Similar Action in Proper County: Petitioner's appeal from a dismissal of a petition seeking review of a decision of the Board of Health and Environmental Sciences (now Board of Environmental Review) on the grounds that the petition had been filed in the wrong county was rendered moot when the petitioner subsequently filed a petition in the proper county seeking review of the identical issues. On appeal the petitioner was seeking reversal so as to permit venue to be transferred to the proper county, and petitioner has therefore received the relief it now requests. N. Plains Resource Council v. Bd. of Health & Environmental Sciences, 184 M 466, 603 P2d 684, 36 St. Rep. 2174 (1979).

Judicial Review Limited to County Court of Situs of Affected Property: To comply with the Clean Air Act of Montana, a petition for judicial review of an order of the Board of Health and Environmental Sciences (now Board of Environmental Review) granting a preconstruction permit for two power generating stations in Rosebud County could only have been filed and determined in Rosebud County. N. Plains Resource Council v. Bd. of Health & Environmental Sciences, 184 M 466, 603 P2d 684, 36 St. Rep. 2174 (1979).

Procedure for Judicial Review Under Administrative Procedure Act Not Controlling: Although the Montana Administrative Procedure Act provides generally for judicial review, the provisions of 2-4-702 exclude any possible conflict with the procedure set out in this section. It is the intent of the legislature that the rules establish standards and procedures consistent with federal law for accreditation of asbestos-related occupations and control of the work performed by persons in any asbestos-related occupation, including the setting of allowable levels of indoor airborne asbestos. It is the intent of the legislature that the rules for asbestos in indoor air include standards for the use of air monitoring for:

(1) evaluation of asbestos-containing materials in buildings; and

(2) completion and reoccupancy after an asbestos project.

WHEREAS, people exposed to airborne asbestos fibers suffer significantly increased rates of lung cancer, mesothelioma, and other diseases; and

WHEREAS, to prevent unnecessary public exposure to asbestos fibers it is necessary to regulate and establish criteria for asbestos abatement practices and to require statewide standards for training and accreditation of asbestos workers."

Advisory Committee: Section 8, Ch. 581, L. 1989, provided: "(1) An advisory committee is created to coordinate and advise the department on the formulation of rules to be promulgated by the department under [sections 3 and 4] [75-2-503 and 75-2-504]. This advisory committee consists of at least one representative from the following:

(a) asbestos manufacturing and construction industries;

(b) asbestos suppliers;

(c) building industries;

(d) labor organizations;

(e) employers with employees involved in on-premises asbestos abatement; and

(f) other individuals as considered appropriate by the department.

(2) The advisory committee must be abolished upon final adoption of rules provided for in [sections 3 and 4] [75-2-503 and 75-2-504]."

Montana Radon Control Act

Part Compiler's Comments
Preamble: The preamble attached to Ch. 527, L. 1993, provided: "WHEREAS, radon is an odorless, colorless, tasteless, radioactive gas that occurs naturally in soil gas, underground water, and outdoor air;

WHEREAS, radon gas enters homes and buildings through exposures in foundations, decays to form radon progeny, and, unless exposed to the atmosphere, accumulates in structures and becomes hazardous to human health;

WHEREAS, prolonged exposure to elevated concentrations of radon decay products has been associated with increases in the risk of lung cancer;

WHEREAS, only four states in the country rank higher than Montana in the percentage of homes that exceed the United States Environmental Protection Agency action guidance of 4 picocuries per liter;

WHEREAS, property owners in affected areas should have their residences and other buildings tested to determine radon levels;

WHEREAS, property owners do contract for services to measure and reduce radon levels in specific buildings;

WHEREAS, other states' experiences with radon testing and with mitigation companies have proved that the possibility exists for fraudulent operations;

WHEREAS, public education and access to information concerning radon will protect the public health; and

WHEREAS, notification of the presence of radon to persons acquiring or selling real estate will protect the public health.

THEREFORE, the Legislature of the State of Montana finds it essential to protect the public health, safety, and welfare through public education concerning radon and through real estate transaction notification and to provide for recognition of a United States Environmental Protection Agency proficiency listing for persons who provide radon testing and mitigation services."

CHAPTER 5
WATER QUALITY

Chapter Administrative Rules

Title 17, chapter 30, ARM Water quality.

Chapter Case Notes

EPA Regulations Granting "Treatment as State" Status to Develop Water Standards Within Flathead Indian Reservation Upheld: In 1987, Congress added section 518(e) to the Clean Water Act, which authorized the Environmental Protection Agency (EPA) to permit Indian tribes "to be treated as a state" (TAS) for purposes of promulgating water quality standards. In 1992, the Confederated Salish and Kootenai Tribes (tribes) applied for TAS status for all surface waters within the Flathead Indian Reservation. Montana opposed the EPA's grant of TAS status to the tribes because it would extend to lands and surface water within reservation boundaries owned in fee by nontribal members. After the EPA Director, upon determining that the tribes possessed inherent authority over nonmembers on fee land, approved the tribes' TAS application, Montana filed suit, arguing that the EPA's regulations granting TAS status to all sources of pollutant emissions within the boundaries of the Flathead Indian Reservation permitted the tribes to exercise broader authority over nonmembers than the inherent tribal powers recognized as necessary to self-governance. The District Court granted summary judgment to the EPA and tribes. In affirming the District Court decision, the Ninth Circuit Court, citing its previous holdings in Mont. v. U.S., 450 US 544 (1981), and Strate v. A-1 Contractors, 520 US 438, 137 L Ed 2d 661, 117 S Ct 1404 (1997), ruled that based upon the finding that the activities of the nonmembers posed such a serious and substantial threat to tribal health and welfare, the EPA's decision to grant the tribes TAS authority was valid and reflected the appropriate application of inherent tribal regulatory authority over nonconsenting nonmembers. Mont. v. U.S. Envtl. Protection Agency, 137 F3d 1135 (9th Cir. 1998), certiorari denied, 142 L Ed 2d 227, 119 S Ct 275 (1998).

Part Case Notes

Unenforceability of Buy-Sell Agreement on Grounds of Impossibility or Impracticality of Performance — Requiring Performance of Contract With Potential for Environmental Degradation Unconstitutional: Cape-France Enterprises (Cape-France) entered a buy-sell agreement with Peed (now deceased) and Moore to purchase some property near Bozeman for a subdivision. Before the subdivision could be completed, water needed to be procured for the site. According to the agreement, as buyers, Peed and Moore were responsible to bring water to the property, but because city water was not available, a well needed to be drilled. However, the presence of a pollution plume was discovered near the land. After the subdivision process was commenced, the Department of Environmental Quality notified Cape-France that: (1) the plume may have advanced under the property; (2) a subdivision would not be approved unless a well was drilled and tested; (3) a well could be drilled, but if testing showed pollution in the water, treatment would be extensive; and (4) if drilling or pumping of the water caused expansion of the pollution, then Cape-France, as owner of the property, would be held liable for cleanup costs. On cross-motions for summary judgment, the District Court held that the buy-sell agreement could be rescinded on the basis of mutual mistake of fact and impossibility or impracticality of performance and that specific performance would not be granted. The Supreme Court affirmed. A court may determine that an act is impossible in legal contemplation when it is not practicable, when the act can be done only at an excessive, unreasonable, and unbargained-for cost. The doctrine of impossibility or impracticability is applied when, aside from the object of a contract being unlawful, the public policy underlying the strict performance of the contract is outweighed by the senselessness of requiring performance. The doctrine is not limited to cases of literal impossibility but may also be applied in cases that present a potential for substantial and unbargained-for damages. In this case, requiring Cape-France to go forward with the performance of the contract when there was a very real possibility of substantial environmental degradation and resultant financial liability for cleanup was not in the public interest or in the interests of the contracting parties and was not in accord with the guarantee of a clean and healthful environment in Art. II, sec. 3, Mont. Const., or the mandate to maintain and improve a clean and healthful environment for present and future generations in Art. IX, sec. 1, Mont. Const. Thus, rescission of the contract was proper. Cape-France Enterprises v. Estate of Peed, 2001 MT 139, 305 M 513, 29 P3d 1011 (2001). See also Smith v. Zepp, 173 M 358, 567 P2d 923

(1977), and Mont. Envtl. Information Center v. Dept. of Environmental Quality, 1999 MT 248, 296 M 207, 988 P2d 1236 (1999).

Department of Health Grant of Water Quality Certification — Board of Health Jurisdiction to Reconsider — Writ of Prohibition Inappropriate: Three entities competing for the right to construct a hydroelectric generation facility at a federal site applied for and received "401 certification" from the Department of Health and Environmental Sciences (now Department of Environmental Quality) to allow application for a federal permit under section 401 of the Federal Water Pollution Control Act amendments of 1972, 33 U.S.C. 1341(a). One of the entities, Montana Renewable Resources (MRR), questioned whether its competitors' projects complied with state water quality standards and requested Department reconsideration of the other two entities' "401 certification". The Department refused to modify its decision, so MRR formally petitioned the Board of Health and Environmental Sciences (now Board of Environmental Review) for an appeal or declaratory ruling. The other two entities filed applications for Writs of Prohibition to halt further Board proceedings with respect to their certifications. The Supreme Court affirmed District Court dismissal of the applications, finding that the Board was acting within its jurisdiction under Montana water quality law and that since a speedy and adequate remedy of judicial appeal from any Board decisions was available, a Writ of Prohibition was inappropriate. Malta Irrigation District v. Mont. Bd. of Health & Environmental Sciences, 224 M 376, 729 P2d 1323, 43 St. Rep. 2264 (1986).

Trial Court's Refusal to Enjoin Installation of Sewage System Held Proper: The District Court denied the Smiths' motion for a preliminary injunction restraining their neighbor, Sacks, from placing a new septic system into operation and restraining the Board of Health from issuing permits for any septic systems in the area of the Smiths' property. The Supreme Court affirmed the denial. The granting of a preliminary injunction is vested in the discretion of the District Court, and the Supreme Court will not interfere in the exercise of this discretion unless manifest abuse is shown. In this case, no abuse was shown since the evidence presented to the District Court did not clearly show that the Smiths' water well would be damaged if the sewage system were installed. Smith v. Ravalli County Bd. of Health, 209 M 292, 679 P2d 1249, 41 St. Rep. 716 (1984).

2011 Amendments — Composite Section: Chapter 267 in definition of base numeric nutrient standards substituted "criteria" for "standards"; inserted definition of nutrient standards variance; in definition of nutrient work group substituted "nutrient standards variances" for "temporary nutrient criteria" and substituted "variances" for "criteria"; deleted definition that read: ""Temporary nutrient criteria" means numeric permit limits for nutrients that are based on a determination that the base numeric nutrient standards cannot be achieved by a particular point source discharger due to economic impacts or the limits of technology"; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective October 1, 2011.

(Both versions) Chapter 398 in definition of pollution deleted former (b) that read: "(b) A discharge, seepage, drainage, infiltration, or flow that is authorized under the pollution discharge permit rules of the board is not pollution under this chapter. Activities conducted under the conditions imposed by the department in short-term authorizations pursuant to 75-5-308 are not considered pollution under this chapter" and inserted (b) and (c) regarding exemptions; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective October 1, 2011.

(Version effective on occurrence of contingency) In definition of pollution deleted former (c) that read: "(c) Contamination of ground water within the boundaries of a geologic storage reservoir, as defined in 82-11-101, by a carbon dioxide injection well in accordance with a permit issued pursuant to Title 82, chapter 11, part 1, is not pollution and does not require a mixing zone."

Section 6, Ch. 398, L. 2011, was a saving clause.

Severability: Section 7, Ch. 267, L. 2011, was a severability clause.

Section 7, Ch. 398, L. 2011, was a severability clause.

2009 Amendments — Composite Section: Chapter 267 inserted definitions of base numeric nutrient standards, nutrient work group, and temporary nutrient criteria; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective October 1, 2009.

Chapter 445 inserted definitions of associated supporting infrastructure and energy development project; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective May 5, 2009.

Chapter 474 in definition of pollution inserted (c) providing that contamination of certain ground water by a permitted carbon dioxide injection well is not pollution and does not require a mixing zone. Amendment effective on occurrence of contingency.

Severability: Section 10, Ch. 445, L. 2009, was a severability clause.

Applicability: Section 12, Ch. 445, L. 2009, provided: "[This act] applies to judicial and board of environmental review hearing and appeal proceedings initiated on or after [the effective date of this act]." Effective May 5, 2009.

Saving Clause: Section 29, Ch. 474, L. 2009, was a saving clause.

Transition — Contingent Implementation: Section 30, Ch. 474, L. 2009, provided: "If the United States environmental protection agency adopts regulations allowing states to apply for primacy over carbon dioxide sequestration wells under the federal underground injection control program adopted by the environmental protection agency, the board of oil and gas conservation shall in consultation with the department of environmental quality and the department of natural resources and conservation develop draft rules to implement [this act] [Chapter 474, L. 2009] and seek primacy."

1997 Amendment: Chapter 541 inserted definitions of currently available data, impaired water body, load allocation, loading capacity, sufficient credible data, threatened water body, total maximum daily load, waste load allocation, and watershed advisory group; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective May 5, 1997.

1995 Amendments — Composite Section: Chapter 418 in definition of Board substituted "board of environmental review provided for in 2-15-3502" for "board of health and environmental sciences provided for in 2-15-2104"; in definition of Department substituted "department of environmental quality provided for in 2-15-3501" for "department of health and environmental sciences provided for in Title 2, chapter 15, part 21"; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective July 1, 1995.

Chapter 495 in definition of high-quality waters, after "means", inserted "all", after "waters" substituted "except" for "whose quality for a parameter is better than standards established pursuant to 75-5-301. All waters are high-quality water unless classified by the board within a classification for waters that are not suitable for human consumption or not suitable for growth and propagation of fish and associated aquatic life", and inserted ground water and surface water exceptions in (a) and (b); in definition of interested person, in first sentence after "who", substituted "has a real property interest, a water right, or an economic interest that is or may be directly and adversely affected by" for "has submitted oral or written comments on"; and made minor changes in style.

Chapter 497 inserted definition of metal parameters; in definition of state waters inserted (b)(i) excluding certain ponds and lagoons from the definition and in (b)(ii), near beginning after "waters", substituted "or land application disposal waters when" for "where", after "irrigation" inserted "or land application disposal", and after "returned to" deleted "any other"; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective April 15, 1995.

Chapter 501 inserted definition of outstanding resource waters; and made minor changes in style.

Chapter 546 deleted definition of Board that read: ""Board" means the board of health and environmental sciences provided for in 2-15-2104"; pursuant to sec. 568, Ch. 546, L. 1995, a coordination section, in definition of Department the Code Commissioner substituted "department of environmental quality" for "department of health and environmental sciences"; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective July 1, 1995.

Because Ch. 418 inserted a reference to the Board of Environmental Review and Ch. 546 deleted a reference to the Board of Health and Environmental Sciences, the codifier has reflected both the insertion and the deletion.

Transition: Section 499, Ch. 418, L. 1995, provided: "The provisions of 2-15-131 through 2-15-137 apply to [this act]."

Saving Clauses: Section 503, Ch. 418, L. 1995, was a saving clause.

Section 17, Ch. 497, L. 1995, provided: "[This act] does not apply to civil or administrative actions commenced prior to [the effective date of this act] [effective April 15, 1995] or to claims made in those actions, except that compliance plans resulting from those actions must reflect changes made by [this act]."

Section 571, Ch. 546, L. 1995, was a saving clause.

Preamble: The preamble attached to Ch. 495, L. 1995, provided: "WHEREAS, water quality nondegradation rules adopted by the Board of Health and Environmental Sciences [now Board of

Environmental Review] in 1994 create a nondegradation review system that is unnecessarily cumbersome and that accordingly requires revision; and

WHEREAS, the water quality nondegradation statutes require amendment to remedy a conflict with the Montana Administrative Procedure Act and for clarification."

Preamble: The preamble attached to Ch. 497, L. 1995, provided: "WHEREAS, experience with implementation and enforcement of the Montana water quality statutes has revealed deficiencies in the statutes that have led to inefficiency and unfairness in administration and enforcement of the statutes; and

WHEREAS, those deficiencies can be addressed by selective amendment of the statutes."

1995 Statement of Intent: The statement of intent attached to Ch. 497, L. 1995, provided: "A statement of intent is required to provide guidance to the board of health and environmental sciences [now board of environmental review] regarding rulemaking. The legislature confirms the policy of this state, as reflected in 75-5-101. It is concerned that implementation of the water quality laws has in the past been too dependent on assumptions and conjecture springing from experiences and circumstances from other states and has not been sufficiently based on the conditions and needs of our state. The legislature intends that, in promulgating rules under this bill, the board of health and environmental sciences [now board of environmental review] should seriously consider the impact of proposed rules and that the rules should be adopted only on the basis of sound, scientific justification and never on the basis of projections or conjecture. The legislature is specifically concerned that water quality criteria must reflect concentrations that can be reliably measured, or the rules will, as a practical matter, be unenforceable. [Section 1] [75-5-309], providing conditions for adoption of standards more stringent than federal standards, is not intended to prohibit the adoption of ground water quality standards."

1993 Amendments: Chapter 337 in definition of treatment works inserted "including sewage lagoons"; and inserted definition of water well.

Chapter 340 in definition of pollution inserted last sentence clarifying that short-term water authorizations are not considered pollution.

Chapter 595 inserted definitions of degradation, existing uses, high-quality waters, interested person, mixing zone, parameter, and water quality protection practices; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective April 29, 1993.

1993 Statement of Intent: The statement of intent attached to Ch. 595, L. 1993, provided: "A statement of intent is required for this bill because the bill requires the board of health and environmental sciences [now board of environmental review] to adopt administrative rules. The legislature clearly intends that the nondegradation policy protect and maintain existing quality of state waters from any loss in the quality of those waters. The nondegradation policy is intended to apply to any activity that has the potential to affect existing water quality and requires department review of all such activities to ensure that degradation does not occur.

In recognition that certain activities promote general welfare and may justify lower water quality in a particular water segment, the legislature intends that degradation be allowed in limited circumstances and under certain conditions. For example, if there is no alternative to a proposed project that does not result in degradation and the project is found to be in the best interests of the state, degradation may be allowed provided that water quality protection practices are implemented that limit degradation to the extent determined to be economically and technologically feasible.

To promote the goal of maintaining existing high-quality water, the board is to develop rules specifying the level of protection or treatment required if degradation is allowed. Rules are to be developed that provide procedures for department review of applications to degrade state waters, that provide guidance or standards for the level of treatment required, and that establish criteria that allow the department to weigh the social and economic benefit to the public of allowing the proposed project against the loss of water quality. It is the intent of the legislature that the department's decision involve public and governmental agencies' comment prior to a final decision.

It is further the intent of the legislature that the board develop rules that will provide guidance to the department in the use and creation of mixing zones. The rules are to ensure that water quality impacts from the use of mixing zones are minimized."

Severability: Section 9, Ch. 595, L. 1993, was a severability clause.

Applicability: Section 10, Ch. 595, L. 1993, provided: "[This act] applies to all requests to degrade state waters filed with the department after [the effective date of this act]." Effective April 29, 1993.

Case Notes

No Error in Adoption of Water Quality Rules — Standard of Review: Plaintiff contended that the District Court erroneously applied the incorrect standard of review in holding that the defendant Board of Environmental Review properly adopted rules regarding the numeric standards applicable to the sodium adsorption ratio and electrical conductivity as components of water produced with coal bed methane and discharged into state waterways. The court applied the standard of review in the declaratory judgment provisions of the Montana Administrative Procedure Act (MAPA), rather than the standard in MAPA for the adoption and publication of rules. On appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed. The District Court decision specifically addressed the factors in 2-4-305(6)(a) and (6)(b), in that the rules were consistent with requirements of the state Clean Water Act and the Water Quality Act and were reasonably necessary to protect state waters in light of projected growth in the coal bed methane sector and the difficulty in issuing objective and consistent discharge permits. The Board reviewed and relied on copious scientific data to draft rules that met the state law mandate for scientific justification. The Board did not adopt rules with an arbitrary and capricious disregard for the purpose of the statutes, and the District Court did not apply the incorrect standard of review under the circumstances with which it was presented. Pennaco Energy, Inc. v. Mont. Bd. of Envtl. Review, 2008 MT 425, 347 M 415, 199 P3d 191 (2008).

No Error in Reversal of Administrative Decision to Declare Sodium Adsorption Ratio and Electrical Conductivity Harmful in Coal Bed Methane Produced Water — Authority of Board of Environmental Review: In 2003, the Board of Environmental Review declined to designate as harmful the sodium adsorption ratio and electrical conductivity as components of water produced with coal bed methane and discharged into state waterways, but when presented with the same issue in 2006, the Board designated those components as harmful. Plaintiff asserted that the District Court erred in finding that the later designation was within the authority of the Board. The Supreme Court disagreed. It was within the Board's authority to reclassify the two parameters when it resulted in uniform treatment of all parameters for which numeric criteria had been established, rather than the irregular regulation of sodium adsorption ratio and electrical conductivity that resulted from the 2003 decision. The policy change was supported by scientific data and was required to protect Montana waters from degradation and provide regulatory consistency. Pennaco Energy, Inc. v. Mont. Bd. of Envtl. Review, 2008 MT 425, 347 M 415, 199 P3d 191 (2008), distinguishing Nat'l Wildlife Fed'n v. Nat'l Marine Fisheries Serv., 422 F3d 782 (9th Cir. 2005).

1991 Statement of Intent: The statement of intent attached to Ch. 357, L. 1991, provided: "A statement of intent is required for this bill in order to provide guidance to the board of health and environmental sciences [now board of environmental review] concerning rulemaking and approval of local water quality programs. The board shall adopt rules concerning the format of local water quality programs, including the level of information necessary for a local water quality district to show that its proposed program will be consistent with Title 75, chapter 5, and that its program will be effective in protecting, preserving, and improving the quality of surface water and ground water. The board may define by rule the types of best management practices that may be imposed upon each of the types of facilities and sources of pollution that may be regulated by local ordinances as authorized under [section 24(4)] [75-5-311(4)]. It is the intent of the legislature that administrative responsibilities be clearly allocated and, when necessary, clearly divided between the department of health and environmental sciences [now department of environmental quality] and a local water quality district, insofar as possible, to ensure that permitholders, permit applicants, and citizens are not subject to conflicting or duplicative requirements. Through its approval of local water quality programs, the board of health and environmental sciences [now board of environmental review] shall ensure that the department of health and environmental sciences' [now department of environmental quality] ability to continue to administer federally delegated water quality protection programs is not impaired. The board may also adopt rules to specify the procedures the department of health and environmental sciences [now department of environmental quality] shall follow pursuant to 75-5-106 to authorize a local water quality district to enforce provisions of Title 75, chapter 5. It is the intent of the legislature that the boundaries of local water quality districts should correspond to the area or areas in which water quality problems have been documented.

Except as expressly provided in this bill, nothing in this bill may be considered to limit or restrict the authority of local governments to adopt rules and regulations authorized by other laws of the state."

2003 Amendment: Chapter 468 inserted (1)(b) requiring board to adopt rules for suction dredging; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective April 23, 2003.

1995 Amendment: Chapter 471 in (1) inserted "subject to the provisions of 75-5-203". Amendment effective April 14, 1995.

Applicability: Section 22(3), Ch. 471, L. 1995, provided: "(3) [This act] does not apply to the establishment of fees or public participation requirements."

1993 Amendment: Chapter 504 inserted (2) authorizing a fee schedule or system for assessment of administrative penalties.

Preamble: The preamble attached to Ch. 504, L. 1993, provided: "WHEREAS, it is necessary and reasonable for the Department of Health and Environmental Sciences [now Department of Environmental Quality] to actively enforce the provisions of Montana's water quality laws; and

WHEREAS, the use of the District Courts to achieve civil penalty assessments consumes significant financial resources from both the regulated public and the State of Montana; and

WHEREAS, many parties may wish to resolve violations of Montana's water quality laws in an administrative proceeding that authorizes direct payments to the State of Montana without the large expenses inherent with the filing of a judicial lawsuit; and

WHEREAS, the Board of Health and Environmental Sciences [now Board of Environmental Review] may specify situations in which the Department of Health and Environmental Sciences [now Department of Environmental Quality] should pursue an action administratively; and

WHEREAS, in several situations, the administrative assessment of civil penalties under Montana's water quality laws would be a more effective deterrent than resolution of cases through the District Courts; and

WHEREAS, the Department of Health and Environmental Sciences [now Department of Environmental Quality] would be able to apply its limited enforcement resources to a broader array of violations; and

WHEREAS, the Federal Water Pollution Control Act provides for a similar administrative penalty, which could ultimately become a condition of primacy for state administration of water quality programs in Montana; and

WHEREAS, the citizens and businesses of the State of Montana, as well as the Department of Health and Environmental Sciences [now Department of Environmental Quality], would benefit from the availability of an administrative penalty in Montana's water quality laws.

THEREFORE, the Legislature of the State of Montana finds it appropriate to authorize an administrative penalty within Montana's water quality laws."

1993 Statement of Intent: The statement of intent attached to Ch. 504, L. 1993, provided: "A statement of intent is provided for this bill in order to assist the board of health and environmental sciences [now board of environmental review] in promulgating rules. The legislature intends that the administrative penalty provided by this bill be used to encourage compliance with Montana's water quality laws by allowing more timely and efficient processing of certain enforcement actions without the need for a higher penalty sought through a district court. To promote these goals, the board should develop rules that prescribe penalties for specific types of violations. In doing so, the board shall ensure that its rules are consistent with the criteria set forth in 75-5-631(4). Further, the board and department shall take measures to ensure that the rules are disseminated to the regulated community.

The legislature also intends that the board's rules be no less stringent than the federal rules and guidance implementing the Federal Water Pollution Control Act."

Case Notes

Department Grant of Water Quality Certification — Board Jurisdiction to Reconsider — Writ of Prohibition Inappropriate: Three entities competing for the right to construct a hydroelectric generation facility at a federal site applied for and received "401 certification" from the Department of Health and Environmental Sciences (now Department of Environmental Quality) to allow application for a federal permit under section 401 of the Federal Water Pollution Control Act amendments of 1972, 33 U.S.C. 1341(a). One of the entities, Montana Renewable Resources (MRR), questioned whether its competitors' projects complied with state water quality standards and requested Department reconsideration of the other two entities' "401 certification". The Department refused to modify its decision, so MRR formally petitioned the Board of Health and Environmental Sciences (now Board of Environmental Review) for an appeal or declaratory ruling. The other two entities filed applications for Writs of Prohibition to halt further Board proceedings with respect to their certifications. The Supreme Court affirmed District Court dismissal of the applications, finding that the Board was acting within its jurisdiction under Montana water quality law and that since a speedy and adequate remedy of judicial appeal from any Board decisions was available, a Writ of Prohibition was inappropriate. Malta Irrigation District v. Mont. Bd. of Health & Environmental Sciences, 224 M 376, 729 P2d 1323, 43 St. Rep. 2264 (1986).

Preamble: The preamble attached to Ch. 471, L. 1995, provided: "WHEREAS, the federal government frequently regulates areas that are also subject to state regulation; and

WHEREAS, differing state and federal policy goals and unique state prerogatives frequently result in different levels of regulation, different standards, and different requirements being imposed by state and federal programs covering the same subject matter; and

WHEREAS, Montana must simultaneously move toward reducing redundant and unnecessary regulation that dulls the state's competitive advantage while being ever vigilant in the protection of the public's health, safety, and welfare; and

WHEREAS, Montana's administrative agencies should consider applicable federal standards when adopting, readopting, or amending rules with analogous federal counterparts; and

WHEREAS, Montana's administrative agencies should analyze whether analogous federal standards sufficiently protect the health, safety, and welfare of Montana's citizens; and

WHEREAS, as part of the formal rulemaking process, the public should be advised of the agencies' conclusions about whether analogous federal standards sufficiently protect the health, safety, and welfare of Montana citizens."

1995 Statement of Intent: The statement of intent attached to Ch. 471, L. 1995, provided: "A statement of intent is required for this bill in order to provide guidance to the board of health and environmental sciences [now board of environmental review], the department of health and environmental sciences [now department of environmental quality], and local units of government in complying with [this act].

The legislature intends that in addition to all requirements imposed by existing law and rules, the board or the department include as part of the initial publication and all subsequent publications of a rule a written finding if the rule in question contains any standards or requirements that exceed the standards or requirements imposed by comparable federal law.

If the rules are more stringent than comparable federal law, the written finding must include but is not limited to a discussion of the policy reasons and an analysis that supports the board's or department's decision that the proposed state standards or requirements protect public health or the environment of the state and that the state standards or requirements to be imposed can mitigate harm to the public health or the environment and are achievable under current technology. The department is not required to show that the federal regulation is inadequate to protect public health. The written finding must also include information from the hearing record regarding the costs to the regulated community directly attributable to the proposed state standard or requirement."

Effective Date: Section 23, Ch. 471, L. 1995, provided that this section is effective on passage and approval. Approved April 14, 1995.

Applicability: Section 22(1) and (3), Ch. 471, L. 1995, provided: "(1) [Sections 1 through 3] are intended to apply to any rule that is in effect, adopted, or amended, and that regulates those resources or activities for which the state has been given primary authority to regulate by federal authority pursuant to Title 75, chapter 2; Title 75, chapter 3 [renumbered, except for part 6, as TItle 50, chapter 79]; Title 75, chapter 5; Title 75, chapter 6; or Title 75, chapter 10, as of [the effective date of this act] [April 14, 1995].

(3) [This act] does not apply to the establishment of fees or public participation requirements."

Case Notes

State Rules Consistent With Federal Clean Water Standards — Written Findings Not Required: Plaintiff contended that the Board of Environmental Review was required to issue written findings because it adopted water quality rules that were more stringent than corresponding federal rules. The District Court rejected plaintiff's argument that when the federal Environmental Protection Agency (EPA) approved the state narrative water quality standard around 1972, that standard became the federal standard, so that later adoption of numeric standards constituted a more stringent standard that required written findings of fact.

The Supreme Court affirmed. The necessity for written findings is triggered by EPA-promulgated regulations or criteria, not by the mere approval of a state standard. The state standards were properly considered to be consistent with and not more stringent than the EPA's nondegradation policy, so written findings of fact were not required. Pennaco Energy, Inc. v. No Evidence That Use of Siphon Tube to Regulate Temperature of Dam Outlet Water Satisfied Water Quality Standards: The Board of Health and Environmental Sciences (now Board of Environmental Review) issued "401 certifications" to the Milk River Irrigation District and the city of Gillette, Wyoming, regarding a hydroelectric generating facility at the Tiber Dam that provided in part for the placing of a siphon 60 feet below the auxiliary outlet in order to regulate the temperature of outlet water and protect the downstream fishery. As part of its contested case review, the District Court correctly concluded that the "401" application had never been amended to include the siphon scheme and that there was no evidence to support the Board's conclusion that withdrawing water from 60 feet below the auxiliary outlet satisfied applicable water quality standards, the nondegradation requirements of the Water Quality Act, Board rules, and state public policy. The court properly determined that due process would be violated if the certification could be issued without an amendment to the original application and without the holding of public hearings respecting the siphon scheme. Hi-Line Sportsmen Club v. Milk River Irrigation District, 241 M 182, 786 P2d 13, 47 St. Rep. 184 (1990).

Chapter 501 in (5)(c) inserted "in addition to those activities identified in 75-5-317".

Chapter 539 in (2)(a) inserted second sentence regarding rules for temporary standards; and in (2)(a), near beginning, and in (3), near end after "water", substituted "quality" for "purity". Amendment effective April 27, 1995.

Code Commissioner Clarification: Pursuant to a request from the Department of Health and Environmental Sciences (now Department of Environmental Quality), in (5)(d), (5)(d)(i), and (5)(d)(iv), after "nitrate", the Code Commissioner has inserted the bracketed phrase "as nitrogen". The inserted language is to clarify intended conformity to current water quality nondegradation rules.

Preamble: The preamble attached to Ch. 497, L. 1995, provided: "WHEREAS, experience with implementation and enforcement of the Montana water quality statutes has revealed deficiencies in the statutes that have led to inefficiency and unfairness in administration and enforcement of the statutes; and

1995 Statements of Intent: The statement of intent attached to Ch. 497, L. 1995, provided: "A statement of intent is required to provide guidance to the board of health and environmental sciences [now board of environmental review] regarding rulemaking. The legislature confirms the policy of this state, as reflected in 75-5-101. It is concerned that implementation of the water quality laws has in the past been too dependent on assumptions and conjecture springing from experiences and circumstances from other states and has not been sufficiently based on the conditions and needs of our state. The legislature intends that, in promulgating rules under this bill, the board of health and environmental sciences [now board of environmental review] should seriously consider the impact of proposed rules and that the rules should be adopted only on the basis of sound, scientific justification and never on the basis of projections or conjecture. The legislature is specifically concerned that water quality criteria must reflect concentrations that can be reliably measured, or the rules will, as a practical matter, be unenforceable. [Section 1] [75-5-309], providing conditions for adoption of standards more stringent than federal standards, is not intended to prohibit the adoption of ground water quality standards."

The statement of intent attached to Ch. 501, L. 1995, provided: "A statement of intent is required for this bill because the bill gives the board of health and environmental sciences [now board of environmental review] the authority to adopt administrative rules. It is the intent of the legislature that this legislation and the rules adopted pursuant to this legislation serve as Montana's regulatory scheme for both outstanding national resource waters and outstanding state resource waters. It is the further intent of the legislature that surface and ground water in Montana be designated as outstanding resource waters only if there is no other reasonable means of protecting the water. The legislature intends that because this designation may severely limit future use of the designated water, the designation should be accomplished only after a very thorough examination of the environmental, social, and economic impacts."

The statement of intent attached to Ch. 539, L. 1995, provided: "A statement of intent is provided for this bill because it allows the board of health and environmental sciences [now board of environmental review] to adopt rules establishing temporary water quality standards.

The principle behind establishing temporary water quality standards is that there are Montana surface and ground waters that are of lower quality than the applicable water quality standards. The legislature intends that the temporary water quality standards may not be established for waters that are impaired but still support their beneficial uses. Temporary standards may be established only when substantive information indicates that the water body or water segment does not support a designated use for its classification. The goal of establishing temporary standards is to improve the quality of the water to the point at which it supports the beneficial uses for its classification.

The establishment of temporary standards provides a legal basis that facilitates improvement of the water quality for those waters and allows, in limited circumstances, discharges to those waters. The rules must reflect the legislature's intent that establishing temporary water quality standards will trigger development and implementation of a plan with the overall goal of continuously improving the quality of the water during the period of the modification to the point that beneficial uses are supported. At no time during the period of a modification should a discharge be allowed that will cause water quality to become worse than the quality of the water body or segment prior to the discharge.

The legislature recognizes that persons may desire to commence discharging to the water body or segment for which a standard has been temporarily modified during the period of the modification. Any discharges that are allowed should not in any way slow or impede the improvement of the water body or segment."

Saving Clause: Section 17, Ch. 497, L. 1995, provided: "[This act] does not apply to civil or administrative actions commenced prior to [the effective date of this act] [effective April 15, 1995] or to claims made in those actions, except that compliance plans resulting from those actions must reflect changes made by [this act]."

1993 Amendment: Chapter 595 in introductory clause, after "provisions of", inserted "75-5-302 through 75-5-307 and"; inserted (4) requiring adoption of rules governing mixing zones; inserted (5) requiring adoption of rules implementing the nondegradation policy; inserted (6) requiring that rules establish criteria for various parameters; and inserted (7) regarding rules to implement this section. Amendment effective April 29, 1993.

1993 Statement of Intent: The statement of intent attached to Ch. 595, L. 1993, provided: "A statement of intent is required for this bill because the bill requires the board of health and environmental sciences [now board of environmental review] to adopt administrative rules. The legislature clearly intends that the nondegradation policy protect and maintain existing quality of state waters from any loss in the quality of those waters. The nondegradation policy is intended to apply to any activity that has the potential to affect existing water quality and requires department review of all such activities to ensure that degradation does not occur.

In recognition that certain activities promote general welfare and may justify lower water quality in a particular water segment, the legislature intends that degradation be allowed in limited circumstances and under certain conditions. For example, if there is no alternative to a proposed project that does not result in degradation and the project is found to be in the best interests of the state, degradation may be allowed provided that water quality protection practices are implemented that limit degradation to the extent determined to be economically and technologically feasible.

To promote the goal of maintaining existing high-quality water, the board is to develop rules specifying the level of protection or treatment required if degradation is allowed. Rules are to be developed that provide procedures for department review of applications to degrade state waters, that provide guidance or standards for the level of treatment required, and that establish criteria that allow the department to weigh the social and economic benefit to the public of allowing the proposed project against the loss of water quality. It is the intent of the legislature that the department's decision involve public and governmental agencies' comment prior to a final decision.

It is further the intent of the legislature that the board develop rules that will provide guidance to the department in the use and creation of mixing zones. The rules are to ensure that water quality impacts from the use of mixing zones are minimized."

Severability: Section 9, Ch. 595, L. 1993, was a severability clause.

Applicability: Section 10, Ch. 595, L. 1993, provided: "[This act] applies to all requests to degrade state waters filed with the department after [the effective date of this act]." Effective April 29, 1993.

1989 Amendment: At beginning inserted "Consistent with the provisions of 80-15-201". Amendment effective January 1, 1990.

Case Notes

Area of Unique Ecological or Recreational Significance — General Permit for Storm Water Discharge Improper: The Department of Environmental Quality improperly granted the Rock Creek Mine a general permit for storm water discharge when, under ARM 17.30.1341, Rock Creek is an area of unique ecological significance because of its impacts on fishery resources and other local conditions at the proposed discharge site. Clark Fork Coalition v. Dept. of Environmental Quality, 2012 MT 240, 366 Mont. 427, 288 P.3d 183.

No Error in Adoption of Water Quality Rules — Standard of Review: Plaintiff contended that the District Court erroneously applied the incorrect standard of review in holding that the defendant Board of Environmental Review properly adopted rules regarding the numeric standards applicable to the sodium adsorption ratio and electrical conductivity as components of water produced with coal bed methane and discharged into state waterways. The court applied the standard of review in the declaratory judgment provisions of the Montana Administrative Procedure Act (MAPA), rather than the standard in MAPA for the adoption and publication of rules. On appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed. The District Court decision specifically addressed the factors in 2-4-305(6)(a) and (6)(b), in that the rules were consistent with requirements of the state Clean Water Act and the Water Quality Act and were reasonably necessary to protect state waters in light of projected growth in the coal bed methane sector and the difficulty in issuing objective and consistent discharge permits. The Board reviewed and relied on copious scientific data to draft rules that met the state law mandate for scientific justification. The Board did not adopt rules with an arbitrary and capricious disregard for the purpose of the statutes, and the District Court did not apply the incorrect standard of review under the circumstances with which it was presented. Pennaco Energy, Inc. v. Mont. Bd. of Envtl. Review, 2008 MT 425, 347 M 415, 199 P3d 191 (2008).

No Error in Reversal of Administrative Decision to Declare Sodium Adsorption Ratio and Electrical Conductivity Harmful in Coal Bed Methane Produced Water — Authority of Board of Environmental Review: In 2003, the Board of Environmental Review declined to designate as harmful the sodium adsorption ratio and electrical conductivity as components of water produced with coal bed methane and discharged into state waterways, but when presented with the same issue in 2006, the Board designated those components as harmful. Plaintiff asserted that the District Court erred in finding that the later designation was within the authority of the Board. The Supreme Court disagreed. It was within the Board's authority to reclassify the two parameters when it resulted in uniform treatment of all parameters for which numeric criteria had been established, rather than the irregular regulation of sodium adsorption ratio and electrical conductivity that resulted from the 2003 decision. The policy change was supported by scientific data and was required to protect Montana waters from degradation and provide regulatory consistency. Pennaco Energy, Inc. v. Mont. Bd. of Envtl. Review, 2008 MT 425, 347 M 415, 199 P3d 191 (2008), distinguishing Nat'l Wildlife Fed'n v. Nat'l Marine Fisheries Serv., 422 F3d 782 (9th Cir. 2005).

Statement That Perpetual Discharge of Polluted Water Will Always Be Treated Insufficient to Justify That Irreversible Discharge Nonsignificant: The Department of Environmental Quality (DEQ), interpreting ARM 17.30.715, determined that because a perpetual discharge of polluted water from a mine into the Clark Fork River would always be treated, the irreversible discharge was nonsignificant. The Supreme Court noted that under Juro's United Drug v. Dept. of Public Health and Human Services, 2004 MT 117, 321 M 167, 90 P3d 388 (2004), and Kirchner v. Dept. of Public Health and Human Services, 2005 MT 202, 328 M 203, 119 P3d 82 (2005), an agency's interpretation of a rule is afforded great weight and will be sustained so long as it lies within the range of reasonable interpretation but that the court was not obliged to defer to an incorrect agency decision. In this case, DEQ misinterpreted its own rule and did not take a hard look at the significance of the polluted discharge after the mine was closed and the operator was gone, and it was an arbitrary and capricious decision not to make an independent examination of the long-term environmental significance. DEQ's simple statement that a perpetual discharge would always be treated was insufficient to justify a determination that the irreversible discharge was nonsignificant, and the court remanded for reconsideration of the discharge permit. Clark Fork Coalition v. Dept. of Environmental Quality, 2008 MT 407, 347 M 197, 197 P3d 482 (2008), following Ravalli County Fish & Game Ass'n, Inc. v. Dept. of State Lands, 273 M 371, 903 P2d 1362 (1995).

Preamble: The preamble attached to Ch. 497, L. 1995, provided: "WHEREAS, experience with implementation and enforcement of the Montana water quality statutes has revealed deficiencies in the statutes that have led to inefficiency and unfairness in administration and enforcement of the statutes; and

1995 Statements of Intent: The statement of intent attached to Ch. 497, L. 1995, provided: "A statement of intent is required to provide guidance to the board of health and environmental sciences [now board of environmental review] regarding rulemaking. The legislature confirms the policy of this state, as reflected in 75-5-101. It is concerned that implementation of the water quality laws has in the past been too dependent on assumptions and conjecture springing from experiences and circumstances from other states and has not been sufficiently based on the conditions and needs of our state. The legislature intends that, in promulgating rules under this bill, the board of health and environmental sciences [now board of environmental review] should seriously consider the impact of proposed rules and that the rules should be adopted only on the basis of sound, scientific justification and never on the basis of projections or conjecture. The legislature is specifically concerned that water quality criteria must reflect concentrations that can be reliably measured, or the rules will, as a practical matter, be unenforceable. [Section 1] [75-5-309], providing conditions for adoption of standards more stringent than federal standards, is not intended to prohibit the adoption of ground water quality standards."

The statement of intent attached to Ch. 539, L. 1995, provided: "A statement of intent is provided for this bill because it allows the board of health and environmental sciences [now board of environmental review] to adopt rules establishing temporary water quality standards.

The principle behind establishing temporary water quality standards is that there are Montana surface and ground waters that are of lower quality than the applicable water quality standards. The legislature intends that the temporary water quality standards may not be established for waters that are impaired but still support their beneficial uses. Temporary standards may be established only when substantive information indicates that the water body or water segment does not support a designated use for its classification. The goal of establishing temporary standards is to improve the quality of the water to the point at which it supports the beneficial uses for its classification.

The establishment of temporary standards provides a legal basis that facilitates improvement of the water quality for those waters and allows, in limited circumstances, discharges to those waters. The rules must reflect the legislature's intent that establishing temporary water quality standards will trigger development and implementation of a plan with the overall goal of continuously improving the quality of the water during the period of the modification to the point that beneficial uses are supported. At no time during the period of a modification should a discharge be allowed that will cause water quality to become worse than the quality of the water body or segment prior to the discharge.

The legislature recognizes that persons may desire to commence discharging to the water body or segment for which a standard has been temporarily modified during the period of the modification. Any discharges that are allowed should not in any way slow or impede the improvement of the water body or segment."

Saving Clause: Section 17, Ch. 497, L. 1995, provided: "[This act] does not apply to civil or administrative actions commenced prior to [the effective date of this act] [effective April 15, 1995] or to claims made in those actions, except that compliance plans resulting from those actions must reflect changes made by [this act]."

Severability: Section 5, Ch. 539, L. 1995, was a severability clause.

75-5-303. Nondegradation policy.

Compiler's Comments

1995 Amendments: Chapter 495 in (3)(a), after "feasible", substituted "modifications" for "alternatives"; in (3)(b), near middle after "development", deleted "that exceeds the benefit to society of maintaining existing high-quality waters" and after "and" inserted "that the benefit of the development"; and substituted (6) allowing Department review of degradation authorizations for former language that read: "(6) Every 5 years, the department shall review authorizations to degrade state waters. To enable the department to adequately review authorizations as required under this section, the authorization holder shall revise the initial authorization application no sooner than 3 ½ years and no later than 4 years after the date of the authorization or the date of the latest department review. The specific revised information required must be determined by the department. If, based on the review, the department determines that the standards and objectives of 75-5-303 or the rules adopted pursuant to 75-5-303 are not being met, it shall revoke or modify the authorization. A decision by the department to revoke or modify an authorization may be appealed to the board."

Chapter 501 in (2) inserted "or exempted from review under 75-5-317"; inserted (7) concerning prohibition to issue authorization to degrade waters classified as outstanding resource waters; and made minor changes in style.

Preamble: The preamble attached to Ch. 495, L. 1995, provided: "WHEREAS, water quality nondegradation rules adopted by the Board of Health and Environmental Sciences [now Board of Environmental Review] in 1994 create a nondegradation review system that is unnecessarily cumbersome and that accordingly requires revision; and

WHEREAS, the water quality nondegradation statutes require amendment to remedy a conflict with the Montana Administrative Procedure Act and for clarification."

1993 Amendment: Chapter 595 substituted present section establishing nondegradation policy for former section that read: "The board shall require:

(1) that any state waters whose existing quality is higher than the established water quality standards be maintained at that high quality unless it has been affirmatively demonstrated to the board that a change is justifiable as a result of necessary economic or social development and will not preclude present and anticipated use of these waters; and

(2) any industrial, public, or private project or development which would constitute a new source of pollution or an increased source of pollution to high-quality waters, referred to in subsection (1), to provide the degree of waste treatment necessary to maintain that existing high water quality." Amendment effective April 29, 1993.

1993 Statement of Intent: The statement of intent attached to Ch. 595, L. 1993, provided: "A statement of intent is required for this bill because the bill requires the board of health and environmental sciences [now board of environmental review] to adopt administrative rules. The legislature clearly intends that the nondegradation policy protect and maintain existing quality of state waters from any loss in the quality of those waters. The nondegradation policy is intended to apply to any activity that has the potential to affect existing water quality and requires department review of all such activities to ensure that degradation does not occur.

In recognition that certain activities promote general welfare and may justify lower water quality in a particular water segment, the legislature intends that degradation be allowed in limited circumstances and under certain conditions. For example, if there is no alternative to a proposed project that does not result in degradation and the project is found to be in the best interests of the state, degradation may be allowed provided that water quality protection practices are implemented that limit degradation to the extent determined to be economically and technologically feasible.

To promote the goal of maintaining existing high-quality water, the board is to develop rules specifying the level of protection or treatment required if degradation is allowed. Rules are to be developed that provide procedures for department review of applications to degrade state waters, that provide guidance or standards for the level of treatment required, and that establish criteria that allow the department to weigh the social and economic benefit to the public of allowing the proposed project against the loss of water quality. It is the intent of the legislature that the department's decision involve public and governmental agencies' comment prior to a final decision.

It is further the intent of the legislature that the board develop rules that will provide guidance to the department in the use and creation of mixing zones. The rules are to ensure that water quality impacts from the use of mixing zones are minimized."

Severability: Section 9, Ch. 595, L. 1993, was a severability clause.

Applicability: Section 10, Ch. 595, L. 1993, provided: "[This act] applies to all requests to degrade state waters filed with the department after [the effective date of this act]." Effective April 29, 1993.

Case Notes

Improper Issuance of Discharge Permits Without Imposing Predischarge Treatment Standards — Reversed: It was a violation of the Montana Clean Water Act and reversible error for the Department of Environmental Quality to issue discharge permits to a water company, which extracted coal bed methane and discharged its ground water into a river, without imposing predischarge treatment standards. On remand, the Department was required to reevaluate the permit applications under the appropriate standards within 90 days. N. Cheyenne Tribe v. Dept. of Environmental Quality, 2010 MT 111, 356 Mont. 296, 234 P.3d 51.

Statement That Perpetual Discharge of Polluted Water Will Always Be Treated Insufficient to Justify That Irreversible Discharge Nonsignificant: The Department of Environmental Quality (DEQ), interpreting ARM 17.30.715, determined that because a perpetual discharge of polluted water from a mine into the Clark Fork River would always be treated, the irreversible discharge was nonsignificant. The Supreme Court noted that under Juro's United Drug v. Dept. of Public Health and Human Services, 2004 MT 117, 321 M 167, 90 P3d 388 (2004), and Kirchner v. Dept. of Public Health and Human Services, 2005 MT 202, 328 M 203, 119 P3d 82 (2005), an agency's interpretation of a rule is afforded great weight and will be sustained so long as it lies within the range of reasonable interpretation but that the court was not obliged to defer to an incorrect agency decision. In this case, DEQ misinterpreted its own rule and did not take a hard look at the significance of the polluted discharge after the mine was closed and the operator was gone, and it was an arbitrary and capricious decision not to make an independent examination of the long-term environmental significance. DEQ's simple statement that a perpetual discharge would always be treated was insufficient to justify a determination that the irreversible discharge was nonsignificant, and the court remanded for reconsideration of the discharge permit. Clark Fork Coalition v. Dept. of Environmental Quality, 2008 MT 407, 347 M 197, 197 P3d 482 (2008), following Ravalli County Fish & Game Ass'n, Inc. v. Dept. of State Lands, 273 M 371, 903 P2d 1362 (1995).

Unenforceability of Buy-Sell Agreement on Grounds of Impossibility or Impracticality of Performance — Requiring Performance of Contract With Potential for Environmental Degradation Unconstitutional: Cape-France Enterprises (Cape-France) entered a buy-sell agreement with Peed (now deceased) and Moore to purchase some property near Bozeman for a subdivision. Before the subdivision could be completed, water needed to be procured for the site. According to the agreement, as buyers, Peed and Moore were responsible to bring water to the property, but because city water was not available, a well needed to be drilled. However, the presence of a pollution plume was discovered near the land. After the subdivision process was commenced, the Department of Environmental Quality notified Cape-France that: (1) the plume may have advanced under the property; (2) a subdivision would not be approved unless a well was drilled and tested; (3) a well could be drilled, but if testing showed pollution in the water, treatment would be extensive; and (4) if drilling or pumping of the water caused expansion of the pollution, then Cape-France, as owner of the property, would be held liable for cleanup costs. On cross-motions for summary judgment, the District Court held that the buy-sell agreement could be rescinded on the basis of mutual mistake of fact and impossibility or impracticality of performance and that specific performance would not be granted. The Supreme Court affirmed. A court may determine that an act is impossible in legal contemplation when it is not practicable, when the act can be done only at an excessive, unreasonable, and unbargained-for cost. The doctrine of impossibility or impracticability is applied when, aside from the object of a contract being unlawful, the public policy underlying the strict performance of the contract is outweighed by the senselessness of requiring performance. The doctrine is not limited to cases of literal impossibility but may also be applied in cases that present a potential for substantial and unbargained-for damages. In this case, requiring Cape-France to go forward with the performance of the contract when there was a very real possibility of substantial environmental degradation and resultant financial liability for cleanup was not in the public interest or in the interests of the contracting parties and was not in accord with the guarantee of a clean and healthful environment in Art. II, sec. 3, Mont. Const., or the mandate to maintain and improve a clean and healthful environment for present and future generations in Art. IX, sec. 1, Mont. Const. Thus, rescission of the contract was proper. Cape-France Enterprises v. Estate of Peed, 2001 MT 139, 305 M 513, 29 P3d 1011 (2001). See also Smith v. Zepp, 173 M 358, 567 P2d 923 (1977), and Mont. Envtl. Information Center v. Dept. of Environmental Quality, 1999 MT 248, 296 M 207, 988 P2d 1236 (1999).

Arbitrary, Blanket Exclusion of Certain Activities From Nondegradation Review Unconstitutional as Applied — Actual Danger Not Required — Degradation of Environment Sufficient to Implicate Fundamental Rights: The District Court erred when it held that the fundamental right to a clean and healthy environment is not implicated unless there is a finding of actual injury and that mere degradation of water quality, absent actual injury, is not sufficient to implicate the fundamental right or to require strict scrutiny analyses. The right to a clean and healthful environment contained in Art. II, sec. 3, Mont. Const., is fundamental. Therefore, as applied to the facts of this case, to the extent that 75-5-317(2)(j) arbitrarily excludes certain activities from nondegradation review without regard to the nature or volume of the substance being discharged, it violates the environmental rights guaranteed by Art. II, sec. 3, Mont. Const., and Art. IX, sec. 1, Mont. Const. (See 1999 amendments.) The intention of the framers of the constitution was to provide language and protections that are both anticipatory and preventative. The delegates did not intend to merely prohibit that degree of environmental degradation that can be conclusively linked to ill health or physical endangerment. Mont. Envtl. Information Center v. Dept. of Environmental Quality, 1999 MT 248, 296 M 207, 988 P2d 1236, 56 St. Rep. 964 (1999).

Fundamental Right to Clean and Healthful Environment — Strict Scrutiny of Compelling State Interest and Nondegradation Policy: The right to a clean and healthful environment contained in Art. II, sec. 3, Mont. Const., is fundamental. Any statute or rule implicating that right will be strictly scrutinized and will survive scrutiny only if the state establishes a compelling state interest and its action is closely tailored to effectuate that interest and is the least onerous path that can be taken to meet the state's objectives. Because rights provided for in Art. IX, sec. 1, Mont. Const., are not found in the declaration of rights, a statute implicating Art. IX, sec. 1, rights would normally be subject to a middle-tier scrutiny test. However, those rights guaranteed by Art. II, sec. 3, and those rights provided for in Art. IX, sec. 1, were intended by the constitution's framers to be interrelated and interdependent, so state action under either section is subject to strict scrutiny. Mont. Envtl. Information Center v. Dept. of Environmental Quality, 1999 MT 248, 296 M 207, 988 P2d 1236, 56 St. Rep. 964 (1999). See also Butte Community Union v. Lewis, 219 M 426, 712 P2d 1309, 43 St. Rep. 65 (1986), and Wadsworth v. St., 275 M 287, 911 P2d 1165, 53 St. Rep. 146 (1996).

Standing to Challenge Mining Activity With Arguably Adverse Environmental Impact: Plaintiffs' uncontroverted allegations of a violation of their right to a clean and healthful environment established their standing to challenge mine water discharge activities that had an arguably adverse impact on the headwaters of the Blackfoot River in which they fished and recreated and that was a source of their drinking water. Mont. Envtl. Information Center v. Dept. of Environmental Quality, 1999 MT 248, 296 M 207, 988 P2d 1236, 56 St. Rep. 964 (1999), following Missoula City-County Air Pollution Control Bd. v. Case Notes

State Rules Consistent With Federal Clean Water Standards — Written Findings Not Required: Plaintiff contended that the Board of Environmental Review was required to issue written findings because it adopted water quality rules that were more stringent than corresponding federal rules. The District Court rejected plaintiff's argument that when the federal Environmental Protection Agency (EPA) approved the state narrative water quality standard around 1972, that standard became the federal standard, so that later adoption of numeric standards constituted a more stringent standard that required written findings of fact.

The Supreme Court affirmed. The necessity for written findings is triggered by EPA-promulgated regulations or criteria, not by the mere approval of a state standard. The state standards were properly considered to be consistent with and not more stringent than the EPA's nondegradation policy, so written findings of fact were not required. Pennaco Energy, Inc. v. 1995 Amendment: Chapter 471 inserted (5)(b) concerning Board approval of ordinance more stringent than state law; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective April 14, 1995.

Applicability: Section 22(3), Ch. 471, L. 1995, provided: "(3) [This act] does not apply to the establishment of fees or public participation requirements."

1991 Statement of Intent: The statement of intent attached to Ch. 357, L. 1991, provided: "A statement of intent is required for this bill in order to provide guidance to the board of health and environmental sciences [now board of environmental review] concerning rulemaking and approval of local water quality programs. The board shall adopt rules concerning the format of local water quality programs, including the level of information necessary for a local water quality district to show that its proposed program will be consistent with Title 75, chapter 5, and that its program will be effective in protecting, preserving, and improving the quality of surface water and ground water. The board may define by rule the types of best management practices that may be imposed upon each of the types of facilities and sources of pollution that may be regulated by local ordinances as authorized under [section 24(4)] [75-5-311(4)]. It is the intent of the legislature that administrative responsibilities be clearly allocated and, when necessary, clearly divided between the department of health and environmental sciences [now department of environmental quality] and a local water quality district, insofar as possible, to ensure that permitholders, permit applicants, and citizens are not subject to conflicting or duplicative requirements. Through its approval of local water quality programs, the board of health and environmental sciences [now board of environmental review] shall ensure that the department of health and environmental sciences' [now department of environmental quality] ability to continue to administer federally delegated water quality protection programs is not impaired. The board may also adopt rules to specify the procedures the department of health and environmental sciences [now department of environmental quality] shall follow pursuant to 75-5-106 to authorize a local water quality district to enforce provisions of Title 75, chapter 5. It is the intent of the legislature that the boundaries of local water quality districts should correspond to the area or areas in which water quality problems have been documented.

Except as expressly provided in this bill, nothing in this bill may be considered to limit or restrict the authority of local governments to adopt rules and regulations authorized by other laws of the state."

75-5-312. Temporary water quality standards.

Compiler's Comments

2001 Amendment: Chapter 384 in (1) at beginning of first sentence after "The board may" deleted "on its own" and after "rulemaking" inserted "as provided in 2-4-315" and at end of second sentence substituted "all the beneficial uses designated for that water body or segment are supported" for "an additional beneficial use or uses are supported"; in (2) in first sentence before "implementation plan" inserted "a preliminary" and inserted second sentence requiring submission of a support document and preliminary implementation plan for review at least 60 days prior to filing a petition requesting adoption of temporary water quality standards; in (3) substituted introductory clause concerning support document for former language that read: "If a person petitions for rulemaking under this section, the petition must specifically describe the affected state water, the existing ambient water quality for the parameter or parameters at issue, the water quality standard or standards affected, and the temporary modifications sought. Within 180 days after the board grants a petition to initiate rulemaking, the petitioner shall prepare and submit to the board and the department a proposed support document and implementation plan that sets forth"; inserted (3)(a) requiring a description of the chemical, biological, and physical condition of the water; in (3)(b) at beginning after "the" inserted "specific"; in (3)(c) at beginning after "the existing" substituted "water quality standards that are not being achieved" for "beneficial use or uses and the beneficial use or uses considered attainable in the absence of the water quality limiting factors"; deleted former (3)(c) and (3)(d) that read: "(c) an implementation plan to eliminate the water quality limiting factors to the extent considered achievable; and

(d) a schedule for implementing the plan that ensures that the water quality standards for the parameter or parameters at issue are met as soon as reasonably practicable and in no event later than the time allowed by the board in the temporary standard"; inserted (3)(d) requiring a description of temporary modifications to existing water quality standards; inserted (3)(e) requiring a description of existing beneficial uses; inserted (3)(f) requiring a description of designated uses considered attainable in the absence of the water quality limiting factors; inserted (4) setting out criteria that a preliminary implementation plan must contain; inserted (5) requiring certain action by the department or petitioner within 30 days after the board's adoption of temporary water quality standards; inserted (6) requiring submission of detailed annual work plans; in (10) near middle of first sentence after "standards" inserted "and implementation plan", inserted second sentence requiring consideration of progress made in restoring water quality to a level that achieves the goal of the temporary water quality standards, and in third sentence after "terminate" inserted "or modify" and at end after "review" deleted "that the applicant is not complying with the approved implementation plan"; in (11)(c) near end after "modifications to that" inserted "plan or"; in (12) at beginning after "The board" inserted "or the department", after "modify the" inserted "implementation" and after "if" substituted "there is convincing evidence" for "the permittee submits convincing evidence to the board" and deleted former second sentence that read: "The board may not extend the plan beyond a total period of 20 years"; in (13) at end of first sentence substituted "an implementation plan that meet the requirements of subsection (4)" for "a plan that meet the requirements of subsections (2) and (3)"; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective October 1, 2001.

1995 Statement of Intent: The statement of intent attached to Ch. 539, L. 1995, provided: "A statement of intent is provided for this bill because it allows the board of health and environmental sciences [now board of environmental review] to adopt rules establishing temporary water quality standards.

The principle behind establishing temporary water quality standards is that there are Montana surface and ground waters that are of lower quality than the applicable water quality standards. The legislature intends that the temporary water quality standards may not be established for waters that are impaired but still support their beneficial uses. Temporary standards may be established only when substantive information indicates that the water body or water segment does not support a designated use for its classification. The goal of establishing temporary standards is to improve the quality of the water to the point at which it supports the beneficial uses for its classification.

The establishment of temporary standards provides a legal basis that facilitates improvement of the water quality for those waters and allows, in limited circumstances, discharges to those waters. The rules must reflect the legislature's intent that establishing temporary water quality standards will trigger development and implementation of a plan with the overall goal of continuously improving the quality of the water during the period of the modification to the point that beneficial uses are supported. At no time during the period of a modification should a discharge be allowed that will cause water quality to become worse than the quality of the water body or segment prior to the discharge.

The legislature recognizes that persons may desire to commence discharging to the water body or segment for which a standard has been temporarily modified during the period of the modification. Any discharges that are allowed should not in any way slow or impede the improvement of the water body or segment."

2011 Amendment: Chapter 267 in (1), (2)(b), (3) in two places, (4), and (12) substituted reference to nutrient standards variances for reference to temporary nutrient criteria; in (1) substituted "shall" for "may" and at end inserted "or both"; in (2)(a) inserted "for individual nutrient standards variances" and at end after "Montana" substituted language concerning economic impacts for "and may also consider relevant guidance of the United States environmental protection agency pertaining to analysis of economic impacts from water quality standards"; deleted former (2)(b) that read: "(b) In the event that economic impacts do not justify temporary nutrient criteria for a particular discharger, the department may approve temporary nutrient criteria based upon a finding that the limits of technology preclude the attainment of the base numeric nutrient standards. The department's determination that the limits of technology justify temporary nutrient criteria must be based on available and proven treatment technologies at the time the temporary nutrient criteria are approved"; in (2)(b) after "standards" deleted "or criteria"; in (3) inserted "or the alternatives provided in subsections (5), (10), and (11)"; deleted former (4)(b) that read: "(b) Temporary nutrient criteria may be established for a period not to exceed 20 years and must be reviewed by the department every 5 years from the date of adoption to ensure that the justification for their adoption is still valid"; inserted (5), (6), (7), (8), (9), (10), and (11) regarding nutrient standards variances; in (12) substituted "standards and variances" for "criteria"; and made minor changes in style. 2003 Amendment: Chapter 208 in (1) near middle of first sentence after "should" inserted "upon a showing of necessity"; in (2) near middle after "protection" inserted "when necessary"; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective April 3, 2003.

Applicability: Section 5, Ch. 208, L. 2003, provided: "[This act] applies to petitions for rulemaking to classify waters as outstanding resource waters that are filed after [the effective date of this act]." Effective April 3, 2003.

1995 Statement of Intent: The statement of intent attached to Ch. 501, L. 1995, provided: "A statement of intent is required for this bill because the bill gives the board of health and environmental sciences [now board of environmental review] the authority to adopt administrative rules. It is the intent of the legislature that this legislation and the rules adopted pursuant to this legislation serve as Montana's regulatory scheme for both outstanding national resource waters and outstanding state resource waters. It is the further intent of the legislature that surface and ground water in Montana be designated as outstanding resource waters only if there is no other reasonable means of protecting the water. The legislature intends that because this designation may severely limit future use of the designated water, the designation should be accomplished only after a very thorough examination of the environmental, social, and economic impacts."

75-5-317. Nonsignificant activities.

Compiler's Comments

2009 Amendment: Chapter 73 inserted (2)(i) including the use of gray water from nonpublic gray water reuse systems for irrigation as an activity that causes a nonsignificant change in water quality; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective October 1, 2009.

1999 Amendment: Chapter 588 near beginning in (2)(e) before "water" inserted "ground"; at end of (2)(f) inserted "and if no discharge to surface water will occur"; in (2)(j) inserted "to ground water"; in (2)(k) inserted "that do not result in discharges to surface water and that are"; in (2)(m) inserted "that does not result in a discharge to surface water, that does not involve a test pit located in surface water or that may affect surface water, and that is"; in (2)(p) inserted "that does not result in a discharge to surface water and that is"; in (2)(q) substituted language regarding stream-related construction or enhancement projects for former language that read: "nonpoint sources of pollution that cause short-term changes in existing water quality resulting from:

(i) activities authorized under Title 75, chapter 7, part 1; or

(ii) customary activities involving the use of water established by an existing water right or permit recognized under Montana law"; inserted (2)(r) regarding diversions or withdrawals of water; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective May 10, 1999.

Saving Clause: Section 8(2), Ch. 588, L. 1999, provided: "(2) A discharge from a facility or source that discharged to surface water prior to [the effective date of this act] [effective May 10, 1999] and that was exempt from 75-5-303 pursuant to 75-5-317(2)(e), (2)(k), or (2)(p) or 75-5-401(1)(b) as those sections read prior to [the effective date of this act] [effective May 10, 1999] continues to be exempt from 75-5-303 as long as the facility or source has not since [the effective date of this act] [effective May 10, 1999] been expanded in a manner that increases the volume of discharge or the concentration or nature of pollutants in the discharge."

Severability: Section 9, Ch. 588, L. 1999, was a severability clause.

Case Notes

Arbitrary, Blanket Exclusion of Certain Activities From Nondegradation Review Unconstitutional as Applied — Actual Danger Not Required — Degradation of Environment Sufficient to Implicate Fundamental Rights: The District Court erred when it held that the fundamental right to a clean and healthy environment is not implicated unless there is a finding of actual injury and that mere degradation of water quality, absent actual injury, is not sufficient to implicate the fundamental right or to require strict scrutiny analyses. The right to a clean and healthful environment contained in Art. II, sec. 3, Mont. Const., is fundamental. Therefore, as applied to the facts of this case, to the extent that subsection (2)(j) of this section arbitrarily excludes certain activities from nondegradation review without regard to the nature or volume of the substance being discharged, it violates the environmental rights guaranteed by Art. II, sec. 3, Mont. Const., and Art. IX, sec. 1, Mont. Const. (See 1999 amendments.) The intention of the framers of the constitution was to provide language and protections that are both anticipatory and preventative. The delegates did not intend to merely prohibit that degree of environmental degradation that can be conclusively linked to ill health or physical endangerment. Mont. Envtl. Information Center v. Dept. of Environmental Quality, 1999 MT 248, 296 M 207, 988 P2d 1236, 56 St. Rep. 964 (1999).

Fundamental Right to Clean and Healthful Environment — Strict Scrutiny of Compelling State Interest and Nondegradation Policy: The right to a clean and healthful environment contained in Art. II, sec. 3, Mont. Const., is fundamental. Any statute or rule implicating that right will be strictly scrutinized and will survive scrutiny only if the state establishes a compelling state interest and its action is closely tailored to effectuate that interest and is the least onerous path that can be taken to meet the state's objectives. Because rights provided for in Art. IX, sec. 1, Mont. Const., are not found in the declaration of rights, a statute implicating Art. IX, sec. 1, rights would normally be subject to a middle-tier scrutiny test. However, those rights guaranteed by Art. II, sec. 3, and those rights provided for in Art. IX, sec. 1, were intended by the constitution's framers to be interrelated and interdependent, so state action under either section is subject to strict scrutiny. Mont. Envtl. Information Center v. Dept. of Environmental Quality, 1999 MT 248, 296 M 207, 988 P2d 1236, 56 St. Rep. 964 (1999). See also Butte Community Union v. Lewis, 219 M 426, 712 P2d 1309, 43 St. Rep. 65 (1986), and Wadsworth v. St., 275 M 287, 911 P2d 1165, 53 St. Rep. 146 (1996).

Standing to Challenge Mining Activity With Arguably Adverse Environmental Impact: Plaintiffs' uncontroverted allegations of a violation of their right to a clean and healthful environment established their standing to challenge mine water discharge activities that had an arguably adverse impact on the headwaters of the Blackfoot River in which they fished and recreated and that was a source of their drinking water. Mont. Envtl. Information Center v. Dept. of Environmental Quality, 1999 MT 248, 296 M 207, 988 P2d 1236, 56 St. Rep. 964 (1999), following Missoula City-County Air Pollution Control Bd. v. Part 4
Permits

Part Case Notes

No Evidence That Use of Siphon Tube to Regulate Temperature of Dam Outlet Water Satisfied Water Quality Standards: The Board of Health and Environmental Sciences (now Board of Environmental Review) issued "401 certifications" to the Milk River Irrigation District and the city of Gillette, Wyoming, regarding a hydroelectric generating facility at the Tiber Dam that provided in part for the placing of a siphon 60 feet below the auxiliary outlet in order to regulate the temperature of outlet water and protect the downstream fishery. As part of its contested case review, the District Court correctly concluded that the "401" application had never been amended to include the siphon scheme and that there was no evidence to support the Board's conclusion that withdrawing water from 60 feet below the auxiliary outlet satisfied applicable water quality standards, the nondegradation requirements of the Water Quality Act, Board rules, and state public policy. The court properly determined that due process would be violated if the certification could be issued without an amendment to the original application and without the holding of public hearings respecting the siphon scheme. Hi-Line Sportsmen Club v. Milk River Irrigation District, 241 M 182, 786 P2d 13, 47 St. Rep. 184 (1990).

Department Grant of Water Quality Certification — Board Jurisdiction to Reconsider — Writ of Prohibition Inappropriate: Three entities competing for the right to construct a hydroelectric generation facility at a federal site applied for and received "401 certification" from the Department of Health and Environmental Sciences (now Department of Environmental Quality) to allow application for a federal permit under section 401 of the Federal Water Pollution Control Act amendments of 1972, 33 U.S.C. 1341(a). One of the entities, Montana Renewable Resources (MRR), questioned whether its competitors' projects complied with state water quality standards and requested Department reconsideration of the other two entities' "401 certification". The Department refused to modify its decision, so MRR formally petitioned the Board of Health and Environmental Sciences (now Board of Environmental Review) for an appeal or declaratory ruling. The other two entities filed applications for Writs of Prohibition to halt further Board proceedings with respect to their certifications. The Supreme Court affirmed District Court dismissal of the applications, finding that the Board was acting within its jurisdiction under Montana water quality law and that since a speedy and adequate remedy of judicial appeal from any Board decisions was available, a Writ of Prohibition was inappropriate. Malta Irrigation District v. Mont. Bd. of Health & Environmental Sciences, 224 M 376, 729 P2d 1323, 43 St. Rep. 2264 (1986).

Compiler's Comments

2009 Amendment: Chapter 474 inserted (5)(l) providing that a ground water permit is not required for activities associated with a permitted carbon dioxide injection well; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective on occurrence of contingency.

Saving Clause: Section 29, Ch. 474, L. 2009, was a saving clause.

Transition — Contingent Implementation: Section 30, Ch. 474, L. 2009, provided: "If the United States environmental protection agency adopts regulations allowing states to apply for primacy over carbon dioxide sequestration wells under the federal underground injection control program adopted by the environmental protection agency, the board of oil and gas conservation shall in consultation with the department of environmental quality and the department of natural resources and conservation develop draft rules to implement [this act] [Chapter 474, L. 2009] and seek primacy."

2003 Amendment: Chapter 231 inserted (9) allowing board to adopt rules authorizing general permits for categories of point source discharges and providing that rules may authorize discharge upon issuance of individual authorization or upon receipt of notice of intent to be covered under general permit. Amendment effective April 4, 2003.

Severability: Section 9, Ch. 231, L. 2003, was a severability clause.

2001 Amendment: Chapter 413 in (1)(a) near middle substituted "state waters" for "state surface waters and ground waters"; and inserted (1)(c) concerning rules governing discharge under a general permit for storm water associated with construction activity. Amendment effective April 28, 2001.

1999 Amendment: Chapter 588 at end of (1)(b) after "part" deleted "and is not degradation". Amendment effective May 10, 1999.

Saving Clause: Section 8(2), Ch. 588, L. 1999, provided: "(2) A discharge from a facility or source that discharged to surface water prior to [the effective date of this act] [effective May 10, 1999] and that was exempt from 75-5-303 pursuant to 75-5-317(2)(e), (2)(k), or (2)(p) or 75-5-401(1)(b) as those sections read prior to [the effective date of this act] [effective May 10, 1999] continues to be exempt from 75-5-303 as long as the facility or source has not since [the effective date of this act] [effective May 10, 1999] been expanded in a manner that increases the volume of discharge or the concentration or nature of pollutants in the discharge."

Severability: Section 9, Ch. 588, L. 1999, was a severability clause.

1995 Amendments: Chapter 297 in (4), near middle, substituted "permitted activities" for "disposal systems"; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective July 1, 1995.

Chapter 497 in (1)(b), at end of first sentence, inserted remainder of subsection providing that a permit is not required for discharge of certain waters under specific circumstances; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective April 15, 1995.

Chapter 582 at beginning of (1) inserted exception clause; near middle of (1)(a) substituted "state surface waters and ground waters" for "state waters"; inserted (5) concerning discharges not subject to permit requirements; inserted (6) concerning mixing zones for excluded activities; inserted (7) concerning monitoring of excluded activities; inserted (8) concerning the adoption of rules; and made minor changes in style.

Preamble: The preamble attached to Ch. 497, L. 1995, provided: "WHEREAS, experience with implementation and enforcement of the Montana water quality statutes has revealed deficiencies in the statutes that have led to inefficiency and unfairness in administration and enforcement of the statutes; and

1995 Statement of Intent: The statement of intent attached to Ch. 497, L. 1995, provided: "A statement of intent is required to provide guidance to the board of health and environmental sciences [now board of environmental review] regarding rulemaking. The legislature confirms the policy of this state, as reflected in 75-5-101. It is concerned that implementation of the water quality laws has in the past been too dependent on assumptions and conjecture springing from experiences and circumstances from other states and has not been sufficiently based on the conditions and needs of our state. The legislature intends that, in promulgating rules under this bill, the board of health and environmental sciences [now board of environmental review] should seriously consider the impact of proposed rules and that the rules should be adopted only on the basis of sound, scientific justification and never on the basis of projections or conjecture. The legislature is specifically concerned that water quality criteria must reflect concentrations that can be reliably measured, or the rules will, as a practical matter, be unenforceable. [Section 1] [75-5-309], providing conditions for adoption of standards more stringent than federal standards, is not intended to prohibit the adoption of ground water quality standards."

Saving Clause: Section 17, Ch. 497, L. 1995, provided: "[This act] does not apply to civil or administrative actions commenced prior to [the effective date of this act] [effective April 15, 1995] or to claims made in those actions, except that compliance plans resulting from those actions must reflect changes made by [this act]."

1991 Amendment: Inserted (4) allowing adoption of rules governing reclamation of disturbed sites for which a bond is voluntarily filed.

1991 Statement of Intent: The statement of intent attached to Ch. 412, L. 1991, provided: "A statement of intent is required for this bill in order to provide guidance to the board of health and environmental sciences [now board of environmental review] for the adoption of rules concerning the reclamation of sites disturbed by construction, modification, or operation of disposal systems for which a performance bond or other surety is voluntarily filed by a permit applicant or permittee pursuant to [section 3] [75-5-405]. The board's rules should establish criteria that the department of health and environmental sciences [now department of environmental quality] shall apply in determining the requirements that are necessary for individual permittees to achieve acceptable site reclamation on a case-by-case basis and to prevent pollution of state waters. The board's rules should also establish procedures governing the release of bonds and other surety, including provisions for releasing a portion of a bond or other surety in situations in which acceptable reclamation and prevention of water pollution have been completed upon a portion of a site where a permitted pollutant discharge project has operated or a permitted activity has occurred."

Case Notes

Area of Unique Ecological or Recreational Significance — General Permit for Storm Water Discharge Improper: The Department of Environmental Quality improperly granted the Rock Creek Mine a general permit for storm water discharge when, under ARM 17.30.1341, Rock Creek is an area of unique ecological significance because of its impacts on fishery resources and other local conditions at the proposed discharge site. Clark Fork Coalition v. Dept. of Environmental Quality, 2012 MT 240, 366 Mont. 427, 288 P.3d 183.

Improper Issuance of Discharge Permits Without Imposing Predischarge Treatment Standards — Reversed: It was a violation of the Montana Clean Water Act and reversible error for the Department of Environmental Quality to issue discharge permits to a water company, which extracted coal bed methane and discharged its ground water into a river, without imposing predischarge treatment standards. On remand, the Department was required to reevaluate the permit applications under the appropriate standards within 90 days. N. Cheyenne Tribe v. Dept. of Environmental Quality, 2010 MT 111, 356 Mont. 296, 234 P.3d 51.

State Exemption From Federal Law Not Allowed: In the process of extracting coal bed methane, Fidelity pumps ground water to the surface and discharges this water into the Tongue River. The water discharged is salty, contains several chemical constituents identified as pollutants by Environmental Protection Agency (EPA) regulations, has characteristics that may degrade soil, and is unfit for irrigation. The Montana Department of Environmental Quality advised Fidelity that no permit was required to discharge the coal bed methane ground water because Montana state law exempts unaltered ground water from state water quality requirements. This section provides that a discharge to surface water of ground water that is not altered from its ambient quality does not constitute a discharge requiring a permit under this part if: the discharge does not contain industrial waste, sewage, or other wastes; the water discharged does not cause the receiving waters to exceed applicable standards for any parameters; and to the extent that the receiving waters in their ambient state exceed standards for any parameters, the discharge does not increase the concentration of the parameters. This provision does not allow an exemption for a discharge permit that is required by the federal Clean Water Act, nor does the EPA's approval of the provision allow the exemption because the EPA cannot itself allow the exemption and cannot allow a state to do what the EPA cannot itself do. Preamble: The preamble attached to Ch. 507, L. 1993, provided: "WHEREAS, section 402 of the Federal Water Pollution Control Act provides that states may be authorized by the U.S. Environmental Protection Agency to administer the national pollutant discharge elimination system wastewater discharge permit program; and

WHEREAS, the Montana Department of Health and Environmental Sciences [now Department of Environmental Quality] administers all water quality permit programs in Montana through an agreement with the U.S. Environmental Protection Agency under section 402 of the Federal Water Pollution Control Act; and

WHEREAS, the Department of Health and Environmental Sciences' [now Department of Environmental Quality] water quality permit programs are inextricably linked to its other water pollution control and ambient water quality monitoring programs; and

WHEREAS, both the citizens and businesses of the State of Montana benefit from implementation of these programs by the Department of Health and Environmental Sciences [now Department of Environmental Quality]; and

WHEREAS, if the Department of Health and Environmental Sciences [now Department of Environmental Quality] fails to obtain authorization, the national pollutant discharge elimination system program will be administered within Montana by the U.S. Environmental Protection Agency; and

WHEREAS, the persons who discharge or may discharge wastes to Montana's water resources and who are required to obtain a water quality permit should pay a fair share to ensure protection of Montana's water resources; and

WHEREAS, the annual fee system may be an incentive to the regulated community to design activities that reduce the amount of pollutants discharged to state waters or otherwise lower the potential for harm to state waters.

THEREFORE, the Legislature of the State of Montana finds that it is appropriate to authorize the development of permit fee systems to support Montana's comprehensive water pollution control program."

1993 Statement of Intent: The statement of intent attached to Ch. 507, L. 1993, provided: "A statement of intent is required for this bill because it authorizes the board of health and environmental sciences [now board of environmental review] to adopt rules regarding fees to be assessed to applicants for or holders of certain permits or licenses. The intent of this bill is to allow the department of health and environmental sciences [now department of environmental quality] to charge for its services in administering its comprehensive water permitting program. These services include both the permitting function and followup monitoring and enforcement programs to ensure that activities are complying with the terms and conditions of the permit. In addition, the legislature anticipates that fees will be assessed to applicants or permittees under other statutory authorities for which an exclusion from a water quality permit requirement is provided by rule.

The board shall attempt to develop a structured fee system that can be clearly applied to all activities addressed under this bill and that results in revenue that approximates the department's documented cost of implementing its comprehensive water quality permit program. The permit review fee system must be based on an average assessment of the department's direct and indirect cost of reviewing permit applications, including the cost of support services, inservice training, and correspondence. The annual fee system may involve fees that are prescribed by category according to the criteria in [section 1(2)(b)] [75-5-516(2)(b)].

The board shall consider the following fee structures as prima facie indicators of appropriate fee assessments.

	Application fee	Annual fee
Publicly owned treatment works	$250 — $1,000	$250 — $2,500
Industrial storm and ground water systems	$1,000	$1,000 — $2,500
Industrial cooling water systems	$500	$200 — $500
Industrial systems with toxic substances	$2,500 — $5,000	$2,500
General permits	$200 — $500	$250 — $2,500
Nondegradation review:
(1) Domestic sewage treatment	$2,500
(2) Industrial	$2,500 — $5,000
(3) Subdivision	$120 — $200 per lot

The annual fee is to be assessed for each million gallons of waste discharged per day on a yearly average and is specific to each discharge at a facility. The lower values are minimum fees, regardless of the amount of waste discharged. For either the application fee or annual fee for storm water discharges, a facility may not be charged for more than the five storm water discharge points that yield the highest fees.

The legislature also intends that a facility that consistently discharges effluent at less than or equal to one-half of its permit limit concentration, using the previous year's discharge data, is entitled to a 25% fee reduction in its annual fee. Further, any facility that consistently discharges effluent at levels between 50% and 100% of its permit limit concentration is entitled to a proportionate fee reduction of up to 25%. For a permit with multiple parameter limits, the annual average of the percentage of use of each parameter limit should be used to determine an overall percentage. A new permittee is not eligible for fee reduction in its first year of operation, and dilution is not intended as a means to justify lower annual fees.

Further, the board's rules should provide a mechanism for coordinating collection of fees for the review and monitoring of projects and activities authorized by [section 1] [75-5-516] with any other fees that are collected by other state agencies for the review and monitoring of those projects and activities. The fees collected by the department may not duplicate the fees collected by another state agency for services in reviewing permit, certificate, and license applications and in conducting monitoring."

Applicability: Section 5(1), Ch. 507, L. 1993, provided that subsection (1) of 75-5-516 applies to all applications or petitions filed on or after October 1, 1993, and to all current and future holders of permits, licenses, or other authorizations described in subsection (1) of 75-5-516.

Section 5(2) authorized the Board of Health and Environmental Sciences (now Board of Environmental Review) to begin rulemaking prior to October 1, 1993.

Coordination: Section 8, Ch. 595, L. 1993, provided: "If House Bill No. 388 is passed and approved and if it requires the department of health and environmental sciences [now department of environmental quality] to impose and collect fees for authorizations to degrade state waters, then [section 6 of this act] is void." House Bill No. 388 was approved as Ch. 507, L. 1993, and included the imposition of fees for authorizations to degrade state waters in 75-5-516; therefore, sec. 6, Ch. 595, L. 1993, which enacted similar application fees, was void.

Chapter 595 inserted (1)(d) prohibiting degradation of state waters without authorization. Amendment effective April 29, 1993.

1993 Statement of Intent: The statement of intent attached to Ch. 595, L. 1993, provided: "A statement of intent is required for this bill because the bill requires the board of health and environmental sciences [now board of environmental review] to adopt administrative rules. The legislature clearly intends that the nondegradation policy protect and maintain existing quality of state waters from any loss in the quality of those waters. The nondegradation policy is intended to apply to any activity that has the potential to affect existing water quality and requires department review of all such activities to ensure that degradation does not occur.

In recognition that certain activities promote general welfare and may justify lower water quality in a particular water segment, the legislature intends that degradation be allowed in limited circumstances and under certain conditions. For example, if there is no alternative to a proposed project that does not result in degradation and the project is found to be in the best interests of the state, degradation may be allowed provided that water quality protection practices are implemented that limit degradation to the extent determined to be economically and technologically feasible.

To promote the goal of maintaining existing high-quality water, the board is to develop rules specifying the level of protection or treatment required if degradation is allowed. Rules are to be developed that provide procedures for department review of applications to degrade state waters, that provide guidance or standards for the level of treatment required, and that establish criteria that allow the department to weigh the social and economic benefit to the public of allowing the proposed project against the loss of water quality. It is the intent of the legislature that the department's decision involve public and governmental agencies' comment prior to a final decision.

It is further the intent of the legislature that the board develop rules that will provide guidance to the department in the use and creation of mixing zones. The rules are to ensure that water quality impacts from the use of mixing zones are minimized."

Case Notes

Area of Unique Ecological or Recreational Significance — General Permit for Storm Water Discharge Improper: The Department of Environmental Quality improperly granted the Rock Creek Mine a general permit for storm water discharge when, under ARM 17.30.1341, Rock Creek is an area of unique ecological significance because of its impacts on fishery resources and other local conditions at the proposed discharge site. Clark Fork Coalition v. Dept. of Environmental Quality, 2012 MT 240, 366 Mont. 427, 288 P.3d 183.

Violation of Permit: Failure by city to notify the Department of Health and Environmental Sciences (now Department of Environmental Quality) and the federal Environmental Protection Agency of its bypass of raw sewage away from treatment plant into Yellowstone River in violation of its permit to make limited discharges was not actionable under this section where state and federal agencies had actual notice of the discharges. Preamble: The preamble attached to Ch. 504, L. 1993, provided: "WHEREAS, it is necessary and reasonable for the Department of Health and Environmental Sciences [now Department of Environmental Quality] to actively enforce the provisions of Montana's water quality laws; and

WHEREAS, the use of the District Courts to achieve civil penalty assessments consumes significant financial resources from both the regulated public and the State of Montana; and

WHEREAS, many parties may wish to resolve violations of Montana's water quality laws in an administrative proceeding that authorizes direct payments to the State of Montana without the large expenses inherent with the filing of a judicial lawsuit; and

WHEREAS, the Board of Health and Environmental Sciences [now Board of Environmental Review] may specify situations in which the Department of Health and Environmental Sciences [now Department of Environmental Quality] should pursue an action administratively; and

WHEREAS, in several situations, the administrative assessment of civil penalties under Montana's water quality laws would be a more effective deterrent than resolution of cases through the District Courts; and

WHEREAS, the Department of Health and Environmental Sciences [now Department of Environmental Quality] would be able to apply its limited enforcement resources to a broader array of violations; and

WHEREAS, the Federal Water Pollution Control Act provides for a similar administrative penalty, which could ultimately become a condition of primacy for state administration of water quality programs in Montana; and

WHEREAS, the citizens and businesses of the State of Montana, as well as the Department of Health and Environmental Sciences [now Department of Environmental Quality], would benefit from the availability of an administrative penalty in Montana's water quality laws.

THEREFORE, the Legislature of the State of Montana finds it appropriate to authorize an administrative penalty within Montana's water quality laws."

1993 Statement of Intent: The statement of intent attached to Ch. 504, L. 1993, provided: "A statement of intent is provided for this bill in order to assist the board of health and environmental sciences [now board of environmental review] in promulgating rules. The legislature intends that the administrative penalty provided by this bill be used to encourage compliance with Montana's water quality laws by allowing more timely and efficient processing of certain enforcement actions without the need for a higher penalty sought through a district court. To promote these goals, the board should develop rules that prescribe penalties for specific types of violations. In doing so, the board shall ensure that its rules are consistent with the criteria set forth in 75-5-631(4). Further, the board and department shall take measures to ensure that the rules are disseminated to the regulated community.

The legislature also intends that the board's rules be no less stringent than the federal rules and guidance implementing the Federal Water Pollution Control Act."

Case Notes

Venue Properly Based Solely Upon Allegations in Complaint — Affidavits Not Considered — Venue Found Proper for Both Defendants: The Department of Health and Environmental Sciences (now Department of Environmental Quality) brought an action in Lewis and Clark County against Pegasus Gold Corporation (Pegasus) and Zortman Mining, Inc. (ZMI), for numerous violations of the Montana water quality laws at the Zortman and Landusky mines located in Phillips County. The complaint alleged that Pegasus owned or controlled the mines and that both Pegasus and ZMI did business in Lewis and Clark County, making that county a proper place for venue. ZMI moved to change venue to Phillips County, alleging that Pegasus did not own or control ZMI, and attached affidavits of Fletcher and Erickson to support its motion. Citing Petersen v. Tucker, 228 M 393, 742 P2d 483 (1987), the Supreme Court held that the District Court properly relied upon the allegations in the complaint without considering the two affidavits. The Supreme Court held that inasmuch as Pegasus was a named defendant at the time of the complaint and did business in Lewis and Clark County, that county was proper for venue. The Supreme Court noted that because the motion for change of venue did not refer to or rely upon the Fletcher affidavit, it was properly not considered by the District Court. The Supreme Court also noted that because the Erickson affidavit did not contradict the allegations in the complaint that Pegasus owned or controlled ZMI, the District Court was correct in focusing on the allegations in the complaint. The Supreme Court held that venue was properly found in Lewis and Clark County for both defendants because under the provisions of 25-2-117, a county that is proper venue for one defendant is proper for both. (See 2005 amendment to 75-5-631.) State ex rel. Dept. of Health and Environmental Sciences v. Pegasus Gold Corp., 270 M 32, 889 P2d 1197, 52 St. Rep. 64 (1995).

2005 Amendment: Chapter 487 in (3) inserted second and third sentences relating to actions to enforce a penalty and venue for the actions; in (4) substituted "In determining the amount of penalties under this section, the district court shall take into account the penalty factors in 75-1-1001" for "In an action seeking penalties under this section, the department shall take into account the following factors in determining an appropriate settlement or judgment, as appropriate:

(a) the nature, circumstances, extent, and gravity of the violation; and

(b) with respect to the violator, the violator's ability to pay and prior history of violations, the economic benefit or savings, if any, to the violator resulting from the violator's action, the amounts voluntarily expended by the violator to address or mitigate the violation or impacts of the violation to waters of the state, and other matters that justice may require"; and made minor changes in style. 1991 Amendment: In (1) increased maximum civil penalty from $10,000 to $25,000; and inserted (4) requiring Department, when seeking civil penalties subsequent to filing of complaint, to consider certain factors in determining appropriate settlement.

1991 Statement of Intent: The statement of intent attached to Ch. 644, L. 1991, provided: "It is the legislature's intent that the department of health and environmental sciences [now department of environmental quality] develop penalty guidelines to ensure that the civil penalty provided by 75-5-631 is fairly applied by the department in reaching settlement agreements with persons who have violated Title 75, chapter 5, part 6. The legislature recognizes that the department may, in its initial filings, seek the maximum penalty of $25,000 for each day of violation. However, it is the legislature's intent that the actual amount assessed in a settlement reflect the factors listed in 75-5-631(4) and that the department apply these factors uniformly to all violators.

This bill does not direct the department to adopt rules to ensure the uniform application of the factors listed in 75-5-631(4). The enforcement guidelines developed by the department should include a process for applying the factors to each violator, guidance for determining the amount to request in a civil complaint, and, most importantly, a format for determining an equitable settlement value. 1989 Statement of Intent: The statement of intent attached to Ch. 678, L. 1989, provided: "This bill creates a revolving loan program capitalized with federal and state funds to provide financial assistance for water pollution control projects. A statement of intent is required for this bill because it delegates rulemaking authority to the board of health and environmental sciences [now board of environmental review] and the board of natural resources and conservation [now department of natural resources and conservation] to implement the provisions of this bill.

The boards are authorized to adopt rules necessary for the establishment and administration of the water treatment works revolving loan program. The authority includes establishing rules:

(1) prescribing the form and content of applications for loans and refinancing agreements;

(2) governing the application of the criteria for awarding loans;

(3) establishing additional terms and conditions for making the loans and the security instruments and other necessary agreements; and

(4) establishing ceilings on the amount of individual loans, if deemed appropriate and necessary for the successful administration of the program, to be made to municipalities and private concerns."

Case Notes

Authority of Water and Sewer Association to Ban Private Wells Within Subdivision: A private, nonprofit water and sewer association was created to regulate the use of water and the handling and disposition of sewage within a subdivision. A drought forced the temporary shutdown of the association's water system and the institution of watering restrictions in order to preserve sufficient pressure and capacity in the water system to meet subdivision residents' demands for drinking water, household use, and fire suppression activities. Defendants decided to explore the possibility of drilling a private well for lawn and garden purposes. The association board subsequently decided to ban private wells in the subdivision for all purposes. Nevertheless, defendants drilled an untreated well solely for lawn and garden use. The association then demanded that defendants abandon their well, and when defendants refused, the association sought a declaratory judgment that the rule prohibiting private wells was valid and enforceable and requested the District Court to require defendants to abandon their well. Defendants denied that the association had the authority to burden private property interests or to require removal of the well. The District Court concluded that the rule was valid, granted summary judgment for the association, and ordered removal of defendants' well. On appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed. The rule was reasonably related to the association's obligation to preserve the health, safety, and financial viability of its water system and was valid and legal. The fact that the rule affected a well that was not directly owned by the association did not affect the validity of the rule because, as members of the association, defendants were bound by association rules intended to protect the public water system. The possibility that defendants' untreated well could be attached to the subdivision water system posed a cross-contamination threat to the system, and the well also posed a threat of depletion of the aquifer that the association depended upon in part for its public water supply, so abandonment of the well was warranted. Eastgate Village Water & Sewer Ass'n v. Davis, 2008 MT 141, 343 M 108, 183 P3d 873 (2008), following Appeal of Two Crow Ranch, Inc., 159 M 16, 494 P2d 915 (1972).

Dismissal for Lack of Subject Matter Jurisdiction Proper Upon Failure to Exhaust Administrative Remedies Absent Showing of Futility: Plaintiff filed for declaratory judgment and injunctive relief against state agencies and a subdivision water development company regarding plaintiff's provision of water to subdivisions developed by the company. The District Court dismissed for lack of subject matter jurisdiction, and plaintiff appealed. Generally, before a party can seek declaratory relief in District Court, the party must exhaust its administrative remedies, although courts generally will not require exhaustion of administrative remedies when recourse to an administrative remedy would be futile. However, the mere possibility of an adverse decision does not mean that resort to an administrative agency is futile, nor does the possibility that agencies might render decisions that could in some degree conflict justify bypassing the administrative process. Plaintiff in this case could not demonstrate futility, and seeking to skip the administrative process constituted an unwarranted intrusion into the agencies' regulatory authority. Thus, the District Court did not abuse its discretion by dismissing the action for lack of subject matter jurisdiction when plaintiff did not first exhaust its administrative remedies before seeking judicial review. Attorney General's Opinions

Fluoridation of Public Water Supplies: The Montana State Board of Health (now Board of Environmental Review) does not have statutory authority to require fluoridation of municipal water supplies. The requirement of fluoridation of public water supplies is within the general police power, but the Legislature has not specifically authorized the Board to require fluoridation. 33 A.G. Op. 16 (1970).

The Department of Environmental Quality was actually created in [section 20]. Pursuant to the authority contained in sec. 73, Ch. 18, L. 1995, the Code Commissioner has corrected the erroneous reference.

Chapter 488 inserted definitions of certified wellhead protection area, cross-connection, industrial waste discharge system, and Montana wellhead protection program; in definition of public sewage system, near middle after "that", substituted "serves 15" for "is designed to serve or serves 10"; in definition of public water supply system, near middle after "that", substituted "has at least 15 service connections or that regularly serves at least 25 persons daily for a period of" for "is designed to serve or serves 10 or more families or 25 or more persons daily or has at least 10 service connections"; in definition of transient noncommunity water system, at end, substituted "does not regularly serve at least 25 of the same persons for at least 6 months a year" for "serves persons on a transient basis"; and made minor changes in style.

Chapter 546 deleted definition of Board that read: ""Board" means the board of health and environmental sciences provided for in 2-15-2104"; pursuant to sec. 568, Ch. 546, L. 1995, a coordination section, in definition of Department the Code Commissioner substituted "department of environmental quality" for "department of health and environmental sciences"; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective July 1, 1995.

Because Ch. 418 inserted a reference to the Board of Environmental Review and Ch. 546 deleted a reference to the Board of Health and Environmental Sciences, the codifier has reflected both the insertion and the deletion.

Transition: Section 499, Ch. 418, L. 1995, provided: "The provisions of 2-15-131 through 2-15-137 apply to [this act]."

Saving Clauses: Section 503, Ch. 418, L. 1995, was a saving clause.

Section 571, Ch. 546, L. 1995, was a saving clause.

1991 Amendment: Inserted definitions of community water system and transient noncommunity water system; and in definition of public water supply system inserted "is designed to serve or".

1991 Statement of Intent: The statement of intent attached to Ch. 645, L. 1991, provided: "A statement of intent is provided for this bill because rulemaking authority is delegated to the board of health and environmental sciences [now board of environmental review] to prescribe procedures for administrative enforcement actions undertaken by the department of health and environmental sciences [now department of environmental quality] in administering the public water supply laws, as provided in Title 75, chapter 6, and to develop a fee schedule to enable the department to recover costs in administering these laws. Rulemaking authority is also delegated to the department to develop fees to pay for costs of reviewing plats and subdivisions under the laws related to sanitation in subdivisions, as provided in Title 76, chapter 4. It is the intent of the legislature that the rules establish a reasonable fee schedule that approximates the department's actual and necessary costs.

The legislature anticipates that the department will expand its enforcement activity in order to address ongoing and increasing health problems with public water supply systems and public sewage systems in Montana. In undertaking this effort, the legislature expects that the department will have the option to pursue administrative enforcement as a means of expediting and encouraging compliance with Title 75, chapter 6. Nonetheless, it is the department's duty to clearly inform each violator of:

(1) the nature of the action taken against it;

(2) what the department requires to resolve the matter; and

(3) what legal avenues are available to the violator if he desires to contest the matter.

The legislature recognizes that an economic hardship may be imposed on a public water supply system in order for that system to be brought into compliance with state and federal public water supply laws and that this hardship may be further increased by the levying of administrative and civil penalties for noncompliance. It is the intention of the legislature that the department adopt rules that establish a procedure for the progressive enforcement of this act in which the levying of administrative and civil penalties is a final action. The department may adopt rules that allow for the bypass of the enforcement procedures and the immediate assessment of penalties if specific circumstances warrant this action.

The rules also require the board of health and environmental sciences [now board of environmental review] to develop fees for recovery of costs incurred by the department in delivering services to persons who own or operate or intend to own or operate a public water supply system or public sewage system. These costs include costs associated with review of engineering plans and specifications, inspections, and general assistance. To assist the board in developing these rules, the department shall prepare and submit to the board a detailed estimate of projected costs associated with these services for fiscal years 1992 and 1993. The board shall develop a fee schedule that will provide revenues that are commensurate with the projected costs. A similar approach should be used by the department in developing rules setting new fees for review of plats and subdivisions under 76-4-105."

1989 Amendment: Inserted definition of public sewage system.

Case Notes

Authority of Water and Sewer Association to Ban Private Wells Within Subdivision: A private, nonprofit water and sewer association was created to regulate the use of water and the handling and disposition of sewage within a subdivision. A drought forced the temporary shutdown of the association's water system and the institution of watering restrictions in order to preserve sufficient pressure and capacity in the water system to meet subdivision residents' demands for drinking water, household use, and fire suppression activities. Defendants decided to explore the possibility of drilling a private well for lawn and garden purposes. The association board subsequently decided to ban private wells in the subdivision for all purposes. Nevertheless, defendants drilled an untreated well solely for lawn and garden use. The association then demanded that defendants abandon their well, and when defendants refused, the association sought a declaratory judgment that the rule prohibiting private wells was valid and enforceable and requested the District Court to require defendants to abandon their well. Defendants denied that the association had the authority to burden private property interests or to require removal of the well. The District Court concluded that the rule was valid, granted summary judgment for the association, and ordered removal of defendants' well. On appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed. The rule was reasonably related to the association's obligation to preserve the health, safety, and financial viability of its water system and was valid and legal. The fact that the rule affected a well that was not directly owned by the association did not affect the validity of the rule because, as members of the association, defendants were bound by association rules intended to protect the public water system. The possibility that defendants' untreated well could be attached to the subdivision water system posed a cross-contamination threat to the system, and the well also posed a threat of depletion of the aquifer that the association depended upon in part for its public water supply, so abandonment of the well was warranted. Fluoridation of Public Water Supplies: The Montana State Board of Health (now Board Environmental Review) does not have statutory authority to require fluoridation of municipal water supplies. The requirement of fluoridation of public water supplies is within the general police power, but the Legislature has not specifically authorized the Board to require fluoridation. 33 A.G. Case Notes

Ex Parte Investigation: Section 69-1314, R.C.M. 1947 (now repealed), authorizing investigation of alleged pollution of water supply upon complaint and entry of order prohibiting continuance of pollution, did not provide for a public trial but contemplated an ex parte investigation by the State Board of Health (now Board of Environmental Review); the Board could, therefore, upon information from any source and before it had heard any testimony, make a valid order prohibiting a city from polluting a stream that was a source of water supply for domestic uses. Miles City v. St. Bd. of Health, 39 M 405, 102 P 696 (1909).

Preamble: The preamble attached to Ch. 471, L. 1995, provided: "WHEREAS, the federal government frequently regulates areas that are also subject to state regulation; and

WHEREAS, differing state and federal policy goals and unique state prerogatives frequently result in different levels of regulation, different standards, and different requirements being imposed by state and federal programs covering the same subject matter; and

WHEREAS, Montana must simultaneously move toward reducing redundant and unnecessary regulation that dulls the state's competitive advantage while being ever vigilant in the protection of the public's health, safety, and welfare; and

WHEREAS, Montana's administrative agencies should consider applicable federal standards when adopting, readopting, or amending rules with analogous federal counterparts; and

WHEREAS, Montana's administrative agencies should analyze whether analogous federal standards sufficiently protect the health, safety, and welfare of Montana's citizens; and

WHEREAS, as part of the formal rulemaking process, the public should be advised of the agencies' conclusions about whether analogous federal standards sufficiently protect the health, safety, and welfare of Montana citizens."

1995 Statement of Intent: The statement of intent attached to Ch. 471, L. 1995, provided: "A statement of intent is required for this bill in order to provide guidance to the board of health and environmental sciences [now board of environmental review], the department of health and environmental sciences [now department of environmental quality], and local units of government in complying with [this act].

The legislature intends that in addition to all requirements imposed by existing law and rules, the board or the department include as part of the initial publication and all subsequent publications of a rule a written finding if the rule in question contains any standards or requirements that exceed the standards or requirements imposed by comparable federal law.

If the rules are more stringent than comparable federal law, the written finding must include but is not limited to a discussion of the policy reasons and an analysis that supports the board's or department's decision that the proposed state standards or requirements protect public health or the environment of the state and that the state standards or requirements to be imposed can mitigate harm to the public health or the environment and are achievable under current technology. The department is not required to show that the federal regulation is inadequate to protect public health. The written finding must also include information from the hearing record regarding the costs to the regulated community directly attributable to the proposed state standard or requirement."

Effective Date: Section 23, Ch. 471, L. 1995, provided that this section is effective on passage and approval. Approved April 14, 1995.

Applicability: Section 22(1) and (3), Ch. 471, L. 1995, provided: "(1) [Sections 1 through 3] are intended to apply to any rule that is in effect, adopted, or amended, and that regulates those resources or activities for which the state has been given primary authority to regulate by federal authority pursuant to Title 75, chapter 2; Title 75, chapter 3 [renumbered, except for part 6, as Title 50, chapter 79]; Title 75, chapter 5; Title 75, chapter 6; or Title 75, chapter 10, as of [the effective date of this act] [April 14, 1995].

75-6-121. Delegation of review of small public water and sewer construction.

Compiler's Comments

1989 Statement of Intent: The statement of intent attached to Ch. 312, L. 1989, provided: "A statement of intent is required for [this act] because section 1(2) [75-6-121(2)] grants rulemaking authority to the board of health and environmental sciences [now board of environmental review]. The board would adopt rules governing the delegation to local governments of review of small public water systems and extensions or alterations of existing public water and sewer systems.

The rules are intended to establish criteria that would be used to determine whether a division of a local government has a review program suitable for delegation of review. The rules would specify the acceptable level of expertise and other factors necessary for local review and, if review authority has been granted, the circumstances under which the authority should be terminated or reviewed.

The rules are also intended to address the size of public water and sewer systems that would be subject to local review."

1995 Statement of Intent: The statement of intent attached to Ch. 553, L. 1995, provided: "A statement of intent is required for this bill because rulemaking authority is granted to the board of health and environmental sciences [now board of environmental quality] and the board of natural resources and conservation [now department of natural resources and conservation] to implement a new state financial assistance program for communities that need to improve their public water systems. The legislature understands and anticipates that the program will provide low interest loans and grants to Montana entities to construct needed improvements for water supply and treatment systems and that the program will be supported through federal grant funds and state matching funds raised through the issuance of general obligation bonds and repaid by interest charges of the loan. The bill requires rulemaking by both boards to establish procedures and criteria by which these loans and grants are awarded. In developing these rules, the legislature desires that the application review process should be straightforward and efficient for both the agencies and the applicant. Also, the criteria for awarding grants and loans should be clear and maximize the potential for state grants and loans to communities that need the funding.

Fundamentally, the legislature views this bill as providing a funding source for Montana entities required to meet drinking water standards or faced with upgrading or expanding their systems. Therefore, the rules should facilitate availability of this funding to the widest number of eligible entities at the lowest possible costs, taking into consideration the state's interest in protecting the viability of the program."

Channel Adjacent to Yellowstone River Subject to Act: The Park Conservation District correctly determined that a channel adjacent to the Yellowstone River is subject to the Natural Streambed and Land Preservation Act. The conservation district's decision was not arbitrary or capricious when the actual physical characteristics of the channel clearly showed that it was a natural channel. Livingston v. Park Conserv. Dist., 2013 MT 234, 371 Mont. 303, 307 P.3d 317.

Conservation District Afforded Public Fundamentally Fair Participation in Process: Though exempt from the dictates of the Montana Administrative Procedure Act as a political subdivision of the state, the conservation district followed its own rules, provided notice, and allowed an extended opportunity for the submission of oral and written information in deciding Mitchell Slough's status under The Natural Streambed and Land Preservation Act of 1975, also known as the "310 Law", Title 75, chapter 7, part 1. Bitterroot River Protective Assoc., Inc. v. Bitterroot Conserv. Dist., 2008 MT 377, 346 M 507, 198 P3d 219 (2008).

Diversion Dike Construction — Permit or Plan Required: The construction of a diversion dike with heavy equipment requires either a "310 permit" or an approved operation plan under this part. When this work is performed within a designated flood plain or floodway, the construction additionally requires a permit from the responsible political subdivision. 42 A.G. Op. 106 (1988).

Permit Necessary Before Altering Stream Channel — Irrigation: In accordance with The Natural Streambed and Land Preservation Act of 1975, an irrigator must apply to the supervisors of a local conservation district for a "310 permit" before altering a stream channel to divert water. All alterations, however slight, are subject to the permit process. 41 A.G. Op. 62 (1986).

Application of Part: Title 87, ch. 5, part 5, was enacted to regulate projects undertaken by governmental entities, and the Natural Streambed and Land Preservation Act of 1975 was enacted to control projects not subject to Title 87, ch. 5, part 5. 40 A.G. Op. 71 (1984).

Applicability of Natural Streambed and Land Preservation Act: The Montana Natural Streambed and Land Preservation Act is not applicable to federal projects, wherever located, unless Congress consents to regulation. The Act is applicable to nonfederal projects on federal lands unless a specific act of Congress preempts state regulation or unless the Act conflicts with applicable state regulation. The Act is applicable to private projects, but not state or local projects, on state lands. The Act is not applicable to Indian projects on Indian reservations but is applicable to non-Indian projects on non-Indian owned reservation lands if the Act does not conflict with tribal self-government. 37 A.G. Op. 15 (1977).

2003 Amendment: Chapter 361 inserted (1) relating to constitutional obligations and legislative intent; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective April 16, 2003.

Preamble: The preamble attached to Ch. 361, L. 2003, provided: "WHEREAS, Article II, section 3, of the Montana Constitution enumerates certain inalienable individual rights, including the right to a clean and healthful environment, the right of pursuing life's basic necessities, the right of enjoying and defending an individual's life and liberty, the right of acquiring, possessing, and protecting property, and the right of seeking individual safety, health, and happiness in all lawful ways; and

WHEREAS, the constitutionally enumerated rights are by their very nature bound to result in competing interests in specific fact situations; and

WHEREAS, Article IX, section 1, of the Montana Constitution provides that the state and each person shall maintain and improve a clean and healthful environment in Montana for present and future generations and directs the Legislature to provide for the administration and enforcement of this duty and also directs the Legislature to provide adequate remedies for the protection of the environmental life support system from degradation and to provide adequate remedies to prevent unreasonable depletion and degradation of natural resources; and

WHEREAS, the Legislature has reviewed the intent of the framers of the 1972 Montana Constitution as evidenced in the verbatim transcripts of the constitutional convention; and

WHEREAS, there is no indication that one enumerated inalienable right is intended to supersede other inalienable rights, including the right to use property in all lawful means; and

WHEREAS, the Legislature, mindful of its constitutional obligation to provide for the administration and enforcement of the constitution, has enacted a comprehensive set of laws to accomplish the goals of the constitution, including the Montana Clean Indoor Air Act of 1979, Title 50, chapter 40, part 1, MCA; the Montana Environmental Policy Act, Title 75, chapter 1, parts 1 through 3, MCA; the Clean Air Act of Montana, Title 75, chapter 2, parts 1 through 4, MCA; water quality laws, Title 75, chapter 5, MCA; The Natural Streambed and Land Preservation Act of 1975, Title 75, chapter 7, part 1, MCA; The Montana Solid Waste Management Act, Title 75, chapter 10, part 2, MCA; The Montana Hazardous Waste Act, Title 75, chapter 10, part 4, MCA; the Comprehensive Environmental Cleanup and Responsibility Act, Title 75, chapter 10, part 7, MCA; the Montana Megalandfill Siting Act, sections 75-10-901 through 75-10-945, MCA; the Montana Underground Storage Tank Installer and Inspector Licensing and Permitting Act, Title 75, chapter 11, part 2, MCA; the Montana Underground Storage Tank Act, Title 75, chapter 11, part 5, MCA; the Montana Major Facility Siting Act, Title 75, chapter 20, MCA; the Open-Space Land and Voluntary Conservation Easement Act, Title 76, chapter 6, MCA; the Environmental Control Easement Act, Title 76, chapter 7, MCA; The Strip and Underground Mine Siting Act, Title 82, chapter 4, part 1, MCA; The Montana Strip and Underground Mine Reclamation Act, Title 82, chapter 4, part 2, MCA; The Opencut Mining Act, Title 82, chapter 4, part 4, MCA; and The Nongame and Endangered Species Conservation Act, Title 87, chapter 5, part 1, MCA."

Severability: Section 39, Ch. 361, L. 2003, was a severability clause.

Retroactive Applicability: Section 41, Ch. 361, L. 2003, provided: "[This act] applies retroactively, within the meaning of 1-2-109, to actions for judicial review or other causes of action challenging the issuance of a permit, petition for review, amendment, license, arbitration, action, certificate, or inspection that are pending but not yet decided on or after [the effective date of this act]." Effective April 16, 2003.

Case Notes

District Court Erred in Affirming Conservation District's Determination Regarding Mitchell Slough: The District Court's narrow, technical definition of "natural" as meaning "in the absence of any man-made manipulation" and resulting conclusions led to errors of law. The totality of the circumstances of the factual record should have been considered in determining whether the Mitchell Slough is a "natural, perennial-flowing stream or river" for the purpose of Title 75, chapter 7, part 1. Bitterroot River Protective Assoc., Inc. v. Bitterroot Conserv. Dist., 2008 MT 377, 346 M 507, 198 P3d 219 (2008).

District Court in Error When Concluding That Mitchell Slough Was Not Natural Water Body: The District Court's use of the dictionary definition of "natural" as pristine and unaffected by humans in relation to the stream access laws under Title 23, chapter 2, part 3, leads to an absurd result that prohibits the very public recreational access it was designed to allow. The proper conclusion is that the return flows that find their way to and join the flow in the Mitchell Slough's historic channel are to be appropriately analyzed as freed, appropriative waters. Bitterroot River Protective Assoc., Inc. v. Bitterroot Conserv. Dist., 2008 MT 377, 346 M 507, 198 P3d 219 (2008).

Scope of Writ of Prohibition — Writ Inappropriate to Stop Conservation District From Making Initial Determination of Whether Body of Water Considered Natural Perennial Flowing Stream When Other Remedies Exist: After unsuccessfully attempting to have the Department of Natural Resources and Conservation, the Department of Fish, Wildlife, and Parks, and the Department of Environmental Quality make the determination as to whether a slough east of Victor was a perennial flowing stream and thus subject to The Natural Streambed and Land Preservation Act of 1975, the county conservation district decided to use a public hearing process to make the determination. Plaintiffs sought a writ of prohibition to stop the conservation district from determining the status of the slough. After the writ was denied in District Court, plaintiffs submitted it to the Supreme Court. A writ of prohibition serves to stop an entity exercising judicial functions from acting when the proceedings are beyond that entity's jurisdiction and are clearly unlawful, but should not replace an appeal or perform the function of a writ of review. A writ of prohibition is justified only by extreme necessity when the grievance cannot be redressed by ordinary proceedings at law, in equity, or by appeal. The existence of another remedy, even if inconvenient or indirect, prevents a party from seeking a writ of prohibition. In the interest of both judicial economy and agency efficiency, an exhaustion of administrative remedies allows a governmental agency to make a factual record and to correct its own errors within its specific expertise before a court interferes. After noting that the Act does not specifically authorize a conservation district or any other entity with the power to classify bodies of water as streams, the Supreme Court found that the conservation district was simply attempting to apply the Legislature's articulated requirement of a natural perennial flowing stream and declined to interfere with the conservation district's ability to initially determine the scope of its jurisdiction and exercise its expertise to decide whether the slough was in fact a stream. Further, once the status of the slough was determined, there was nothing to prevent plaintiffs from seeking judicial review of the conservation district's declaratory rulings. Because extreme necessity and lack of redress did not exist, a writ of prohibition was inappropriate to stop the conservation district from making the initial ruling on the status of the slough, so the writ was denied. Bitterroot River Protection Ass'n, Inc. v. Bitterroot Conserv. District, 2002 MT 66, 309 M 207, 45 P3d 24 (2002), followed in Paulson v. Flathead Conserv. District, 2004 MT 136, 321 M 364, 91 P3d 569 (2004).

All alterations, however slight, are subject to the permit process. 41 A.G. Op. 62 (1986).

Conservation District Supervisors' Review of Impact on Land Between Stream Crossings: Conservation district supervisors do not have authority under the Natural Streambed and Land Preservation Act of 1975 (Title 75, ch. 7, part 1) to review the route of a proposed pipeline within the county at places other than stream crossings. This is true even though a lawful review of several stream crossings may amount to a review of the land between the crossings. The Act and the standards adopted by the Board of Natural Resources and Conservation (now Department of Natural Resources and Conservation) make clear that the review applies only to the stream sites themselves. However, the supervisors may formulate regulations under 76-15-701 to address the issue of land use in their jurisdiction. 39 A.G. Op. 2 (1981).

Scope of Natural Streambed and Land Preservation Act: Under both the Natural Streambed and Land Preservation Act and the regulations implementing the Act, the scope of the projects subject to review and approval by a conservation district has been limited to those actually located at the site of a stream and the immediately adjacent property. 39 A.G. Op. 2 (1981).

2003 Amendment: Chapter 447 in definition of project in (a) after "modification" substituted "that results in a change in the state of a natural, perennial-flowing stream or river, its bed, or its immediate banks" for "of a stream in the state of Montana that results in a change in the state of the stream" and inserted (b)(iii) providing that project does not include livestock grazing activities; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective April 21, 2003.

1995 Amendment: Chapter 426 in definition of district, in (c) after "commissioners", inserted "in a county"; in definition of project, in (a) after "stream", deleted "in contravention of 75-7-102" and in (b) substituted language establishing that project does not include activity submitted to and approval by district and historic maintenance and repair not significantly modifying stream for former language that read: "(b) Project does not include customary and historic maintenance and repair of existing irrigation facilities:

(i) that do not significantly alter or modify the stream in contravention of 75-7-102; or

(ii) for which a plan of annual operation has been submitted to and approved by the district. The plan is subject to future review and approval by the district at its option. Any modification to the plan must have prior approval of the district"; at end of definition of stream, after "banks", inserted exception clause; inserted definition of written consent of the supervisors; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective April 13, 1995.

1987 Amendment: Inserted actions not falling within definition of project.

Employment status is insufficient, of itself, to establish partiality, and plaintiffs' argument amounted to a speculative and conclusory allegation of partiality, rather than the direct and demonstrable evidence of partiality required to vacate an award. Amendment effective October 1, 2003.

Preamble: The preamble attached to Ch. 361, L. 2003, provided: "WHEREAS, Article II, section 3, of the Montana Constitution enumerates certain inalienable individual rights, including the right to a clean and healthful environment, the right of pursuing life's basic necessities, the right of enjoying and defending an individual's life and liberty, the right of acquiring, possessing, and protecting property, and the right of seeking individual safety, health, and happiness in all lawful ways; and

WHEREAS, the constitutionally enumerated rights are by their very nature bound to result in competing interests in specific fact situations; and

WHEREAS, Article IX, section 1, of the Montana Constitution provides that the state and each person shall maintain and improve a clean and healthful environment in Montana for present and future generations and directs the Legislature to provide for the administration and enforcement of this duty and also directs the Legislature to provide adequate remedies for the protection of the environmental life support system from degradation and to provide adequate remedies to prevent unreasonable depletion and degradation of natural resources; and

WHEREAS, the Legislature has reviewed the intent of the framers of the 1972 Montana Constitution as evidenced in the verbatim transcripts of the constitutional convention; and

WHEREAS, there is no indication that one enumerated inalienable right is intended to supersede other inalienable rights, including the right to use property in all lawful means; and

WHEREAS, the Legislature, mindful of its constitutional obligation to provide for the administration and enforcement of the constitution, has enacted a comprehensive set of laws to accomplish the goals of the constitution, including the Montana Clean Indoor Air Act of 1979, Title 50, chapter 40, part 1, MCA; the Montana Environmental Policy Act, Title 75, chapter 1, parts 1 through 3, MCA; the Clean Air Act of Montana, Title 75, chapter 2, parts 1 through 4, MCA; water quality laws, Title 75, chapter 5, MCA; The Natural Streambed and Land Preservation Act of 1975, Title 75, chapter 7, part 1, MCA; The Montana Solid Waste Management Act, Title 75, chapter 10, part 2, MCA; The Montana Hazardous Waste Act, Title 75, chapter 10, part 4, MCA; the Comprehensive Environmental Cleanup and Responsibility Act, Title 75, chapter 10, part 7, MCA; the Montana Megalandfill Siting Act, sections 75-10-901 through 75-10-945, MCA; the Montana Underground Storage Tank Installer and Inspector Licensing and Permitting Act, Title 75, chapter 11, part 2, MCA; the Montana Underground Storage Tank Act, Title 75, chapter 11, part 5, MCA; the Montana Major Facility Siting Act, Title 75, chapter 20, MCA; the Open-Space Land and Voluntary Conservation Easement Act, Title 76, chapter 6, MCA; the Environmental Control Easement Act, Title 76, chapter 7, MCA; The Strip and Underground Mine Siting Act, Title 82, chapter 4, part 1, MCA; The Montana Strip and Underground Mine Reclamation Act, Title 82, chapter 4, part 2, MCA; The Opencut Mining Act, Title 82, chapter 4, part 4, MCA; and The Nongame and Endangered Species Conservation Act, Title 87, chapter 5, part 1, MCA."

Severability: Section 39, Ch. 361, L. 2003, was a severability clause.

Retroactive Applicability: Section 41, Ch. 361, L. 2003, provided: "[This act] applies retroactively, within the meaning of 1-2-109, to actions for judicial review or other causes of action challenging the issuance of a permit, petition for review, amendment, license, arbitration, action, certificate, or inspection that are pending but not yet decided on or after [the effective date of this act]." Effective April 16, 2003.

1995 Amendment: Chapter 426 at beginning, after "Any", inserted "review of" and after "action" substituted "by the supervisors under 75-7-112 or 75-7-113 must be by arbitration. Judicial review of an arbitration action is under the provisions of Title 27, chapter 5, part 3" for "under this part may be appealed within 30 days to the district court".

Part 4
Phosphorus Compounds — Model Rule

Part Compiler's Comments

Preamble and Statement of Intent: The preamble to Ch. 574, L. 1985, provided: "WHEREAS, Montana's outstanding environmental and economic values depend on maintaining excellent water quality; and

WHEREAS, phosphorus is a nutrient that stimulates the growth of algae and contributes to a decline in water quality in certain lakes and rivers; and

WHEREAS, substantial amounts of phosphorus enter Montana's aquatic ecosystems as a result of the use of detergents; and

WHEREAS, many studies have shown that regional restrictions on the use of nonessential detergent phosphorus compounds have protected and enhanced water quality; and

WHEREAS, the Department of Health and Environmental Sciences [now Department of Environmental Quality] has determined that excessive amounts of culturally derived phosphorus are jeopardizing water quality in some of Montana's most outstanding waters; and

WHEREAS, the Department of Health and Environmental Sciences [now Department of Environmental Quality] has the expertise to develop a model rule to effectively limit the amount of detergent phosphorus compounds that will enter state waters; and

WHEREAS, a limitation on the sale and distribution of certain detergent phosphorus compounds may best be enacted to meet local needs and circumstances; and

WHEREAS, such a limitation will not cause additional costs or burdens to consumers and retailers.

THEREFORE, the Legislature finds it appropriate to allow county governments to protect and enhance water quality by prohibiting the sale and distribution of certain nonessential detergent phosphorus compounds, following the technical standards established by the Department of Health and Environmental Sciences [now Department of Environmental Quality]."

The statement of intent attached to Ch. 574, L. 1985, provided: "(1) It is the intent of the legislature that the department of health and environmental sciences [now department of environmental quality] adopt a model rule with standards that may be adopted and enforced by a governing body of a county to prohibit the sale and distribution of certain phosphorus compounds used for cleaning purposes. The standards in the model rule must be designed to protect water quality and aquatic ecosystems by reducing the amount of phosphorus that enters state waters. In adopting the initial model rule, the department shall demonstrate strong consideration of the following provisions:

(a) Definitions:

(i) "Chemical water conditioner" means a water-softening chemical or other substance containing phosphorus intended to treat water for machine laundry use.

(ii) "Commercial establishment" means any premises used for the purpose of carrying on or exercising any trade, business, profession, vocation, or commercial or charitable activity, including but not limited to laundries, hospitals, hotels, motels, and food or restaurant establishments.

(iii) "Household cleaning product" means any product, including but not limited to soaps and detergents, used for domestic or commercial cleaning purposes, including but not limited to the cleaning of fabrics, dishes, food utensils, and household and commercial premises. Household cleaning product does not mean foods, drugs, cosmetics, or personal care items such as toothpaste, shampoo, or hand soap.

(iv) "Person" means any individual, proprietor of a commercial establishment, corporation, municipality, the state or any department, agency, or subdivision of the state, and any partnership, unincorporated association, or other legal entity.

(v) "Phosphorus" means elemental phosphorus.

(vi) "Trace quantity" means an incidental amount of phosphorus which is not part of the household cleaning product formulation, is present only as a consequence of manufacturing, and does not exceed 0.5% of the content of the product by weight expressed as elemental phosphorus.

(b) Prohibitions and exceptions:

(i) Except as provided in (1)(b)(ii) through (1)(b)(iv), no household cleaning product may be distributed, sold, offered, or exposed for sale if it contains a phosphorus compound in concentrations in excess of a trace quantity.

(ii) No dishwashing detergent may be distributed, sold, offered, or exposed for sale if it contains a phosphorus compound in excess of 8.7% by weight expressed as elemental phosphorus.

(iii) No chemical water conditioner which contains more than 20% phosphorus by weight may be distributed, sold, offered, or exposed for sale.

(iv) Cleaning agents used for industrial processes, cleaning food and beverage processing equipment, cleaning medical or surgical equipment, or cleaning dairy equipment are exempt from the provisions of this rule.

(2) It is the intent of the legislature that an ordinance with standards designated by the model rule may be adopted at the option of a county government and, if adopted, must be enforced by the county government. Any ordinance applies only in a county that has adopted it through proper procedures. The department of health and environmental sciences [now department of environmental quality] may not enforce any standards or provisions of the model rule.

(3) It is the intent of the legislature that standards in the model rule may not include standards that would adversely affect public health through the restriction of any cleaning agent necessary for food and beverage processing or for health care services or facilities and may not include standards that would restrict the use of detergents or other phosphorus compounds necessary for agricultural operations or industrial processes."

environmental sciences provided for in Title 2, chapter 15, part 21"; in definition of solid waste, in (b), with regard to reclamation, substituted "department of environmental quality" for "department of state lands" and, with regard to slash and forest debris, substituted "department of natural resources and conservation" for "department of state lands"; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective July 1, 1995.

Chapter 546 deleted definition of Board that read: ""Board" means the board of health and environmental sciences provided for in 2-15-2104"; pursuant to sec. 568, Ch. 546, L. 1995, a coordination section, in definition of Department the Code Commissioner substituted "department of environmental quality" for "department of health and environmental sciences"; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective July 1, 1995.

Because Ch. 418 inserted a reference to the Board of Environmental Review and Ch. 546 deleted a reference to the Board of Health and Environmental Sciences, the codifier has reflected both the insertion and the deletion.

Style changes in the chapters were slightly different. In each case, the codifier chose the most appropriate.

1993 Amendment: Chapter 201 inserted definition of container site; and in definition of solid waste management system inserted last sentence regarding container sites. Amendment effective July 1, 1993.

1991 Amendment: In definition of solid waste, in first sentence after "refuse", deleted "hazardous wastes", after "facilities" deleted "septic tank and cesspool pumpings", after "wood" substituted "products or wood byproducts" for "wastes", and at end of second sentence inserted reference to slash and forest debris or marketable byproducts; and made minor changes in style.

1981 Amendment: Deleted "state" after "means the" at the beginning of (3) and (4); inserted (5) defining front-end implementation funds.

Saving Clause: Section 6, Ch. 482, L. 1981, was a saving clause.

Severability: Section 7, Ch. 482, L. 1981, was a severability clause.

Attorney General's Opinions

Refuse District Not Special Taxing District or Political Subdivision: Under the rationale of 17-5-1604 and 42 A.G. Op. 80 (1988), a refuse disposal district (now solid waste management district) has no independent governing body and therefore does not fall within the definition of "special taxing district". Further, under the rationale of 43 A.G. Op. 56 (1990), because a refuse board is not a separate and independent body and has not been delegated supervisory authority over a refuse disposal district, a refuse disposal district cannot be considered a political subdivision, as that term is used in 17-5-1604. 43 A.G. Op. 68 (1990).

2001 Amendment: Chapter 170 in (2)(d) inserted "tonnage or volume-based" and substituted "75-10-115(1)(c)" for "75-10-118"; inserted (2)(e), (2)(f), and (2)(g) requiring adoption of rules establishing the license application fee that facility is subject to under 75-10-115(1)(a), the flat annual license renewal fee that a facility is subject to under 75-10-115(1)(b), and the tonnage or volume-based annual renewal fee that a facility is subject to under 75-10-115(1)(c); in (2)(h) substituted "75-10-204(6)" for "75-10-118"; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective March 30, 2001.

1993 Amendment: Chapter 145 in (2)(d) and (2)(e) inserted reference to 75-10-115; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective July 1, 1993.

Code Commissioner Note: The version of this section effective July 1, 1995, in (2)(d) and (2)(e) substituted "75-10-118" for "75-10-115". The Code Commissioner has not reflected this change because it would be redundant with the amendment made by Ch. 145.

1993 Statement of Intent: The statement of intent attached to Ch. 145, L. 1993, provided: "A statement of intent is desirable for this bill in order to coordinate certain provisions of existing law with Chapter 398, Laws of 1991. Chapter 398 provided a delayed effective date, and when its provisions become effective on July 1, 1993, certain provisions of law will be amended. The purpose of this bill is to reinstate certain provisions of law that will be deleted when Chapter 398 becomes effective.

It is the intent of the legislature that [sections 1, 2, 4, and 5] [75-10-104, 75-10-105, 75-10-116, and 75-10-117] of this bill maintain the existing authority of the department of health and environmental sciences [now department of environmental quality] rather than add new authority.

It is also the purpose of this bill to repeal a section of The Montana Solid Waste Management Act that was not included in Chapter 398. Chapter 398 repealed 75-10-110, effective July 1, 1993. [Section 6] of this bill repeals 75-10-218, a section of The Montana Solid Waste Management Act that is subordinate to 75-10-110."

Extension of Effective Date: The July 1, 1993, effective date in sec. 8, Ch. 398, L. 1991, was extended to July 1, 1995, by sec. 1, Ch. 273, L. 1993. The effective date of the extension in sec. 1, Ch. 273, L. 1993, was October 1, 1993. Technically, the July 1, 1993, version of this section is in effect for the period from July 1, 1993, until October 1, 1993. The Code Commissioner has not codified the temporary version because the apparent legislative intent was to not have that version effective.

1991 Amendments: Chapter 222 in (1), near beginning after "plan", inserted "as required by 75-10-807"; inserted (2)(f) requiring rules providing guidelines for integrated waste management; inserted (4)(b) requiring Department to provide technical assistance for integrated waste management programs; inserted (4)(c) requiring that technical assistance be provided regarding certain hazardous waste collection, disposal, reduction, and educational programs; inserted (9) requiring Department to serve as an information clearinghouse; and made minor changes in style.

Chapter 398 in (2)(d) and (2)(e) substituted "75-10-118" for "75-10-115"; deleted former (2)(f) requiring preparation of rules providing guidelines for waiver of fees for certain incineration or disposal of solid waste; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective July 1, 1993.

Chapter 643 deleted (2)(f) requiring preparation of rules providing guidelines for waiver of fees for certain incineration or disposal of solid waste; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective July 1, 1991.

1991 Statement of Intent: The statement of intent attached to Ch. 222, L. 1991, provided: "A statement of intent is required for this bill because the department of health and environmental sciences [now department of environmental quality] will need to promulgate rules in order to implement this bill. It is the intent of the legislature that these regulations reflect an emphasis on integrated waste management and achieving the 25% waste reduction goal by 1996. In addition, the regulations must be designed to protect the public health, safety, and welfare and the environment. It is also the intent of the legislature that state government assume a leadership role in the development and implementation of source reduction and recycling programs and in the establishment of markets for the purchase and use of recyclable materials."

Preamble: The preamble attached to Ch. 398, L. 1991, provided: "WHEREAS, the State of Montana presently is faced with proposals to import out-of-state waste for disposal in Montana; and

WHEREAS, [LC 798] [Ch. 643, L. 1991] would enact a tipping fee on disposal of solid waste generated within Montana to fund the development of an adequate solid waste regulatory program; and

WHEREAS, the citizens of Montana should not have to subsidize the regulation of solid waste that originates in other states."

Retroactive Applicability: Section 10, Ch. 643, L. 1991, provided: "[This act] applies retroactively, within the meaning of 1-2-109, to all applications provided for in 75-10-221 received after January 1, 1990."

1989 Amendment: At end of (2)(a) and (2)(b) deleted reference to rules; inserted (2)(d), (2)(e), and (2)(f) requiring the Department to adopt rules establishing methods for determining how much solid waste is incinerated or disposed of at a facility, providing procedures for quarterly collection of the fee, and providing guidelines for waiver of fees for certain incinerations and disposals; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective May 22, 1989.

Severability: Section 15, Ch. 696, L. 1989, was a severability clause.

2003 Amendment: Chapter 405 deleted former (2) and (3) that read: "(2) make loans to a local government for the planning, design, and implementation of a solid waste management system;

(3) make grants for a local government for planning or implementation of a solid waste management system"; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective October 1, 2003.

2001 Amendment: Chapter 170 in (4) substituted "fees provided for in 75-10-115" for "fee provided for in 75-10-118". Amendment effective March 30, 2001.

1993 Amendment: Chapter 145 in (4) inserted reference to 75-10-115; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective July 1, 1993.

Code Commissioner Note: The version of this section effective July 1, 1995, in (4) substituted "75-10-118" for "75-10-115". The Code Commissioner has not reflected this change because it would be redundant with the amendment made by Ch. 145.

1993 Statement of Intent: The statement of intent attached to Ch. 145, L. 1993, provided: "A statement of intent is desirable for this bill in order to coordinate certain provisions of existing law with Chapter 398, Laws of 1991. Chapter 398 provided a delayed effective date, and when its provisions become effective on July 1, 1993, certain provisions of law will be amended. The purpose of this bill is to reinstate certain provisions of law that will be deleted when Chapter 398 becomes effective.

It is the intent of the legislature that [sections 1, 2, 4, and 5] [75-10-104, 75-10-105, 75-10-116, and 75-10-117] of this bill maintain the existing authority of the department of health and environmental sciences [now department of environmental quality] rather than add new authority.

It is also the purpose of this bill to repeal a section of The Montana Solid Waste Management Act that was not included in Chapter 398. Chapter 398 repealed 75-10-110, effective July 1, 1993. [Section 6] of this bill repeals 75-10-218, a section of The Montana Solid Waste Management Act that is subordinate to 75-10-110."

Extension of Effective Date: The July 1, 1993, effective date in sec. 8, Ch. 398, L. 1991, was extended to July 1, 1995, by sec. 1, Ch. 273, L. 1993. The effective date of the extension in sec. 1, Ch. 273, L. 1993, was October 1, 1993. Technically, the July 1, 1993, version of this section is in effect for the period from July 1, 1993, until October 1, 1993. The Code Commissioner has not codified the temporary version because the apparent legislative intent was to not have that version effective.

1991 Amendment: At end of (4) substituted "75-10-118" for "75-10-115". Amendment effective July 1, 1993.

Preamble: The preamble attached to Ch. 398, L. 1991, provided: "WHEREAS, the State of Montana presently is faced with proposals to import out-of-state waste for disposal in Montana; and

WHEREAS, [LC 798] [Ch. 643, L. 1991] would enact a tipping fee on disposal of solid waste generated within Montana to fund the development of an adequate solid waste regulatory program; and

WHEREAS, the citizens of Montana should not have to subsidize the regulation of solid waste that originates in other states."

1989 Amendment: Inserted (4) allowing the Department to collect fees. Amendment effective May 22, 1989.

Severability: Section 15, Ch. 696, L. 1989, was a severability clause.

1981 Amendment: Added (3) authorizing the Department to make grants for a local government for planning or implementation of a solid waste management system.

Saving Clause: Section 6, Ch. 482, L. 1981, was a saving clause.

Severability: Section 7, Ch. 482, L. 1981, was a severability clause.

2007 Amendment: Chapter 54 deleted former (1) that read: "(1) adopt a state solid waste management and resource recovery plan after complying with the procedures outlined in 75-10-111"; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective October 1, 2007.

2003 Amendment: Chapter 405 deleted former (2)(b) through (2)(d) that read: "(b) the procedures to be followed in applying for and making loans and grants;

(c) the requirements for eligibility for grants;

(d) the agreements between the local government and the department for grants and loans under this part"; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective October 1, 2003.

2001 Amendment: Chapter 170 inserted (2)(e) requiring adoption of rules governing application fee, flat annual license renewal fee, and tonnage or volume-based renewal fee for solid waste management system; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective March 30, 2001.

1981 Amendment: Inserted "following:" after "rules governing the" in (2) and divided the section into subsections; deleted "rules governing" from the end of (2)(a) and (2)(c); added "and grants" at the end of (2)(b); inserted (2)(c) requiring the Department to adopt rules governing the requirements for eligibility for grants.

Statement of Intent: The statement of intent attached to HB 307 (Ch. 482, L. 1981) provided: "A statement of intent is required for House Bill 307 because it delegates rulemaking authority to the Board of Health and Environmental Sciences [now Board of Environmental Review] for making grants to local governments for the purchase of solid waste management capital equipment. The bill provides the terms of agreement for grants between the department and local governments. It then provides rulemaking authority for eligibility standards and application and award procedures in making capital equipment grants.

It should be noted that Montana in the past has adopted regulatory provisions (Title 16, chapter 14, subchapter 1, Administrative Rules of Montana) which provide for the application procedures required for the issuance of planning grants and organizational loans. House Bill 307 will allow the Board of Health and Environmental Sciences [now Board of Environmental Review] to adopt additional rules establishing the procedures required for the department to issue implementation grants to local governments.

Under House Bill 307, the Board of Health and Environmental Sciences [now Board of Environmental Review] will also have the authority to revise existing administrative rules in the area of solid waste grants. These revisions will be needed to allow the department to issue implementation grants to local governments. Thus, the state will be able to pass through implementation funds pursuant to adopted rules, as they become available, to local governments for purposes of establishing waste management systems."

Saving Clause: Section 6, Ch. 482, L. 1981, was a saving clause.

Preamble: The preamble attached to Ch. 471, L. 1995, provided: "WHEREAS, the federal government frequently regulates areas that are also subject to state regulation; and

WHEREAS, differing state and federal policy goals and unique state prerogatives frequently result in different levels of regulation, different standards, and different requirements being imposed by state and federal programs covering the same subject matter; and

WHEREAS, Montana must simultaneously move toward reducing redundant and unnecessary regulation that dulls the state's competitive advantage while being ever vigilant in the protection of the public's health, safety, and welfare; and

WHEREAS, Montana's administrative agencies should consider applicable federal standards when adopting, readopting, or amending rules with analogous federal counterparts; and

WHEREAS, Montana's administrative agencies should analyze whether analogous federal standards sufficiently protect the health, safety, and welfare of Montana's citizens; and

WHEREAS, as part of the formal rulemaking process, the public should be advised of the agencies' conclusions about whether analogous federal standards sufficiently protect the health, safety, and welfare of Montana citizens."

1995 Statement of Intent: The statement of intent attached to Ch. 471, L. 1995, provided: "A statement of intent is required for this bill in order to provide guidance to the board of health and environmental sciences [now board of environmental review], the department of health and environmental sciences [now department of environmental quality], and local units of government in complying with [this act].

The legislature intends that in addition to all requirements imposed by existing law and rules, the board or the department include as part of the initial publication and all subsequent publications of a rule a written finding if the rule in question contains any standards or requirements that exceed the standards or requirements imposed by comparable federal law.

If the rules are more stringent than comparable federal law, the written finding must include but is not limited to a discussion of the policy reasons and an analysis that supports the board's or department's decision that the proposed state standards or requirements protect public health or the environment of the state and that the state standards or requirements to be imposed can mitigate harm to the public health or the environment and are achievable under current technology. The department is not required to show that the federal regulation is inadequate to protect public health. The written finding must also include information from the hearing record regarding the costs to the regulated community directly attributable to the proposed state standard or requirement."

Effective Date: Section 23, Ch. 471, L. 1995, provided that this section is effective on passage and approval. Approved April 14, 1995.

Applicability: Section 22(1) and (3), Ch. 471, L. 1995, provided: "(1) [Sections 1 through 3] are intended to apply to any rule that is in effect, adopted, or amended, and that regulates those resources or activities for which the state has been given primary authority to regulate by federal authority pursuant to Title 75, chapter 2; Title 75, chapter 3 [renumbered, except for part 6, as Title 50, chapter 79]; Title 75, chapter 5; Title 75, chapter 6; or Title 75, chapter 10, as of [the effective date of this act] [April 14, 1995].

(3) [This act] does not apply to the establishment of fees or public participation requirements."

Case Notes

County Commission's Approval Power — Solid Waste — Withdrawal of Approval: A county refuse board contracted with an individual to operate a sanitary landfill. Difficulties arose from the failure of the operator to obtain an operator's license. The County Commissioners sued the operator and prevailed. On appeal, the operator questioned the power of the County Commission to withdraw its contract approval and thereby direct the refuse board to terminate the contract. The Supreme Court held that when a Board of County Commissioners was given an express power of approval, such power was to be complemented by the implied power to withhold approval upon a showing of adequate cause. A logical extension of an implied power to withhold approval was an implied power to withdraw approval. Here, the contract required the operator to satisfy state licensing requirements. The refuse board failed to enforce the provision and allowed the landfill to be operated in violation of law. The Department of Health (now Department of Environmental Quality) began refusing to approve subdivisions in the area, exposing the County Commissioners to possible liability. The withdrawal of approval of the defendant's contract was an obvious necessity supported by adequate cause and should be considered proper under the circumstances, which virtually eliminated the propriety of the approval. Ryan v. Bd. of County Comm'rs, 190 M 273, 620 P2d 1203, 37 St. Rep. 1965 (1980).

Landfill Operator to Be Licensed: The appellant had contracted with the refuse board of his county to operate a sanitary landfill. The trial court found that the appellant was required by his contract to obtain a license to operate the landfill. The Supreme Court on review said that when read together, it is apparent that under 75-10-203 and 75-10-221, the County Commissioners, the refuse board, or the appellant could be proper applicants for the landfill license. Finding no exemption from the obligation to seek the required license, it was a question of the parties' contract requirements. The Supreme Court declined to find that 75-10-112 requires all local governments to obtain the requisite license for operation of a disposal site when the operations by contract are to be performed by another individual. Citing 28-3-301 and 28-3-303 and noting that the language in the contract here was clear and unambiguous, the Supreme Court found its duty to enforce the contract as made. The license requirement imposed by 75-1-221 was clearly applicable to the operation of the disposal site. Therefore, the appellant was required by the terms of the contract to obtain the operator's license. Ryan v. Bd. of County Comm'rs, 190 M 273, 620 P2d 1203, 37 St. Rep. 1965 (1980).

2013 Amendment: Chapter 229 in (1)(a) after "facility" inserted "from the time an application is made until the license is issued or denied"; in (1)(b) inserted second sentence regarding initial fee year; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective April 19, 2013.

Applicability: Section 3, Ch. 229, L. 2013, provided: "[This act] applies to fees collected after [the effective date of this act]." Effective April 19, 2013.

2001 Amendment: Chapter 170 in (1) in first sentence after "may" substituted "prepare rules for adoption by the board, pursuant to 75-10-104 and 75-10-106, that set" for "establish and collect" and after "waste" substituted "at facilities subject to regulation pursuant to part 2 of this chapter" for "disposal" and inserted second sentence authorizing department to collect fees upon board's adoption of rules; at beginning of (1)(b) substituted "a flat annual license renewal fee" for "an annual license renewal fee" and at end substituted language basing fee on categorization of solid waste management systems into separate classes by three outlined criteria for former language that read: "based upon the following formula:

(i) for a major facility with a planned capacity of more than 25,000 tons of solid waste a year, $3,500;

(ii) for an intermediate facility with a planned capacity of more than 5,000 tons a year but not more than 25,000 tons a year, $3,000;

(iii) for a minor facility with a planned capacity of not more than 5,000 tons a year, $2,500"; and in (1)(c) inserted "tonnage or". Amendment effective March 30, 2001.

1991 Amendment: Substituted (1) authorizing Department to establish and collect fees for solid waste disposal management and regulation and providing guidelines for fees for former (1) and (2) requiring that, with exceptions, any person who owns an incinerator burning more than 1,000 tons of solid waste a year or a facility licensed pursuant to 75-10-221 and that disposes of more than 1,000 tons of waste a year shall pay quarterly a $1 fee per ton of waste generated in different region and disposed of at facility and requiring waiver of fee upon finding that disposal is consistent with state solid waste management goals and is equal to or improves protection when compared to intraregional incineration or disposal; and deleted (3) that read: "(3) The incineration or disposal of solid waste at a licensed facility in the manner and quantity incinerated or disposed of before May 22, 1989, is exempt from the solid waste management fee". Amendment effective July 1, 1991.

Retroactive Applicability: Section 10, Ch. 643, L. 1991, provided: "[This act] applies retroactively, within the meaning of 1-2-109, to all applications provided for in 75-10-221 received after January 1, 1990."

1989 Statement of Intent: The statement of intent attached to Ch. 696, L. 1989, provided: "It is the intent of the legislature that the department of health and environmental sciences [now department of environmental quality] adopt rules establishing procedures for the determination and collection of the solid waste management fee provided for in [section 1] [75-10-115] and for the waiver of the fee when consistent with the criteria provided in [section 1(2)] [75-10-115(2)]. It is the intent of the legislature that the department be able to use this fee to bolster its solid waste management program in a manner, including the hiring of adequate staff, that will:

(1) protect the public health, welfare, and safety and the environment of Montana;

(2) provide assistance to local governments in meeting the pending federal solid waste management requirements;

(3) develop an effective and coordinated regional approach to solid waste management in Montana; and

(4) ensure a state and local capability to effectively manage the importation of solid waste into Montana for disposal purposes.

It is the intent of the legislature that the department of health and environmental sciences [now department of environmental quality] waive the fee for interregional solid waste incineration or disposal in situations where the incineration or disposal is consistent with state solid waste management goals and results in equivalent or improved protection of Montana's public health, safety, welfare, and environment when compared to the alternative of intraregional incineration or disposal. The incineration or disposal of solid waste at a licensed facility in the manner and quantity incinerated or disposed of before [the effective date of this act] [May 22, 1989] is exempt from the solid waste management fee and from the requirement for local government approval under [section 6] [75-10-218, now repealed].

It is the intent of the legislature that the department of health and environmental sciences [now department of environmental quality] not issue an air quality permit for any new commercial incinerator of solid waste and not authorize any existing incinerator to change the amount, form, kind, or content of the material it incinerates or to incinerate any material that would change the nature, character, or composition of the emissions until the department and the public have necessary information to understand the composition and concentrations of the emissions and until the emissions and projected ambient concentrations are known to constitute a negligible risk to the public health, safety, and welfare and to the environment. For a permitted solid waste incinerator, the department shall consider an increase in the amount of medical waste incinerated as sufficient to trigger the additional permit and review requirements provided in [section 5] [75-2-215], including consideration of emissions of hydrochloric acid, compounds deriving from plastic incineration, and other hazardous air pollutants."

It is also the purpose of this bill to repeal a section of The Montana Solid Waste Management Act that was not included in Chapter 398. Chapter 398 repealed 75-10-110, effective July 1, 1993. [Section 6] of this bill repeals 75-10-218, a section of The Montana Solid Waste Management Act that is subordinate to 75-10-110."

1993 Amendment: Chapter 145 in (2)(a) inserted reference to 75-10-115; inserted (2)(b) requiring deposit of fees, taxes, fines, and penalties collected under 75-10-910; inserted (2)(c) requiring deposit of fees collected under 75-10-1006; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective July 1, 1993.

Code Commissioner Note: The version of this section effective July 1, 1995, in (2)(a) substituted "75-10-118" for "75-10-115". The Code Commissioner has not reflected this change because it would be redundant with the amendment made by Ch. 145.

1993 Statement of Intent: The statement of intent attached to Ch. 145, L. 1993, provided: "A statement of intent is desirable for this bill in order to coordinate certain provisions of existing law with Chapter 398, Laws of 1991. Chapter 398 provided a delayed effective date, and when its provisions become effective on July 1, 1993, certain provisions of law will be amended. The purpose of this bill is to reinstate certain provisions of law that will be deleted when Chapter 398 becomes effective.

It is the intent of the legislature that [sections 1, 2, 4, and 5] [75-10-104, 75-10-105, 75-10-116, and 75-10-117] of this bill maintain the existing authority of the department of health and environmental sciences [now department of environmental quality] rather than add new authority.

It is also the purpose of this bill to repeal a section of The Montana Solid Waste Management Act that was not included in Chapter 398. Chapter 398 repealed 75-10-110, effective July 1, 1993. [Section 6] of this bill repeals 75-10-218, a section of The Montana Solid Waste Management Act that is subordinate to 75-10-110."

Extension of Effective Date: The July 1, 1993, effective date in sec. 8, Ch. 398, L. 1991, was extended to July 1, 1995, by sec. 1, Ch. 273, L. 1993. The effective date of the extension in sec. 1, Ch. 273, L. 1993, was October 1, 1993. Technically, the July 1, 1993, version of this section is in effect for the period from July 1, 1993, until October 1, 1993. The Code Commissioner has not codified the temporary version because the apparent legislative intent was to not have that version effective.

1991 Amendment: In (2)(a) substituted "75-10-118" for "75-10-115". Amendment effective July 1, 1993.

Preamble: The preamble attached to Ch. 398, L. 1991, provided: "WHEREAS, the State of Montana presently is faced with proposals to import out-of-state waste for disposal in Montana; and

WHEREAS, [LC 798] [Ch. 643, L. 1991] would enact a tipping fee on disposal of solid waste generated within Montana to fund the development of an adequate solid waste regulatory program; and

WHEREAS, the citizens of Montana should not have to subsidize the regulation of solid waste that originates in other states."

Severability: Section 15, Ch. 696, L. 1989, was a severability clause.

Effective Date: Section 16, Ch. 696, L. 1989, provided that this section is effective May 22, 1989.

Title 17, chapter 50, subchapter 6, ARM Procedure for variances.

Part Case Notes

Establishment of Refuse Disposal District by County With Self-Governing Power: Title 7, ch. 13, part 2 [now repealed], is not mandatory upon a county charter form of government when it establishes a refuse disposal district and system. That part applies to the establishment of a refuse disposal district by governments that are of general power status, not those with self-government status. Title 7, ch. 13, part 2 [now repealed], does not direct or require a local government to provide a service within the meaning of 7-1-114. Clopton v. 2003 Amendment: Chapter 361 inserted (1) relating to constitutional obligations and legislative intent; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective April 16, 2003.

Preamble: The preamble attached to Ch. 361, L. 2003, provided: "WHEREAS, Article II, section 3, of the Montana Constitution enumerates certain inalienable individual rights, including the right to a clean and healthful environment, the right of pursuing life's basic necessities, the right of enjoying and defending an individual's life and liberty, the right of acquiring, possessing, and protecting property, and the right of seeking individual safety, health, and happiness in all lawful ways; and

WHEREAS, the constitutionally enumerated rights are by their very nature bound to result in competing interests in specific fact situations; and

WHEREAS, Article IX, section 1, of the Montana Constitution provides that the state and each person shall maintain and improve a clean and healthful environment in Montana for present and future generations and directs the Legislature to provide for the administration and enforcement of this duty and also directs the Legislature to provide adequate remedies for the protection of the environmental life support system from degradation and to provide adequate remedies to prevent unreasonable depletion and degradation of natural resources; and

WHEREAS, the Legislature has reviewed the intent of the framers of the 1972 Montana Constitution as evidenced in the verbatim transcripts of the constitutional convention; and

WHEREAS, there is no indication that one enumerated inalienable right is intended to supersede other inalienable rights, including the right to use property in all lawful means; and

WHEREAS, the Legislature, mindful of its constitutional obligation to provide for the administration and enforcement of the constitution, has enacted a comprehensive set of laws to accomplish the goals of the constitution, including the Montana Clean Indoor Air Act of 1979, Title 50, chapter 40, part 1, MCA; the Montana Environmental Policy Act, Title 75, chapter 1, parts 1 through 3, MCA; the Clean Air Act of Montana, Title 75, chapter 2, parts 1 through 4, MCA; water quality laws, Title 75, chapter 5, MCA; The Natural Streambed and Land Preservation Act of 1975, Title 75, chapter 7, part 1, MCA; The Montana Solid Waste Management Act, Title 75, chapter 10, part 2, MCA; The Montana Hazardous Waste Act, Title 75, chapter 10, part 4, MCA; the Comprehensive Environmental Cleanup and Responsibility Act, Title 75, chapter 10, part 7, MCA; the Montana Megalandfill Siting Act, sections 75-10-901 through 75-10-945, MCA; the Montana Underground Storage Tank Installer and Inspector Licensing and Permitting Act, Title 75, chapter 11, part 2, MCA; the Montana Underground Storage Tank Act, Title 75, chapter 11, part 5, MCA; the Montana Major Facility Siting Act, Title 75, chapter 20, MCA; the Open-Space Land and Voluntary Conservation Easement Act, Title 76, chapter 6, MCA; the Environmental Control Easement Act, Title 76, chapter 7, MCA; The Strip and Underground Mine Siting Act, Title 82, chapter 4, part 1, MCA; The Montana Strip and Underground Mine Reclamation Act, Title 82, chapter 4, part 2, MCA; The Opencut Mining Act, Title 82, chapter 4, part 4, MCA; and The Nongame and Endangered Species Conservation Act, Title 87, chapter 5, part 1, MCA."

Severability: Section 39, Ch. 361, L. 2003, was a severability clause.

Retroactive Applicability: Section 41, Ch. 361, L. 2003, provided: "[This act] applies retroactively, within the meaning of 1-2-109, to actions for judicial review or other causes of action challenging the issuance of a permit, petition for review, amendment, license, arbitration, action, certificate, or inspection that are pending but not yet decided on or after [the effective date of this act]." Effective April 16, 2003.

1981 Amendment: Deleted "hazardous" before "wastes" near the end of the first sentence.

1997 Amendment: Chapter 373 inserted definition of waste tire. Amendment effective July 1, 1997.

1997 Statement of Intent: The statement of intent attached to Ch. 373, L. 1997, provided: "A statement of intent is required for this bill because it authorizes the department of environmental quality to adopt additional rules requiring that solid waste management systems that are licensed primarily for the management and disposal of waste tires provide financial assurance sufficient to cover the cost of transport, treatment, and disposal of the waste tires if the facility is not capable of proper management. It is the intent that the amount of financial assurance be adjusted as necessary if there are changing operational circumstances at the licensed facility and in the waste tire market. It is not the intent of the legislature to require licensing or financial assurance of retail facilities that store reusable tires for the purposes of recapping, retreading, or reuse as tires."

Waste Tire Study: Section 4, Ch. 373, L. 1997, provided: "(1) The environmental quality council shall study the issues associated with managing, processing, treating, transporting, and disposing of waste tires.

(2) The environmental quality council shall report the results of the study, including any recommendations for legislation, to the legislature no later than October 1, 1998."

Applicability: Section 6, Ch. 373, L. 1997, provided: "(1) [This act] applies to a facility that initially applied for or received a solid waste management system license pursuant to Title 75, chapter 10, part 2, after July 1, 1997.

(2) [This act] does not apply to a facility that was licensed pursuant to Title 75, chapter 10, part 2, prior to July 1, 1997."

1995 Amendments — Composite Section: Chapter 418 in definition of Board substituted "board of environmental review provided for in 2-15-3502" for "board of health and environmental sciences provided for in 2-15-2104"; in definition of Department substituted "department of environmental quality provided for in 2-15-3501" for "department of health and environmental sciences provided for in Title 2, chapter 15, part 21"; in definition of solid waste, in (b), with regard to reclamation, substituted "department of environmental quality" for "department of state lands" and, with regard to slash and forest debris, substituted "department of natural resources and conservation" for "department of state lands"; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective July 1, 1995.

Chapter 546 deleted definition of Board that read: ""Board" means the board of health and environmental sciences provided for in 2-15-2104"; pursuant to sec. 568, Ch. 546, L. 1995, a coordination section, in definition of Department the Code Commissioner substituted "department of environmental quality" for "department of health and environmental sciences"; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective July 1, 1995.

Because Ch. 418 inserted a reference to the Board of Environmental Review and Ch. 546 deleted a reference to the Board of Health and Environmental Sciences, the codifier has reflected both the insertion and the deletion.

Style changes in the chapters were slightly different. In each case, the codifier chose the most appropriate.

Transition: Section 499, Ch. 418, L. 1995, provided: "The provisions of 2-15-131 through 2-15-137 apply to [this act]."

Saving Clauses: Section 503, Ch. 418, L. 1995, was a saving clause.

Section 571, Ch. 546, L. 1995, was a saving clause.

1993 Amendment: Chapter 201 in definition of solid waste management system inserted last sentence regarding container sites. Amendment effective July 1, 1993.

1991 Amendment: Inserted definition of household hazardous waste.

1989 Amendment: Inserted definitions of household waste and municipal solid waste landfill.

1981 Amendments: Chapter 358 deleted "or hazardous waste" after "solid waste" in two places in (3); deleted former subsection (4) defining "hazardous waste"; deleted former subsection (5) defining "hazardous waste management"; deleted "hazardous wastes" after "refuse" in (8); deleted "wood" before "byproducts" at the end of (8); deleted "nonhazardous" after "render it" in (12).

Chapter 529 substituted "the department of state lands" for "the department of natural resources and conservation" near the end of (8). This substitution was made because Ch. 529, L. 1981, transferred the regulation of slash and forest debris to the department of state lands.

Severability Clause: Section 9, Ch. 529, L. 1981, was a severability clause.

Case Notes

Landfill Operator to Be Licensed: The appellant had contracted with the refuse board of his county to operate a sanitary landfill. The trial court found that the appellant was required by his contract to obtain a license to operate the landfill. The Supreme Court on review said that when read together, it is apparent that under 75-10-203 and 75-10-221, the County Commissioners, the refuse board, or the appellant could be proper applicants for the landfill license. Finding no exemption from the obligation to seek the required license, it was a question of the parties' contract requirements. The Supreme Court declined to find that 75-10-112 requires all local governments to obtain the requisite license for operation of a disposal site when the operations by contract are to be performed by another individual. Citing 28-3-301 and 28-3-303 and noting that the language in the contract here was clear and unambiguous, the Supreme Court found its duty to enforce the contract as made. The license requirement imposed by 75-1-221 was clearly applicable to the operation of the disposal site. Therefore, the appellant was required by the terms of the contract to obtain the operator's license. Ryan v. Bd. of County Comm'rs, 190 M 273, 620 P2d 1203, 37 St. Rep. 1965 (1980).

2013 Amendment: Chapter 411 inserted (8) concerning coal combustion residues; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective May 6, 2013.

2001 Amendment: Chapter 170 deleted former (6) and (7) that read: "(6) fees related to the review of solid waste management system license applications;

(7) the renewal of solid waste management system licenses and related fees"; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective March 30, 2001.

1997 Amendment: Chapter 373 inserted (9) requiring that rules address surety requirements to maintain financial assurance; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective July 1, 1997.

1997 Statement of Intent: The statement of intent attached to Ch. 373, L. 1997, provided: "A statement of intent is required for this bill because it authorizes the department of environmental quality to adopt additional rules requiring that solid waste management systems that are licensed primarily for the management and disposal of waste tires provide financial assurance sufficient to cover the cost of transport, treatment, and disposal of the waste tires if the facility is not capable of proper management. (2) The environmental quality council shall report the results of the study, including any recommendations for legislation, to the legislature no later than October 1, 1998."

Applicability: Section 6, Ch. 373, L. 1997, provided: "(1) [This act] applies to a facility that initially applied for or received a solid waste management system license pursuant to Title 75, chapter 10, part 2, after July 1, 1997.

(2) [This act] does not apply to a facility that was licensed pursuant to Title 75, chapter 10, part 2, prior to July 1, 1997."

1995 Amendment: Chapter 471 in introductory clause inserted "subject to the provisions of 75-10-107"; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective April 14, 1995.

Applicability: Section 22(3), Ch. 471, L. 1995, provided: "(3) [This act] does not apply to the establishment of fees or public participation requirements."

1993 Amendment: Chapter 273 inserted (8) relating to a quarterly fee based on the justifiable costs to the state of administering Title 75, chapter 10, parts 1 and 2, for solid waste generated outside Montana and disposed of or incinerated in Montana. Amendment effective April 7, 1993.

1993 Statement of Intent: The statement of intent attached to Ch. 273, L. 1993, provided: "A statement of intent is required for this bill because of the rulemaking authority granted to the department of health and environmental sciences [now department of environmental quality] in [section 3] [75-10-204]. It is the intent of the legislature that the department adopt rules to establish a rationally based, legally defensible fee on the disposal or incineration of solid waste generated outside Montana. The purpose of the fee is to prevent Montana citizens from subsidizing the disposal of out-of-state waste. Therefore, the fee is to be based on the justifiable direct and indirect costs to the state of regulating the disposal or incineration of out-of-state waste under Title 75, chapter 10, parts 1 and 2. It is the intent of the legislature that, until July 1, 1995, the fee established by the department under 75-10-204(8) apply to all solid waste imported from out of state to solid waste incinerators and solid waste disposal facilities in this state. Effective July 1, 1995, the fee established by the department under 75-10-204(8) applies only to solid waste imported from out of state to solid waste disposal facilities that receive less than 25,000 tons of solid waste annually. Also effective July 1, 1995, solid waste disposal facilities receiving 25,000 tons or more of solid waste annually and all solid waste incinerators, regardless of tonnage amounts, must be charged a fee of $5 per ton, pursuant to 75-10-118, on each ton of solid waste imported from out of state. The department shall report to the 1995 legislature on the implementation of the fee established under the authority of 75-10-204(8) so that the legislature may consider an amendment to 75-10-118 to adopt the fee amount established by the department."

1991 Amendment: Inserted (6) requiring Department to adopt rules establishing fees related to the review of solid waste management system license applications; inserted (7) requiring adoption of rules governing the renewal of solid waste management system licenses and related fees; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective July 1, 1991.

1991 Statement of Intent: The statement of intent attached to Ch. 643, L. 1991, provided: "A statement of intent is required for this bill to:

(1) provide the department of health and environmental sciences [now department of environmental quality] with guidelines for adopting rules to implement [sections 1 through 7] [7-13-231, 75-10-102, 75-10-104, 75-10-115, 75-10-204, and 75-10-221];

(2) indicate the structure and amount of fees that are intended to be charged to license solid waste management systems; and

(3) indicate the method of collection.

A fee for review of a license application for a new solid waste management system or for substantial modifications to an existing system will be charged. The fees must be based on the capacity of the proposed system and reflect the relative cost of reviewing the proposal. The following fee structure is suggested:

(1) Megafacility. $15,000 for a facility with a planned capacity of more than 200,000 tons of solid waste per year.

(2) Major facility. $10,000 for a facility with a planned capacity of more than 25,000 tons of solid waste per year but not more than 200,000 tons per year.

(3) Intermediate facility. $7,500 for a facility with a planned capacity of more than 5,000 tons of solid waste per year but not more than 25,000 tons per year.

(4) Minor facility. $5,000 for a facility with a planned capacity of not more than 5,000 tons of solid waste per year.

A fee will be charged to issue a license for a solid waste management system, and an annual fee will be charged to renew a solid waste management system license. The fees are intended to reflect a minimal base fee related to the fixed costs of an annual inspection and license renewal and a volume fee related to the estimated amount of solid waste to be disposed of each year. All solid waste systems must pay these fees in order to receive a license under 75-10-221. The initial volume fee may not exceed 31 cents per ton.

For the purposes of estimating the volume for small solid waste management systems or for systems that choose not to weigh or measure the volume of waste managed, the following formulas are suggested:

Solid waste should be assumed to be generated at the following per capita rates:

Population	Tons Per Year
Greater than 5,000	1.04
1,000 - 5,000	0.59
Less than 1,000 and unincorporated areas	0.41

For the purpose of conversion between solid waste weight and volume, the following equivalents are suggested:

(1) One uncompacted cubic yard equals 300 pounds; and

(2) One compacted cubic yard equals 700 pounds."

Retroactive Applicability: Section 10, Ch. 643, L. 1991, provided: "[This act] applies retroactively, within the meaning of 1-2-109, to all applications provided for in 75-10-221 received after January 1, 1990."

1989 Amendment: Inserted (5) relating to groundwater monitoring; and made minor change in phraseology.

1989 Statement of Intent: The statement of intent attached to Ch. 677, L. 1989, provided: "A statement of intent is required for this bill in order to provide guidance to the department of health and environmental sciences [now department of environmental quality] concerning the adoption of rules authorized by the bill. The purpose of the new rules is to establish appropriate requirements for groundwater monitoring at municipal solid waste landfills and other disposal sites as specified in the bill. The rules must address the following topics:

(a) the types and quality of information the department requires from owners and operators of municipal solid waste landfills and other disposal sites in order to prepare the groundwater monitoring priority compliance list;

(b) requirements concerning the number and placement of monitoring wells, considering hydrologic, geologic, and other relevant factors;

(c) the content of plans for the design, construction, and maintenance of monitoring wells and systems; and

(d) requirements for collecting, recording, and reporting monitoring results."

1981 Amendment: Deleted former subsection (5) concerning reports on operation and maintenance of hazardous waste sites, transportation, and generation.

75-10-216. Waste tire disposal sites — financial assurance required.

Compiler's Comments

1997 Statement of Intent: The statement of intent attached to Ch. 373, L. 1997, provided: "A statement of intent is required for this bill because it authorizes the department of environmental quality to adopt additional rules requiring that solid waste management systems that are licensed primarily for the management and disposal of waste tires provide financial assurance sufficient to cover the cost of transport, treatment, and disposal of the waste tires if the facility is not capable of proper management. It is the intent that the amount of financial assurance be adjusted as necessary if there are changing operational circumstances at the licensed facility and in the waste tire market. It is not the intent of the legislature to require licensing or financial assurance of retail facilities that store reusable tires for the purposes of recapping, retreading, or reuse as tires."

Waste Tire Study: Section 4, Ch. 373, L. 1997, provided: "(1) The environmental quality council shall study the issues associated with managing, processing, treating, transporting, and disposing of waste tires.

(2) The environmental quality council shall report the results of the study, including any recommendations for legislation, to the legislature no later than October 1, 1998."

Applicability: Section 6, Ch. 373, L. 1997, provided: "(1) [This act] applies to a facility that initially applied for or received a solid waste management system license pursuant to Title 75, chapter 10, part 2, after July 1, 1997.

(2) [This act] does not apply to a facility that was licensed pursuant to Title 75, chapter 10, part 2, prior to July 1, 1997."

Effective Date: Section 7, Ch. 373, L. 1997, provided: "[This act] is effective July 1, 1997."

75-10-221. License required — application.

Compiler's Comments

2001 Amendment: Chapter 170 deleted second sentence in (4) that read: "The department may provide exceptions to the 12-month requirement for a 2-year period following July 1, 1991"; in (6) at beginning of first sentence substituted "preparing rules for board adoption that establish fees" for "establishing fees", after "applications" inserted "pursuant to 75-10-104(2)", and substituted "consider the tonnage or volume of waste" for "consider the volume of waste" and in second sentence inserted "adopted by the board" and substituted "reduction in the tonnage or volume of waste" for "reduction in the volume of waste"; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective March 30, 2001.

1991 Amendment: Inserted (4) providing license may not exceed 12 months unless renewed and authorizing Department to provide exceptions to 12-month requirement for 2-year period following July 1, 1991; inserted (5) authorizing Department to require new application upon determination that plan of operation, management of system, or geological or ground water conditions have changed since initial license approval; and inserted (6) requiring Department to consider volume of waste and size of management system in establishing license and application fees and requiring that fees be established to encourage reduction in volume and to cover Department cost of reviewing and annually licensing management system. Amendment effective July 1, 1991.

Retroactive Applicability: Section 10, Ch. 643, L. 1991, provided: "[This act] applies retroactively, within the meaning of 1-2-109, to all applications provided for in 75-10-221 received after January 1, 1990."

1981 Amendment: Deleted "hazardous waste" after "solid waste or" in (1); deleted "or transport hazardous waste" after "management system" in (1).

Case Notes

Establishment of Refuse Disposal District by County With Self-Governing Power: Title 7, ch. 13, part 2 [now repealed], is not mandatory upon a county charter form of government when it establishes a refuse disposal district and system. That part applies to the establishment of a refuse disposal district by governments that are of general power status, not those with self-government status. Title 7, ch. 13, part 2 [now repealed], does not direct or require a local government to provide a service within the meaning of 7-1-114. Clopton v. Madison County Comm'n, 216 M 335, 701 P2d 347, 42 St. Rep. 851 (1985).

County Commission's Approval Power — Solid Waste — Withdrawal of Approval: A county refuse board contracted with an individual to operate a sanitary landfill. Difficulties arose from the failure of the operator to obtain an operator's license. The County Commissioners sued the operator and prevailed. On appeal, the operator questioned the power of the County Commission to withdraw its contract approval and thereby direct the refuse board to terminate the contract. The Supreme Court held that when a Board of County Commissioners was given an express power of approval, such power was to be complemented by the implied power to withhold approval upon a showing of adequate cause. A logical extension of an implied power to withhold approval was an implied power to withdraw approval. Here, the contract required the operator to satisfy state licensing requirements. The refuse board failed to enforce the provision and allowed the landfill to be operated in violation of law. The Department of Health Solid Waste Management Bureau began refusing to approve subdivisions in the area, exposing the County Commissioners to possible liability. The withdrawal of approval of the defendant's contract was an obvious necessity supported by adequate cause and should be considered proper under the circumstances, which virtually eliminated the propriety of the approval. Ryan v. Bd. of County Comm'rs, 190 M 273, 620 P2d 1203, 37 St. Rep. 1965 (1980).

Landfill Operator to Be Licensed: The appellant had contracted with the refuse board of his county to operate a sanitary landfill. The trial court found that the appellant was required by his contract to obtain a license to operate the landfill. The Supreme Court on review said that when read together, it is apparent that under 75-10-203 and 75-10-221, the County Commissioners, the refuse board, or the appellant could be proper applicants for the landfill license. Finding no exemption from the obligation to seek the required license, it was a question of the parties' contract requirements. The Supreme Court declined to find that 75-10-112 requires all local governments to obtain the requisite license for operation of a disposal site when the operations by contract are to be performed by another individual. Citing 28-3-301 and 28-3-303 and noting that the language in the contract here was clear and unambiguous, the Supreme Court found its duty to enforce the contract as made. The license requirement imposed by 75-1-221 was clearly applicable to the operation of the disposal site. Therefore, the appellant was required by the terms of the contract to obtain the operator's license. Ryan v. Bd. of County Comm'rs, 190 M 273, 620 P2d 1203, 37 St. Rep. 1965 (1980).

Rescission of Landfill Operation Contract — Operator Unlicensed: The county refuse board contracted with the appellant to operate a landfill. Because of his own fault and disregard, the appellant failed to comply with the statutory and contractual requirements to obtain a license to operate the landfill. As a result of this failure, the Department of Health Solid Waste Management Bureau began refusing to approve proposed subdivisions in the area. The refusal in effect prevented the approval of those subdivisions for solid waste disposal and thereby exposed the County Commissioners to potential liability. When the County Commissioners chose to terminate the appellant's contract, there was a failure of consideration through the fault of the defendant, resulting in an alteration of the Commissioners' position to their prejudice. Consequently, the trial court acted properly in rescinding the contract. Ryan v. Bd. of County Comm'rs, 190 M 273, 620 P2d 1203, 37 St. Rep. 1965 (1980).

Preamble: The preamble attached to Ch. 361, L. 2003, provided: "WHEREAS, Article II, section 3, of the Montana Constitution enumerates certain inalienable individual rights, including the right to a clean and healthful environment, the right of pursuing life's basic necessities, the right of enjoying and defending an individual's life and liberty, the right of acquiring, possessing, and protecting property, and the right of seeking individual safety, health, and happiness in all lawful ways; and

WHEREAS, the constitutionally enumerated rights are by their very nature bound to result in competing interests in specific fact situations; and

WHEREAS, Article IX, section 1, of the Montana Constitution provides that the state and each person shall maintain and improve a clean and healthful environment in Montana for present and future generations and directs the Legislature to provide for the administration and enforcement of this duty and also directs the Legislature to provide adequate remedies for the protection of the environmental life support system from degradation and to provide adequate remedies to prevent unreasonable depletion and degradation of natural resources; and

WHEREAS, the Legislature has reviewed the intent of the framers of the 1972 Montana Constitution as evidenced in the verbatim transcripts of the constitutional convention; and

WHEREAS, there is no indication that one enumerated inalienable right is intended to supersede other inalienable rights, including the right to use property in all lawful means; and

WHEREAS, the Legislature, mindful of its constitutional obligation to provide for the administration and enforcement of the constitution, has enacted a comprehensive set of laws to accomplish the goals of the constitution, including the Montana Clean Indoor Air Act of 1979, Title 50, chapter 40, part 1, MCA; the Montana Environmental Policy Act, Title 75, chapter 1, parts 1 through 3, MCA; the Clean Air Act of Montana, Title 75, chapter 2, parts 1 through 4, MCA; water quality laws, Title 75, chapter 5, MCA; The Natural Streambed and Land Preservation Act of 1975, Title 75, chapter 7, part 1, MCA; The Montana Solid Waste Management Act, Title 75, chapter 10, part 2, MCA; The Montana Hazardous Waste Act, Title 75, chapter 10, part 4, MCA; the Comprehensive Environmental Cleanup and Responsibility Act, Title 75, chapter 10, part 7, MCA; the Montana Megalandfill Siting Act, sections 75-10-901 through 75-10-945, MCA; the Montana Underground Storage Tank Installer and Inspector Licensing and Permitting Act, Title 75, chapter 11, part 2, MCA; the Montana Underground Storage Tank Act, Title 75, chapter 11, part 5, MCA; the Montana Major Facility Siting Act, Title 75, chapter 20, MCA; the Open-Space Land and Voluntary Conservation Easement Act, Title 76, chapter 6, MCA; the Environmental Control Easement Act, Title 76, chapter 7, MCA; The Strip and Underground Mine Siting Act, Title 82, chapter 4, part 1, MCA; The Montana Strip and Underground Mine Reclamation Act, Title 82, chapter 4, part 2, MCA; The Opencut Mining Act, Title 82, chapter 4, part 4, MCA; and The Nongame and Endangered Species Conservation Act, Title 87, chapter 5, part 1, MCA."

1997 Amendments: Chapter 112 in definition of dispose, in three places before "hazardous waste", deleted "regulated substance"; deleted definition of regulated substance that read: ""Regulated substance":

(a) means:

(i) a hazardous substance as defined in 75-10-602; or

(ii) petroleum, including crude oil or any fraction of crude oil, that is liquid at standard conditions of temperature and pressure (60 degrees F and 14.7 pounds per square inch absolute);

(b) does not include a substance regulated as a hazardous waste under this part"; in definition of storage, before "hazardous wastes", deleted "regulated substances" and after "hazardous wastes" deleted "or both"; deleted definition of underground storage tank that read: ""Underground storage tank":

(a) means, except as provided in subsections (18)(b)(i) through (18)(b)(xi):

(i) any one or a combination of tanks used to contain a regulated substance, the volume of which is 10% or more beneath the surface of the ground; and

(ii) any underground pipes used to contain or transport a regulated substance and connected to a storage tank, whether the storage tank is entirely aboveground, partially aboveground, or entirely underground;

(b) does not include:

(i) a farm or residential tank that was installed as of April 27, 1995, that has a capacity of 1,100 gallons or less, and that is used for storing motor fuel for noncommercial purposes;

(ii) a farm or residential tank that was installed as of April 27, 1995,that has a capacity of 1,100 gallons or less, and that is used for storing heating oil for consumptive use on the premises where it is stored;

(iii) farm or residential underground pipes that were installed as of April 27, 1995, and that are used to contain or to transport motor fuels for noncommercial purposes or heating oil for consumptive use on the premises where it is stored from an aboveground storage tank with a capacity of 1,100 gallons or less;

(iv) a septic tank;

(v) a pipeline facility, including gathering lines, regulated under:

(A) the Natural Gas Pipeline Safety Act of 1968, 49 U.S.C. 1671, et seq.;

(B) the Hazardous Liquid Pipeline Safety Act of 1979, 49 U.S.C. 2001, et seq.; or

(C) state law comparable to the provisions of law referred to in subsection (18)(b)(v)(A) or (18)(b)(v)(B), if the facility is intrastate;

(vi) a surface impoundment, pit, pond, or lagoon;

(vii) a storm water or wastewater collection system;

(viii) a flow-through process tank;

(ix) a liquid trap or associated gathering lines directly related to oil or gas production and gathering operations;

(x) a storage tank situated in an underground area, such as a basement, cellar, mine, draft, shaft, or tunnel, if the storage tank is situated upon or above the surface of the floor; or

(xi) any pipe connected to a tank described in subsections (18)(b)(i) through (18)(b)(ix)"; and made minor changes in style.

Chapter 156 in definition of underground storage tank inserted (b)(xii) excluding certain underground pipes. Amendment effective March 26, 1997.

Saving Clause: Section 38(1), Ch. 112, L. 1997, was a saving clause.

Coordination Instruction: Section 2, Ch. 156, L. 1997, a coordination section, provided that if House Bill No. 152 deletes the definition of "underground storage tank" from 75-10-403 and recodifies it in a different place, then the amendment made to the definition of "underground storage tank" in 75-10-403 is made to the definition in that recodified section. House Bill No. 152 was approved as Ch. 112, L. 1997. In accordance with the coordination instruction, the amendment to this section is made to sec. 3, Ch. 112, L. 1997.

1995 Amendments — Composite Section: Chapter 28 inserted definition of used oil; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective February 6, 1995.

Chapter 218 inserted definition of environmental protection law; adjusted subsection references; and made minor changes in style.

Chapter 418 in definition of Board substituted "board of environmental review provided for in 2-15-3502" for "board of health and environmental sciences provided for in 2-15-2104"; in definition of Department substituted "department of environmental quality provided for in 2-15-3501" for "department of health and environmental sciences provided for in Title 2, chapter 15, part 21"; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective July 1, 1995.

Chapter 546 deleted definition of Board that read: ""Board" means the board of health and environmental sciences provided for in 2-15-2104"; pursuant to sec. 568, Ch. 546, L. 1995, a coordination section, in definition of Department the Code Commissioner substituted "department of environmental quality" for "department of health and environmental sciences"; adjusted subsection references; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective July 1, 1995.

Chapter 568 in definition of underground storage tank inserted (b)(i) providing that underground storage tank does not include farm or residential tank installed as of April 27, 1995, with capacity of 1,100 gallons or less that is used for storing noncommercial motor fuel, inserted (b)(ii) providing that underground storage tank does not include farm or residential tank installed as of April 27, 1995, with capacity of 1,100 gallons or less that is used for storing heating oil for consumptive use on storage premises, and inserted (b)(iii) providing that underground storage tank does not include farm or residential pipes installed as of April 27, 1995, used to contain or transport motor fuels for noncommercial purposes or heating oil for consumptive use on premises where stored from tank with 1,100 gallons or less capacity; adjusted subsection references; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective April 27, 1995.

Because Ch. 418 inserted a reference to the Board of Environmental Review and Ch. 546 deleted a reference to the Board of Health and Environmental Sciences, the codifier has reflected both the insertion and the deletion.

Style changes in the chapters were slightly different. In each case, the codifier chose the most appropriate.

Transition: Section 499, Ch. 418, L. 1995, provided: "The provisions of 2-15-131 through 2-15-137 apply to [this act]."

Saving Clauses: Section 503, Ch. 418, L. 1995, was a saving clause.

Section 571, Ch. 546, L. 1995, was a saving clause.

1989 Amendment: In two places in (3) inserted reference to "regulated substance" and after "constituent of" deleted "it" and inserted "the regulated substance or hazardous waste"; in (13) substituted "regulated substances, hazardous wastes, or both" for "wastes"; in two places in (17)(a)(i) deleted reference to connected underground pipes; in (17)(b)(viii) changed reference to subsection (17)(b)(vii) to reference to subsection (17)(b)(vi); and made minor change in punctuation. Amendment effective March 30, 1989.

1987 Amendment: Inserted definition of hazardous waste transfer facility; and changed internal references accordingly.

1985 Amendment: Inserted (11) defining regulated substance; and inserted (16) defining underground storage tank.

ARM 17.53.202 and 17.53.301 Definitions.

Case Notes

Petroleum Release From Underground Disconnected Pipes — Eligibility for Cleanup Reimbursement — Portion of Administrative Rule Invalid: The former Department of Health and Environmental Sciences notified Safeway that its property had been identified as a source of petroleum contamination in the area where Safeway had previously removed some underground storage tanks and ordered Safeway to clean up the site pursuant to ARM 16.45.601 (renumbered ARM 17.56.601). Safeway discovered that the leakage was coming from pipes that were left underground during the tank removal. Safeway subsequently submitted to the Petroleum Tank Release Compensation Board an eligibility checklist and application for voluntary registration for reimbursement for costs of cleaning up the leak. The Board denied the request because the tank had been removed prior to the release detection and because ARM 16.47.314 (renumbered ARM 17.58.312) required that the tank be in place when the release was discovered. The District Court held, and the Supreme Court affirmed, that the portion of ARM 16.47.314(1) (renumbered ARM 17.58.312(1)) that added additional requirements to the cleanup statutes was invalid and that Safeway should be compensated for cleanup costs. The Supreme Court analyzed the definition of underground storage tank in determining that nothing in the statutory language of this section (before 1997 amendment) required that the underground storage tank itself must be in place on the date on which a petroleum release is discovered. The court also examined whether it is permissible and fair for two state entities, the Department and the Board, to use one statutory definition to reach two opposite conclusions. Despite the fact that the Department and Board are separate entities and the petroleum release cleanup statutes are separate from the reimbursement statutes, Safeway was entitled to be treated uniformly by both entities. The Department treated Safeway as the tank owner for cleanup requirements, and the Board was required to also treat Safeway as the tank owner for reimbursement purposes. Safeway, Inc. v. Mont. Petroleum Release Comp. Bd., 281 M 189, 931 P2d 1327, 54 St. Rep. 129 (1997).

Saving Clause: Section 38(1), Ch. 112, L. 1997, was a saving clause.

1995 Amendment: Chapter 418 in (2), near middle of second sentence, substituted "department of environmental quality" for "department of state lands" and at end, after "Act", deleted "administered by the department of natural resources and conservation"; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective July 1, 1995.

Transition: Section 499, Ch. 418, L. 1995, provided: "The provisions of 2-15-131 through 2-15-137 apply to [this act]."

Saving Clause: Section 503, Ch. 418, L. 1995, was a saving clause.

1989 Amendment: Inserted (1)(e) authorizing Department to abate public nuisances arising from hazardous waste or regulated substance; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective March 30, 1989.

Administrative Rules

Title 17, chapter 53, ARM Hazardous waste.

75-10-405. Administrative rules.

Compiler's Comments

1997 Amendment: Chapter 112 deleted former (2)(c) that read: "may adopt requirements for the prevention and correction of leakage from underground storage tanks, including:

(i) reporting by owners and operators;

(ii) financial responsibility;

(iii) release detection, prevention, and corrective action;

(iv) standards for design, construction, installation, and closure;

(v) development of a schedule of fees, not to exceed $50 for a tank over 1,100 gallons and not to exceed $20 for a tank 1,100 gallons or less, per tank, for tank notification and permits to defray state and local costs of implementing an underground storage tank program;

(vi) a penalty schedule and a system for assessment of administrative penalties, notice, and appeals under 75-10-423; and

(vii) delegation of authority and funds to local agents for inspections and implementation. The delegation of authority to local agents must complement and may not duplicate existing authority for implementation of rules adopted by the department of justice that relate to underground storage tanks"; and made minor changes in style.

Saving Clause: Section 38(1), Ch. 112, L. 1997, was a saving clause.

Saving Clause — Rules: Section 38(2), Ch. 112, L. 1997, provided: "Rules adopted pursuant to 75-10-405 that are in effect on [the effective date of this act] [effective October 1, 1997] continue in effect until amended or repealed pursuant to 75-10-405 or [section 5] [75-11-505]."

1995 Amendments: Chapter 28 in introductory clause of (1), after "waste", inserted "and used oil"; inserted (1)(m) regarding identification and classification of used oil; inserted (1)(n) regarding requirements for management of used oil; in (2)(b), after "require", inserted "hazardous waste" and before "facilities" inserted "hazardous waste management"; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective February 6, 1995.

Chapter 471 in (1) inserted "subject to the provisions of 75-10-107"; in (2), at beginning, inserted "Notwithstanding the provisions of 75-10-107"; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective April 14, 1995.

1995 Statement of Intent: The statement of intent attached to Ch. 28, L. 1995, provided: "A statement of intent is required for this bill in order to provide guidance to the department of health and environmental sciences [now department of environmental quality] in promulgating rules. It is the intent of the legislature that the department of health and environmental sciences [now department of environmental quality] adopt rules governing the management of used oil that are consistent with the standards adopted by the U.S. environmental protection agency under section 3014 of the federal Resource Conservation and Recovery Act of 1976 (42 U.S.C. 6935), as amended.

Applicability: Section 22(3), Ch. 471, L. 1995, provided: "(3) [This act] does not apply to the establishment of fees or public participation requirements."

1993 Amendments: Chapter 281 inserted (2)(c)(vi) relating to penalties, notice, and appeals. Amendment effective April 7, 1993.

Chapter 341 in (1)(d), after "denial", substituted "reissuance" for "renewal"; and substituted present (1)(i) concerning establishing schedule of fees and procedures for fee collection for former language that read: "a schedule of fees for hazardous waste management facility permits and registration of hazardous waste generators". Amendment effective April 13, 1993.

Chapter 509 inserted (1)(l) authorizing Department to adopt, amend, or repeal hazardous waste rules relating to procedures for assessment of administrative penalties as authorized by 75-10-424; and made minor changes in style.

1993 Statement of Intent: The statement of intent attached to Ch. 341, L. 1993, provided: "A statement of intent is required for this bill in order to provide guidance to the department of health and environmental sciences [now department of environmental quality] in promulgating rules. The intent of this bill is to clarify and extend the authority of the department to charge fees for the review and analysis of hazardous waste management permits and for ensuring compliance with hazardous waste laws, rules, and permit conditions.

The department may develop rules that establish the amount and procedure for collecting fees for:

(1) the filing and review of hazardous waste management facility permits;
(2) the management of hazardous waste, based upon the amount of waste managed;
(3) the reissuance and modification of hazardous waste management facility permits; and
(4) the registration of hazardous waste generators.

In adopting these rules, the department shall meet the criteria set forth in [sections 2 through 4] [75-10-431 through 75-10-433]. In addition, the rules adopted by the department must reflect a maximum fee amount of $10,000 for permit reissuance or permit modification, except when the department's actual costs exceed that amount."

Severability: Section 7, Ch. 341, L. 1993, was a severability clause.

1993 Statement of Intent: The statement of intent attached to Ch. 509, L. 1993, provided: "A statement of intent is required for this bill in order to provide guidance to the department of health and environmental sciences [now department of environmental quality] in promulgating rules. The legislature intends that the administrative penalty provided in this bill encourage compliance with the hazardous waste sections of the Montana Hazardous Waste and Underground Storage Tank Act [now Montana Hazardous Waste Act] and rules adopted pursuant to the hazardous waste sections of that Act by allowing more timely and efficient processing of enforcement actions without the need to seek penalties through the district court. To promote this goal, the department may adopt rules that prescribe procedures for assessing administrative penalties for violations of Title 75, chapter 10, part 4, and of rules adopted pursuant to Title 75, chapter 10, part 4. In doing so, the department shall ensure that its rules are consistent with the criteria set forth in [section 2] [75-10-424]."

1991 Amendment: Inserted (2)(f) allowing adoption of rules and performance standards for industrial furnaces and boilers that burn hazardous wastes. Amendment effective April 9, 1991.

1991 Statement of Intent: The statement of intent attached to Ch. 400, L. 1991, provided: "A statement of intent is required for this bill because it expands and clarifies rulemaking authority delegated to the department of health and environmental sciences [now department of environmental quality]. It is the intent of the legislature to provide the authority for the adoption of administrative rules for the operation and performance of industrial boilers and industrial furnaces that burn hazardous wastes. The department currently has two applications for interim status permits for such fuel-burning activities at cement plants operating in the state.

The United States environmental protection agency (EPA) was scheduled to have published performance regulations by the end of 1990 for industrial furnaces and industrial boilers, including cement kilns, but it has not published these regulations. The EPA has the authority and has been requested to approve two cement kilns that would burn hazardous wastes before the EPA regulations are in effect. It is the intent of the legislature to ensure that adequate state regulations are in place before any hazardous wastes are burned.

It is the additional intent of the legislature to allow the state regulations to be more restrictive than the federal regulations if needed to adequately protect the citizens and environment of Montana."

Name Change — Code Commissioner Correction: Section 1, Ch. 706, L. 1991, provided: "(1) The name of the state fire marshal is changed to the state fire prevention and investigation program of the department of justice.

(2) Unless inconsistent with [sections 1 through 36] [Ch. 706, L. 1991], wherever the term "state fire marshal" or "fire marshal" appears in the Montana Code Annotated, the code commissioner shall change the term to the "state fire prevention and investigation program of the department of justice", "fire prevention and investigation program" (of the department of justice), or "program", as appropriate. The code commissioner shall also conform internal references and grammar to these changes." As directed, the Code Commissioner has changed the term, as appropriate, wherever it appears in this section. Amendment effective April 29, 1991.

1989 Amendment: In (2)(c), after "prevention", inserted "and correction"; in (2)(c)(iii) substituted "corrective action" for "correction"; in (2)(c)(iv), at end, inserted "and closure"; inserted (2)(c)(v) authorizing development by rule of fee schedule for storage program; and inserted (2)(c)(vi) authorizing by rule delegation of authority to local agents. Amendment effective March 30, 1989.

1987 Amendments: Chapter 336 inserted (1)(e) authorizing Department to provide rules on requirements for corrective action within and outside waste facility boundaries; inserted (1)(k) authorizing rules on requirements for availability of public information on treatment, storage, and disposal of hazardous waste; and in (1)(g), after "operators", inserted "and for liability of guarantors providing financial assurance".

Chapter 340 inserted (2)(e) authorizing Department to adopt rules more restrictive than federal rules that require commercial hazardous waste facility owner or manager to conduct public hearing before operation; and made minor changes in phraseology.

Chapter 562 inserted (2)(d) authorizing Department to adopt rules more restrictive than federal rules relating to regulatory requirements for hazardous waste transfer facilities.

1987 Statement of Intent: The statement of intent attached to Ch. 336, L. 1987, provided: "In 1984, the United States congress amended the federal Resource Conservation and Recovery Act (RCRA) to:

(1) establish requirements for corrective action within and outside of facility boundaries and for financial assurance of that corrective action;

(2) establish liability requirements for guarantors providing financial assurance;

(3) make information on hazardous waste management facilities available to the public; and

(4) ensure that facility permits contain terms and conditions necessary to protect human health and the environment.

Rulemaking authority is provided in this bill to authorize the department of health and environmental sciences [now department of environmental quality] to adopt rules necessary to carry out these purposes and thus to maintain the equivalence of the Montana Hazardous Waste Act with RCRA, as amended."

1987 Statement of Intent: The statement of intent attached to Ch. 562, L. 1987, provided: "A statement of intent is required for this bill because it delegates rulemaking and regulatory authority to the department of health and environmental sciences [now department of environmental quality]. House Bill 789 adds transfer facilities operated by hazardous waste transporters to the category of facilities that require regulation under the Montana Hazardous Waste Act.

It is the intent of the legislature that the department adopt and implement administrative rules that will ensure that proposed hazardous waste transfer facilities are regulated to protect public health and the environment.

The legislature intends that the administrative rules developed by the department to implement House Bill 789 should be similar to those rules applicable to hazardous waste management facilities that store wastes for longer periods of time. The department may develop rules for transfer facilities that are less restrictive or less encompassing than those for long-term storage facilities, but may not adopt rules that are more restrictive or more encompassing than those for long-term storage facilities. The department may not adopt rules that are more restrictive or broader in scope than the comparable rules for hazardous waste management facilities that store wastes for longer periods of time.

The legislature understands and intends that the rules developed by the department to implement House Bill 789 must include the following:

(1) preparedness for hazardous waste emergencies;

(2) development of emergency contingency plans;

(3) training of transfer facility personnel;

(4) security provisions at transfer facilities; and

(5) hazardous waste drum handling, temporary storage methods, and containment requirements that minimize the possibilities of leaks, spills, off-site releases, or similar accidents.

The legislature intends that the enforcement authority granted to the department under 75-10-413 through 75-10-421 apply to the rules adopted under this act."

1985 Amendments: Chapter 107 inserted (1)(i) authorizing the Department to adopt, amend, or repeal rules for a schedule of fees to defray costs of establishing, operating, and maintaining any state hazardous waste management facility.

Chapter 109 in (2) after "as amended", inserted "except that the department may" through end of (2)(b) (see 1985 Session Law); and made minor changes in arrangement and phraseology.

Chapter 633 renumbered (1) through part of (9) as (1)(a) through (1)(h) and (1)(j) and made minor changes in phraseology; and in (2) (formerly part of (9)) after "as amended" inserted same introductory exception clause as Ch. 109, and inserted (2)(c) authorizing the Department to adopt rules more restrictive than those enacted by the federal government for the prevention of leakage from underground storage tanks.

1983 Amendment: At end of (4) deleted "and the assessment of permit fees for these facilities"; and inserted (8) authorizing the Department to adopt, amend, or repeal rules relating to a schedule of fees for hazardous waste management facility permits and registration of hazardous waste generators.

1983 Statement of Intent: The statement of intent attached to SB 56 (Ch. 255, L. 1983) read: "A statement of intent is required for Senate Bill 56 because it amends Section [75-10-405], MCA, of the Montana Hazardous Waste Act to allow the Department of Health and Environmental Sciences [now Department of Environmental Quality] to establish, by rule, fees for registration of hazardous waste generators. The Act, first enacted in 1981, presently contains authority for the Department to assess permit fees for hazardous waste management facilities. In the subsequent two years of its administration, it has become apparent that substantial administration costs are also associated with maintenance of the registry of hazardous waste generators. Therefore, it is the intent of the Legislature to give the Department the authority to set whatever fees are reasonable to offset a portion of the costs of maintenance of the registry, including the costs of inspection of generators, maintenance of files, communications between the Department and generators, and the preparation of program reports. It is further the intent of the Legislature that the fee system developed by the Department not apply to generators of household waste, farmers who generate hazardous waste, and small quantity hazardous waste generators. It is further the intent of the Legislature that fees for maintenance of registration of inactive or infrequent generators of hazardous waste must be $10 per year for the years in which that type generator does not generate hazardous waste."

1981 Statement of Intent: The statement of intent attached to SB 212 (Ch. 358, L. 1981) provided: "A statement of intent is required for this bill because it delegates rulemaking and licensing authority to the Department of Health and Environmental Sciences [now Department of Environmental Quality]. Senate Bill 212 is intended to separate from the existing Montana Solid Waste Management Act (Title 75, chapter 10, part 2) all references to the treatment, storage, disposal, generation, and transportation of hazardous wastes and place the statutes regulating hazardous wastes into a separate part of the code. The specific objective and intent of the bill is to clarify and extend state rulemaking authority in order to be totally authorized by the Administrator of the Environmental Protection Agency (EPA) to operate a hazardous waste program in Montana which is equivalent to and in lieu of the federal hazardous waste program established by Subtitle C of the Resource Conservation and Recovery Act (RCRA) of 1976, P.L. 94-580, as amended.

The rules promulgated and permitting procedures adopted under this bill shall meet minimum standards under RCRA and shall not be more restrictive than those analogous provisions in which EPA has adopted regulations under RCRA. In the limited situations in which no federal regulations have been adopted or the drafting of regulations has been purposefully left to the states, the Department must be guided and constrained by the purpose set forth in Section 9 [75-10-402], the powers of the Department noted in Section 11 [75-10-404], the rulemaking guidelines of Section 12 [75-10-405], and the minimum requirements of RCRA.

It should be noted that Montana has enacted regulatory provisions under existing Title 75, chapter 10, part 2, the Solid Waste Management Act, and has sufficient coverage of hazardous waste responsibilities enabling the state to qualify for interim authorization from EPA to carry out a program in lieu of the federal RCRA hazardous waste program. This bill grants the Department authority to make additional adjustments, through rulemaking, which will bring its program affecting generators and transporters of hazardous wastes, the universe of hazardous waste, inspection and sampling, definitions, enforcement alternatives and penalties into equivalency and consistency with federal requirements.

Senate Bill 212 intends that the Department of Health and Environmental Sciences [now Department of Environmental Quality] shall have authority to require by rule, in accordance with the Montana Administrative Procedure Act, that generators of hazardous wastes, prior to transporting hazardous wastes or offering them for transport offsite, must perform certain packaging, labeling, marking and placarding of the wastes in a manner equivalent to the provisions of federal regulations contained in 40 CFR 262.30 through 262.33. The Department shall have authority under the bill to adopt rules setting penalties or fines for generators of hazardous wastes that set upper limitations which are no less than the amount of $10,000 per day, as required for final authorization under the federal program. Furthermore, Senate Bill 212 allows additional rulemaking to clarify the Department's authority to make inspections of and take samples from generators of hazardous wastes in a manner equivalent to federal inspection authority provided in Section 3007 of RCRA and federal rules promulgated under RCRA.

Under existing law, the Department has promulgated rules which define a broad spectrum of hazardous wastes (the universe of hazardous wastes) by specific listing and by characteristics; which list exclusions from the definition of hazardous waste; which define terms necessary to implement the hazardous waste program; which establish manifest requirements specifying how a hazardous waste is documented from time of generation through transport to time of disposal by the operator of a treatment, storage or disposal facility; which set recordkeeping and emergency cleanup procedures for transporters of hazardous wastes; which establish licensure procedures and standards for operators of hazardous waste treatment storage and disposal systems; and which provide enforcement alternatives for treatment, storage and disposal facility licenses. All of the existing rules are equivalent to and consistent with the federal program established by RCRA; in many instances, EPA rules have been incorporated by reference.

Under Senate Bill 212, the Department will have authority to amend and revise these rules, and to adopt new rules, in accordance with the Montana Administrative Procedure Act, which may be needed to meet changing minimum federal standards for a hazardous waste program authorized for state control under RCRA, as amended. Thus, Montana will be able to continue to maintain federal authorization for an independent hazardous waste program, equivalent to the federal program, but operated by the Department."

Preamble: The preamble attached to Ch. 361, L. 2003, provided: "WHEREAS, Article II, section 3, of the Montana Constitution enumerates certain inalienable individual rights, including the right to a clean and healthful environment, the right of pursuing life's basic necessities, the right of enjoying and defending an individual's life and liberty, the right of acquiring, possessing, and protecting property, and the right of seeking individual safety, health, and happiness in all lawful ways; and

WHEREAS, the constitutionally enumerated rights are by their very nature bound to result in competing interests in specific fact situations; and

WHEREAS, Article IX, section 1, of the Montana Constitution provides that the state and each person shall maintain and improve a clean and healthful environment in Montana for present and future generations and directs the Legislature to provide for the administration and enforcement of this duty and also directs the Legislature to provide adequate remedies for the protection of the environmental life support system from degradation and to provide adequate remedies to prevent unreasonable depletion and degradation of natural resources; and

WHEREAS, the Legislature has reviewed the intent of the framers of the 1972 Montana Constitution as evidenced in the verbatim transcripts of the constitutional convention; and

WHEREAS, there is no indication that one enumerated inalienable right is intended to supersede other inalienable rights, including the right to use property in all lawful means; and

WHEREAS, the Legislature, mindful of its constitutional obligation to provide for the administration and enforcement of the constitution, has enacted a comprehensive set of laws to accomplish the goals of the constitution, including the Montana Clean Indoor Air Act of 1979, Title 50, chapter 40, part 1, MCA; the Montana Environmental Policy Act, Title 75, chapter 1, parts 1 through 3, MCA; the Clean Air Act of Montana, Title 75, chapter 2, parts 1 through 4, MCA; water quality laws, Title 75, chapter 5, MCA; The Natural Streambed and Land

Severability: Section 39, Ch. 361, L. 2003, was a severability clause.

Retroactive Applicability: Section 41, Ch. 361, L. 2003, provided: "[This act] applies retroactively, within the meaning of 1-2-109, to actions for judicial review or other causes of action challenging the issuance of a permit, petition for review, amendment, license, arbitration, action, certificate, or inspection that are pending but not yet decided on or after [the effective date of this act]." Effective April 16, 2003.

1997 Amendment: Chapter 112 deleted second sentence that read: "All legal actions affecting underground storage tanks or the disposal of regulated substances must be brought in the county where the underground storage tank is located or, if mutually agreed upon by the affected parties, in the first judicial district, Lewis and Clark County."

Saving Clause: Section 38(1), Ch. 112, L. 1997, was a saving clause.

1989 Amendment: Near beginning substituted "actions" for "proceedings" and inserted second sentence requiring legal action either in county where storage tank is located or upon agreement of parties in Lewis and Clark County; and made minor changes in grammar. Amendment effective March 30, 1989.

2005 Amendment: Chapter 487 in (3) at end substituted "the penalty factors in 75-1-1001" for "(a) the gravity and the number of violations;

(b) the degree of care exercised by the alleged violator;

(c) whether significant harm resulted to the public health or the environment; and

(d) the degree of potential significant harm to the public health or the environment"; in (4) in first sentence at end substituted "file an action to recover the amount not paid" for "seek to recover the amount in an appropriate district court" and inserted last sentence relating to venue for an action in district court; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective January 1, 2006.

Saving Clause: Section 29, Ch. 487, L. 2005, was a saving clause.

1997 Amendment: Chapter 112 in (1), in first sentence before "provision" and before "rule", deleted "used oil or hazardous waste"; and made minor changes in style.

Saving Clause: Section 38(1), Ch. 112, L. 1997, was a saving clause.

1995 Amendment: Chapter 28 in first sentence of (1), in two places, inserted reference to used oil; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective February 6, 1995.

1993 Statement of Intent: The statement of intent attached to Ch. 509, L. 1993, provided: "A statement of intent is required for this bill in order to provide guidance to the department of health and environmental sciences [now department of environmental quality] in promulgating rules. The legislature intends that the administrative penalty provided in this bill encourage compliance with the hazardous waste sections of the Montana Hazardous Waste and Underground Storage Tank Act [now Montana Hazardous Waste Act] and rules adopted pursuant to the hazardous waste sections of that Act by allowing more timely and efficient processing of enforcement actions without the need to seek penalties through the district court. To promote this goal, the department may adopt rules that prescribe procedures for assessing administrative penalties for violations of Title 75, chapter 10, part 4, and of rules adopted pursuant to Title 75, chapter 10, part 4. In doing so, the department shall ensure that its rules are consistent with the criteria set forth in [section 2] [75-10-424]."

2009 Amendment: Chapter 56 made section gender neutral; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective October 1, 2009.

2007 Amendment: Chapter 265 in definition of junk vehicle in (a) inserted "motor vehicle, including component parts", in (a)(i) after "dismantled" deleted "motor vehicle, including component parts", in (a)(ii) inserted exception clause, and inserted (b) allowing permanently registered vehicle to be determined to be junk vehicle if it meets all other criteria for determining junk vehicle status; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective October 1, 2007.

1995 Amendments — Composite Section: Chapter 418 in definition of Board substituted "board of environmental review provided for in 2-15-3502" for "board of health and environmental sciences provided for in 2-15-2104"; in definition of Department substituted "department of environmental quality provided for in 2-15-3501" for "department of health and environmental sciences provided for in Title 2, chapter 15, part 21"; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective July 1, 1995.

Chapter 546 deleted definition of Board that read: ""Board" means the board of health and environmental sciences provided for in 2-15-2104"; pursuant to sec. 568, Ch. 546, L. 1995, a coordination section, in definition of Department the Code Commissioner substituted "department of environmental quality" for "department of health and environmental sciences"; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective July 1, 1995.

Because Ch. 418 inserted a reference to the Board of Environmental Review and Ch. 546 deleted a reference to the Board of Health and Environmental Sciences, the codifier has reflected both the insertion and the deletion.

Amendment effective July 1, 1991.

1983 Amendment: In (3), before "vehicle" inserted "motor" and after "component parts" deleted "or a vehicle substantially changed in form by removal of parts or component materials and".

Case Notes

Lack of Efforts to Notify Vehicle Owner After Vehicle Towed — Not Abandoned or Junk Vehicle — Summary Judgment Proper: Springer owned a van that he parked on a Bozeman street. A parking control officer placed a notice of abandoned vehicle specifying a September 25 tow date on the van. On the tow date, Springer moved the van to the other side of the street. Three days later, the van was towed and subsequently destroyed. Springer was never notified of the towing. Springer brought an action against the officer and the city to recover damages for destruction of the van. The District Court determined that the van was neither an abandoned vehicle under 61-12-401 nor a junk vehicle under this section and that the city did not take reasonable efforts to notify Springer that the van had been towed, as required by 61-12-402. Summary judgment awarding damages to Springer was proper. Springer v. Becker, 284 M 267, 949 P2d 641, 54 St. Rep. 876 (1997).

Presumption of Wrecking Facility — Permissible in Civil Action for Failure to License: The presumption raised by 75-10-702 is permissible in a civil action for failure to license a wrecking facility under 75-10-511, with penalties as provided in 75-10-542. The District Court found that the defendant operated a wrecking facility and based its findings upon the defendant's failure to overcome the presumption in this section. State ex rel. 1983 Amendment: In first sentence, deleted "new" before "motor vehicle" and inserted "established or proposed on or after July 1, 1973" after "graveyard site"; inserted final phrase of first sentence beginning "on the date"; and substituted last sentence relating to facilities licensed within preceding 18 months for "The prohibition concerning approval of a new motor vehicle wrecking facility site does not apply to a facility site that has been used as such within the preceding 18 months."

Case Notes

Vehicle Wrecking Facility in Public View — Shielding Required: The District Court erred in finding that a junk vehicle wrecking facility could be noticed from two public highways but was not within "public view", precluding shielding. In ordering that shielding regulations be followed, the Supreme Court found by a preponderance of the evidence that the facility was in public view, was one of the largest facilities in the state, and that the owner knew of shielding regulations for several years but failed to comply. State ex rel. Dept. of Health and Environmental Sciences v. Green, 227 M 299, 739 P2d 469, 44 St. Rep. 1099 (1987).

Responsibility to Maintain Shield — Penalty: Appellant, owner of a motor vehicle wrecking facility, was fined $50 a day when the fence he had erected in compliance with a previous court order was destroyed by cattle and wind and he refused to replace it. The Supreme Court found there was substantial credible evidence to support the District Court's finding that appellant was not in compliance with the court's earlier order to shield the wrecking facility. Appellant is responsible for installing a fence which adequately shields the wrecking facility and for repairing or replacing that fence when necessary. The Supreme Court further found that appellant knowingly waived his right to counsel at the District Court hearing and that he was competent to represent himself at the hearing. State ex rel. Dept. of Health and Environmental Sciences v. Bernhard, 220 M 275, 714 P2d 558, 43 St. Rep. 357 (1986).

State Not Responsible for Shielding Recent Wrecking Facilities: The State was not responsible for shielding a wrecking facility that was not a licensed wrecking facility before 1967. Because the defendant's wrecking facility was not a licensed operating wrecking facility at that time, the defendant was responsible for the shielding. State ex rel. Dept. of Health and Environmental Sciences v. Bernhard, 208 M 53, 675 P2d 390, 41 St. Rep. 167 (1984).

License for Junkyard Despite Lack of Shield: Although applicant's facility did not have the required shielding, when this was due to no fault of his own and when the applicant had no legal duty himself to build the shield, the Department of Health and Environmental Sciences (now Department of Environmental Quality) may properly be mandated to issue a license for the facility. Cain v. Dept. of Health and Environmental Sciences, 177 M 448, 582 P2d 332, 35 St. Rep. 1056 (1978).

Default Judgment Proper in Civil Action for Failure to License and Shield Vehicle Wrecking Facility Absent Meritorious Defense: For an entire year, the Department of Environmental Quality (DEQ) attempted to bring Robinsons' vehicle wrecking facility into compliance by informally soliciting application information and making the Robinsons aware of shielding requirements. The Robinsons never responded to the request for an application nor erected any shielding. DEQ filed an enforcement action and application for permanent injunction but continued for another year to work with Robinsons informally to achieve compliance. Robinsons eventually submitted an incomplete application but did not address the shielding problem. Finally, after nearly 2 years, the District Court entered default judgment against Robinsons in the amount of $68,400 as a civil penalty pursuant to 75-10-542(2). Robinsons appealed. After hearing the Robinsons' numerous procedural arguments, the Supreme Court found no grounds to set aside the default judgment on grounds of mistake or excusable neglect, holding that Robinsons had offered no defense at all, let alone a meritorious defense, to the charges in the complaint, nor had they presented any evidence to dispute the charges. Default judgment was affirmed. State ex rel. Dept. of Environmental Quality v. Robinson, 1998 MT 185, 290 M 137, 962 P2d 1212, 55 St. Rep. 745 (1998).

WHEREAS, a declining international market price for scrap steel has reduced revenues that the department received for vehicles recycled through the program by 63% over the last 2 years; and

WHEREAS, almost $900,000 of the $1.1 million dollar junk vehicle program budget is provided to counties for the control and removal of junk vehicles in their jurisdictions; and

WHEREAS, without increases in the junk vehicle disposal fees and the annual license fees for motor vehicle wrecking facilities, the department will have insufficient revenue to fully support county program grants, resulting in the counties' decreased ability to pay for the control and removal of junk vehicles; and

WHEREAS, insufficient funding to allow the counties to control and remove junk vehicles is likely to cause impairment of scenic values and an increased risk of contamination to the environment."

Junk Vehicles Not Purchased From Insurance Companies — License Required: The operator of a junk vehicle wrecking facility contended that since he did not purchase junk cars from insurance companies, he was not required to obtain a license for the facility. In holding that a license was required, the Supreme Court held that the insurance company disposal statute and the junk vehicle licensing statute are separate and independent requirements that may be independently enforced. 2007 Amendment: Chapter 53 in (1) at beginning after "a" inserted "person owning or operating a"; deleted former (2) that read: "(2) Quarterly, each motor vehicle wrecking facility shall mail to the department of justice, on a form approved by the department of justice, a list of all junk vehicles received by the motor vehicle wrecking facility during the quarter, stating the year, make, and complete identification number of each vehicle. If a certificate of title is received for a junk vehicle on the list, that certificate of title must accompany the list. The department of justice shall issue a receipt for the certificate of title if requested by the licensed facility, and the receipt may serve as an instrument for reclaiming the certificate of title if the vehicle is rebuilt"; in (2) at beginning after "A" inserted "person owning or operating a"; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective October 1, 2007.

2003 Amendments — Composite Section: Chapter 281 in (1) after "program" deleted "it shall pay a disposal fee of $2 for each vehicle submitted, and". Amendment effective April 10, 2003.

Chapter 477 throughout (2) substituted "certificate of title" for "certificate of ownership". Amendment effective January 1, 2004.

Applicability: Section 85(1), Ch. 477, L. 2003, provided that this section applies to motor vehicle certificates of title and registrations on or after January 1, 2004.

1995 Amendment: Chapter 18 in third sentence of (2), after "a receipt", deleted "of" and deleted brackets around "for"; and made minor changes in style.

1985 Amendments: Chapter 427 in (1) after "vehicle submitted" deleted "and it shall surrender to the department all records maintained as required in 75-10-512"; inserted (2) requiring each wrecking facility to mail to the Department each quarter a list of all junk vehicles received and any certificates of ownership available; and inserted (3) requiring a motor vehicle graveyard to submit to the Department the records, documents, and other information on junk vehicles as required by rule.

Chapter 503 in (2) substituted reference to department of justice for reference to division of motor vehicles in three places.

Relationship of Part to New Section: The words "except 75-10-520" were added to 75-10-503, 75-10-533, and 75-10-542 in 1979 by the Code Commissioner to make it clear that 75-10-520 is not intended as an integral part of Title 75, ch. 10, part 5. Section 75-10-520 was enacted by sec. 1, Ch. 244, L. 1979, without a codification instruction. It is codified in Title 75, ch. 10, part 5, for code user convenience. Penalty provisions and provisions relating to powers and duties of the Department of Health and Environmental Sciences (now Department of Environmental Quality) have no application to 75-10-520.

Case Notes

Junk Vehicles Not Purchased From Insurance Companies — License Required: The operator of a junk vehicle wrecking facility contended that since he did not purchase junk cars from insurance companies, he was not required to obtain a license for the facility. In holding that a license was required, the Supreme Court held that the insurance company disposal statute and the junk vehicle licensing statute are separate and independent requirements that may be independently enforced. State ex rel. Dept. of Health and Environmental Sciences v. Green, 227 M 299, 739 P2d 469, 44 St. Rep. 1099 (1987).

Amendment effective July 1, 1991.

75-10-532. Disposition of money collected.

Compiler's Comments

2011 Amendment: Chapter 312 at beginning of second sentence inserted "Subject to legislative fund transfers"; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective May 4, 2011.

Severability: Section 18, Ch. 312, L. 2011, was a severability clause.

2005 Amendment: Chapter 542 near end of first sentence substituted "state" for "department of revenue". Amendment effective January 1, 2006.

2003 Amendment: Chapter 281 near middle of first sentence after "fees" deleted "and fees collected as motor vehicle disposal fees"; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective April 10, 2003.

2001 Amendments — Composite Section: Chapter 257 substituted "department of revenue, as provided in 15-1-504" for "state treasurer"; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective July 1, 2001.

Chapter 317 near end after "component parts and" deleted "to the extent the legislature appropriates funds expressly and solely for this purpose". Amendment effective January 1, 2002.

Preamble: The preamble attached to Ch. 317, L. 2001, provided: "WHEREAS, at the end of fiscal year 2000, the junk vehicle fund administered by the department of environmental quality was reduced to its lowest level since 1980 and was only 65% of its 1998 value; and

WHEREAS, a declining international market price for scrap steel has reduced revenues that the department received for vehicles recycled through the program by 63% over the last 2 years; and

WHEREAS, almost $900,000 of the $1.1 million dollar junk vehicle program budget is provided to counties for the control and removal of junk vehicles in their jurisdictions; and

WHEREAS, without increases in the junk vehicle disposal fees and the annual license fees for motor vehicle wrecking facilities, the department will have insufficient revenue to fully support county program grants, resulting in the counties' decreased ability to pay for the control and removal of junk vehicles; and

WHEREAS, insufficient funding to allow the counties to control and remove junk vehicles is likely to cause impairment of scenic values and an increased risk of contamination to the environment."

Applicability: Section 49, Ch. 257, L. 2001, provided: "[This act] applies to remittances of state money made to the department of revenue for fiscal years beginning after June 30, 2001."

1999 Amendment: Chapter 513 at end inserted "and, to the extent the legislature appropriates funds expressly and solely for this purpose, for the removal of abandoned vehicles". Amendment effective July 1, 1999.

1995 Amendment: Chapter 418 deleted (2) that read: "(2) implementation by the department of health and environmental sciences during the 1987 biennium of the federal Comprehensive Environmental Response, Compensation, and Liability Act of 1980 in accordance with 75-10-601 through 75-10-604, and the Montana Hazardous Waste Act in accordance with 75-10-401 through 75-10-421, up to an amount not exceeding $58,690"; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective July 1, 1995.

Transition: Section 499, Ch. 418, L. 1995, provided: "The provisions of 2-15-131 through 2-15-137 apply to [this act]."

Saving Clause: Section 503, Ch. 418, L. 1995, was a saving clause.

1985 Amendments — Session Law Reference — Effective Date and Termination: Chapter 633 inserted (2) relating to implementation procedures.

Chapter 718 at beginning, inserted exception clause relating to disposition of moneys collected from sale of junk vehicles; deleted former (2) that read: "implementation by the department of health and environmental sciences during the 1985 biennium of the federal Comprehensive Environmental Response, Compensation, and Liability Act of 1980 in accordance with Title 75, chapter 10, part 6, up to an amount not exceeding $220,000"; and made minor changes in style.

The reference to sec. 1, Ch. 718, L. 1985, is left as a session law citation because sec. 1, Ch. 718, L. 1985, was an appropriation of $500,000 from the junk vehicle state special revenue fund to the general fund and was not codified.

Section 3, Ch. 718, L. 1985, provided: "(1) This act is effective July 1, 1985.

(2) That portion of section 2 adding an exception clause to 75-10-532 terminates on July 1, 1987."

1983 Amendment: Inserted (2) (see 1985 Ch. 718 amendment note for text).

2007 Amendment: Chapter 53 in (4) near end after "75-10-512" deleted "or 75-10-513(2)". Amendment effective October 1, 2007.

1991 Amendments: Chapter 572 in (1), after "department", deleted "through the attorney general or the county attorney of the county in which a facility is located"; in (2), after "department", deleted "through the attorney general or the county attorney of the county in which a motor vehicle wrecking facility or graveyard is located"; and inserted (3) authorizing, upon Department request, Attorney General or the County Attorney of the county in which a wrecking facility or graveyard is located to petition District Court to enjoin facility or graveyard or to impose, assess, and recover civil penalty. Amendment effective July 1, 1991.

Chapter 725 inserted (4) authorizing suit for collection of civil penalty for certain recordkeeping violations.

75-10-542. Penalties.

Compiler's Comments

2005 Amendment: Chapter 443 in (1) near beginning substituted "purposely or knowingly" for "willfully"; in (2) in first sentence near beginning inserted "a provision of", near middle after "subject to" inserted "an administrative penalty of not more than $50 or", and at end substituted "$250" for "$50"; inserted (3) relating to determination of penalties based on penalty factors and venue; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective April 28, 2005.

The amendments to this section made by sec. 4, Ch. 443, L. 2005, and sec. 16, Ch. 487, L. 2005, were rendered void by sec. 10, Ch. 443, L. 2005, a coordination section.

Case Notes

Responsibility to Maintain Shield — Penalty: Appellant, owner of a motor vehicle wrecking facility, was fined $50 a day when the fence he had erected in compliance with a previous court order was destroyed by cattle and wind and he refused to replace it. (See 2005 amendment.) The Supreme Court found there was substantial credible evidence to support the District Court's finding that appellant was not in compliance with the court's earlier order to shield the wrecking facility. Appellant is responsible for installing a fence which adequately shields the wrecking facility and for repairing or replacing that fence when necessary. The Supreme Court further found that appellant knowingly waived his right to counsel at the District Court hearing and that he was competent to represent himself at the hearing. State ex rel. Dept. of Health and Environmental Sciences v. Bernhard, 220 M 275, 714 P2d 558, 43 St. Rep. 357 (1986).

Presumption of Wrecking Facility — Permissible in Civil Action for Failure to License: The presumption raised by 75-10-702 is permissible in a civil action for failure to license a wrecking facility under 75-10-511, with penalties as provided in this section. The District Court found that the defendant operated a wrecking facility and based its findings upon the defendant's failure to overcome the presumption in 75-10-502. State ex rel. Dept. of Health and Environmental Sciences v. Bernhard, 208 M 53, 675 P2d 390, 41 St. Rep. 167 (1984).

Remedial Action Upon Release of Hazardous Substance

Part Compiler's Comments

Preamble: The preamble attached to Ch. 454, L. 2007, provided: "WHEREAS, mining and related operations and the release of hazardous substances at the Mike Horse Mine and Dam site near Lincoln, Montana, and in surrounding areas have resulted in significant contamination of lands in those areas, including the Blackfoot River and its flood plain, and as a consequence, have resulted in injuries to the state's natural resources, including its fishery resources; and

WHEREAS, the federal Comprehensive Environmental Response, Compensation, and Liability Act of 1980 authorizes the state, as trustee, to pursue litigation in order to recover damages for the restoration of state natural resources that have been injured by the release of hazardous substances; and

WHEREAS, the state's Comprehensive Environmental Cleanup and Responsibility Act allows the state to file claims and actions in order to recover damages for the restoration of natural resources located within the state that have been injured by the release of hazardous substances; and

WHEREAS, a state natural resource damage program exists within the department of justice and is charged with pursuing litigation in order to recover damages to be used to restore natural resources that have been injured by the release of hazardous substances; and

WHEREAS, a natural resource damage program policy committee consisting of the attorney general and four other members that have been appointed by the governor exists to oversee natural resource damage litigation in the state and to make policy recommendations regarding this type of litigation and should be statutorily established to continue this work."

Authorization of Natural Resource Damage Litigation: Section 1, Ch. 454, L. 2007, provided: "Subject to appropriation, the department of justice is authorized to file on behalf of the state of Montana litigation seeking damages for injuries caused by the release of hazardous substances from the Upper Blackfoot mining complex, including the Mike Horse mine and dam, for the purpose of restoring the state's natural resources in and around these areas." Effective May 8, 2007.

Natural Resource Damage Program Policy Committee: Section 2, Ch. 454, L. 2007, provided: "(1) There is a natural resource damage program policy committee.

(2) The committee membership consists of the governor's chief of staff, the directors of the departments of environmental quality, natural resources and conservation, and fish, wildlife, and parks, and the attorney general.

(3) The purpose of this committee is to oversee the litigation authorized in [section 1] [not codified] and other natural resource damage litigation." Effective May 8, 2007.

Legislative Oversight: Section 3, Ch. 454, L. 2007, provided: "The speaker of the house and the president of the senate shall each appoint two members of their respective bodies, one from the majority party and one from the minority party, to a committee that shall meet twice a year for briefings on the progress of the natural resource damages litigation pursuant to [section 1]

[not codified] and any related settlement negotiations. The department of justice shall provide staff assistance for the committee." Effective May 8, 2007.

1997 Natural Resource Damage Litigation Program Appropriation: Section 1, Ch. 154, L. 1997, provided: "Subject to [section 4(2)] [not codified], there is appropriated to the department of justice from the state special revenue fund $2.5 million for the remainder of the current fiscal year and for the biennium ending June 30, 1999, for the purpose of conducting the litigation and pursuing the state of Montana's natural resource damage claims, and any appeals, against the atlantic richfield company through the natural resource damage litigation program. Any recovery in the litigation up to the amount of the loans extended in [section 2] [not codified] must be deposited in the coal severance tax permanent fund. Any additional amount recovered in the litigation up to the amount appropriated in this section must be deposited in the general fund."

1997 Natural Resource Damage Litigation Program Extension of Previous Loans: Section 2, Ch. 154, L. 1997, provided: "Repayment of principal and interest on all loans authorized from the coal severance tax permanent fund under Chapter 354, Laws of 1993, and Chapter 411, Laws of 1995, is extended through the end of the 1999 biennium in accordance with 17-2-107(8)."

1997 Natural Resource Damage Litigation Program Rate of Interest: Section 3, Ch. 154, L. 1997, provided: "The interest to be paid on the previous loans extended under [section 2] [not codified] must be the highest rates allowable for interest recoverable under 42 U.S.C. 9607(a), which are based on the rates specified for interest on investments of the hazardous substance superfund established under 26 U.S.C. 9507. The interest is payable as of the date on which the loan proceeds were or are transferred from the coal severance tax permanent fund."

1997 Natural Resource Damage Litigation Program Contracts: Section 4, Ch. 154, L. 1997, provided: "(1) In order to extend the previous loans authorized in Chapter 354, Laws of 1993, and Chapter 411, Laws of 1995, the board of investments shall enter into a revised contract with the department of justice, pledging the amount recovered in the litigation to the repayment of the loans to the full extent allowable under law. The contract must provide that loan repayments must be deposited in the coal severance tax permanent fund. To the extent possible, the board shall make the loan from the portion of the coal severance tax permanent fund invested in the short-term pool.

(2) The appropriation in [section 1] [not codified] is not effective until the department of justice enters into a contract with the state treasurer implementing the redeposit provisions of [section 1]."

1997 Natural Resource Damage Litigation Program Fund Balance Transfer and Reconciliation: Section 5, Ch. 154, L. 1997, provided: "There is transferred from the social services block grant account $680,000 and from the public welfare account $1,820,000 to the state special revenue fund to the credit of the department of justice. The department of public health and human services may use any of its general fund appropriation to pay federal claims attributable to the funds transferred from these accounts that are related to activity prior to fiscal year 1996."

1997 Natural Resource Damage Litigation Program Use of Recovered Funds: Section 6, Ch. 154, L. 1997, provided: "Any funds recovered by the state on the natural resource damage claims against the atlantic richfield company and any interest that accumulates on the funds after their receipt by the state must be used, to the extent consistent with state and federal law, to recoup the expenses of the natural resource damage assessment and the costs of litigating the state's claim and to restore, replace, rehabilitate, or acquire the equivalent of the damaged natural resources that are the subject of the litigation."

Effective Date: Section 7, Ch. 154, L. 1997, provided: "[This act] is effective on passage and approval." Approved March 26, 1997.

Preamble: The preamble attached to Ch. 354, L. 1993, provided: "WHEREAS, the federal Comprehensive Environmental Response, Compensation, and Liability Act of 1980 authorizes the state, as trustee, to collect damages for state natural resources injured by the release of hazardous substances; and

WHEREAS, Chapter 711, Laws of 1985, as amended by Chapter 709, Laws of 1989, and Chapter 752, Laws of 1991, established the state proceedings for claims and actions for damages to natural resources from releases of hazardous substances, known as the Comprehensive Environmental Cleanup and Responsibility Act; and

WHEREAS, the State of Montana filed suit in United States District Court on December 22, 1983, against Atlantic Richfield Company for damages to natural resources in the Clark Fork River Basin; and

WHEREAS, a natural resource damage litigation program policy committee has been formed to oversee the litigation and the expenditure of the funds; and

WHEREAS, the court-ordered schedule requires the parties to complete discovery by September 27, 1994, and be prepared for trial in this matter by July 14, 1995."

Natural Resource Damage Program Authorization and Appropriation of Loan Proceeds: Section 1, Ch. 354, L. 1993, provided: "There is authorized to the department of health and environmental sciences [now department of environmental quality] from the coal severance tax permanent fund for fiscal years 1994 and 1995 a loan in the amount of $2,619,076, the proceeds of which are appropriated for the biennium ending June 30, 1995, for the purpose of conducting the litigation and natural resource damage claim against the atlantic richfield company (ARCO). Repayment of this loan is extended through the end of the 1995 biennium in accordance with 17-2-107. The repayment must include interest on the amount loaned at a rate commensurate with rates earned in the long-term investment pool."

Natural Resource Damage Program Reauthorization: Section 2, Ch. 354, L. 1993, provided: "(1) There is authorized to the department of health and environmental sciences [now department of environmental quality] from the coal severance tax permanent fund for fiscal years 1994 and 1995 a loan that was authorized for fiscal years 1992 and 1993 from the general fund in the amount of $4,928,894, for the purpose of conducting the natural resource damage assessment and the litigation of the natural resource damage claim against the atlantic richfield company (ARCO). There is also authorized to the department for fiscal year 1994 a loan from the coal severance tax permanent fund in the amount of $246,135, which represents the interest lost by the general fund because of the $4,928,894 loan for fiscal years 1992 and 1993.

(2) The department shall repay to the general fund the amount of $4,928,894, plus interest in the amount of $246,135 that was lost by the general fund because of the loan, from the proceeds of the loans authorized in subsection (1). The repayment to the general fund must be made upon receipt of the loans authorized by subsection (1)."

Legislative Oversight: Section 7, Ch. 354, L. 1993, provided: "The speaker of the house and the president of the senate shall each appoint two members of their respective bodies, one from each party, to meet quarterly for briefings on the progress of the Montana-ARCO litigation and negotiations. The committee shall also consider plans for appropriate utilization of any money received by the state as a result of the litigation. Staff assistance for the committee must be provided by the department of health and environmental sciences [now department of environmental quality]. Committee expenses must be paid from the appropriation in [section 1] [not codified, see 1993 compiler's comment]."

Saving Clause: Section 20, Ch. 709, L. 1989, was a saving clause.

Severability: Section 21, Ch. 709, L. 1989, was a severability clause.

2009 Amendment: Chapter 395 in definition of release near end after "80-8-102" deleted reference to subsection (30) and after "80-10-101" deleted reference to subsection (2); and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective July 1, 2009.

1999 Amendment: Chapter 437 inserted definition of institutional control; at end of definition of orphan share inserted "unless affiliated by stock ownership"; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective April 23, 1999.

1997 Amendment: Chapter 415 in definition of fiduciary, in (b), substituted "75-10-715(9)" for "75-10-715(7)"; inserted definitions of household, household refuse, orphan share, and orphan share fund; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective July 1, 1997.

Preamble: The preamble attached to Ch. 415, L. 1997, provided: "WHEREAS, the 1995 Legislature, in Chapter 584, Laws of 1995, directed the Department of Environmental Quality to institute a collaborative process involving all affected and interested persons to analyze the elimination of joint and several liability with respect to the cleanup of state Comprehensive Environmental Cleanup and Responsibility Act (CECRA) facilities and to submit any legislative proposals that collaboratively resulted from that process to the 55th Legislature; and

WHEREAS, the Department instituted this collaborative process with industry and business representatives; state, federal, and local government representatives; and public interest and environmental interest group representatives; and

WHEREAS, through a contract with the Department, the Montana Consensus Council designed the study process, facilitated the organization of the collaborative process, and conducted the numerous meetings of the study committees and interest group caucuses through which the parties to the collaborative process reached consensus on legislative proposals that are contained in this bill."

1995 Amendments: Chapter 418 in definition of Department substituted "department of environmental quality provided for in 2-15-3501" for "department of health and environmental sciences provided for in Title 2, chapter 15, part 21"; in definition of Director, after "department", deleted "of health and environmental sciences"; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective July 1, 1995.

Chapter 490 inserted definitions of fiduciary and foreclosure; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective April 14, 1995.

Chapter 584 inserted definition of reasonably anticipated future uses; and adjusted subsection references. Amendment effective May 1, 1995.

Transition: Section 499, Ch. 418, L. 1995, provided: "The provisions of 2-15-131 through 2-15-137 apply to [this act]."

Saving Clause: Section 503, Ch. 418, L. 1995, was a saving clause.

1995 Statement of Intent: The statement of intent attached to Ch. 490, L. 1995, provided: "A statement of intent is included with this bill because of the authorization granted to the department in 75-10-702 to adopt rules to implement Title 75, chapter 10, part 7, including implementation of the exemption from liability for persons holding indicia of ownership primarily to protect a security interest. To date, the department has not adopted rules under this section.

The legislature finds that existing state law related to the liability of persons holding security interests for environmental contamination is unclear and that this lack of clarity has created uncertainty on the part of security interest holders as to whether they are liable for environmental contamination caused by their borrowers or other third parties. The uncertainty has negatively affected the availability of credit in Montana.

In enacting Montana's Comprehensive Environmental Cleanup and Responsibility Act (CECRA), the legislature modeled the statute after and borrowed many terms from the federal Comprehensive Environmental Response, Compensation, and Liability Act of 1980 (CERCLA). The legislature specifically borrowed the term "own or operate", which excludes from liability those persons who, without participating in the management of the facility, hold indicia of ownership merely to protect a security interest.

When significant questions arose under CERCLA as to the scope of the terms "indicia of ownership" and "participating in the management of the facility", the federal government devoted substantial effort to developing a federal policy and a rule that employ a framework of specific tests to provide clearer articulation of a lender's scope of liability under CERCLA, both to governmental agencies and to third parties. The April 1992 rule, which appears at 40 CFR 300.1100, et seq., was preceded by many public hearings and public comment periods. Although the rule was recently judged to be technically beyond EPA's rulemaking authority, the contents of the rule still constitute EPA policy on the scope of the secured creditor exemption under CERCLA and the legislature finds that the rule in its current form provides a well-reasoned basis for interpreting the identical language in CECRA.

Therefore the legislature finds that the clarification of potential liability in a manner consistent with federal statutes, current EPA policy, and the regulations at 40 CFR 300.1100, et seq., is desirable in order to provide certainty for security interest holders, including persons engaged in lease financing, to enhance the availability of credit, and to encourage responsible practices by those security interest holders and borrowers to protect the public health and environment.

The legislature also finds that uncertainty exists in state law regarding the potential liability of certain fiduciaries for environmental contamination on property held in their fiduciary capacity and determines that a limited exemption from liability, comparable to the one being proposed for action by congress under CERCLA, should apply to fiduciaries and that it is necessary to add language concerning fiduciaries to Title 75, chapter 10, part 7.

Therefore, in adopting rules under 75-10-702 to implement the exemption under 75-10-701(10)(b) for holders of "the indicia of ownership", the department of health and environmental sciences [now department of environmental quality] shall adopt rules consistent with the revisions to CECRA contained in this bill, including rules that address fiduciaries within the exemption. The rules also must be consistent with the federal regulations set forth at 40 CFR 300.1100, et seq.

Finally, the legislature intends that the limited exemptions for secured creditors and fiduciaries that are clarified and granted by this legislation extend not only to liability asserted by governmental entities but also extend to claims by any third parties for cleanup or for cost recovery or contribution."

Applicability: Section 6, Ch. 490, L. 1995, provided: "[This act] does not apply to civil actions commenced prior to the [effective date of this act] or to the claims upon which such civil actions are based." Effective April 14, 1995.

Section 25(1), Ch. 584, L. 1995, provided: "(1) [This act] does not apply to civil actions commenced or begun prior to [the effective date of this act] [May 1, 1995] or to claims based on those actions."

Severability: Section 23, Ch. 584, L. 1995, was a severability clause.

1991 Amendment: Near middle of (13), after "potentially", substituted "liable person" for "responsible party"; and made minor changes in style.

1989 Amendments: Chapter 274 in definition of remedial action inserted "acquisition".

Chapter 709 inserted definitions of Director, environment, facility, natural resources, owns or operates, person, petroleum product, remedial action contract, remedial action contractor, and remedial action costs; substituted definition of hazardous or deleterious substance as one posing threat to public health, safety, or welfare or environment and defined as hazardous under section 101(14) of CERCLA, identified by the administrator of U.S. Environmental Protection Agency as hazardous under section 102 of CERCLA, or defined as hazardous waste under section 1004(5) of Resource Conservation and Recovery Act of 1976 or any petroleum product for "a substance that poses an imminent and substantial threat to public health and that is either a petroleum product or listed as a hazardous substance in volume 50, Federal Register, pages 13474 through 13513"; near middle of definition of release, after "the environment", deleted "or in a manner in which the substance can reasonably be expected to enter the environment if not contained, removed, or abated" and inserted "(including the abandonment or discarding of barrels, containers, and other closed receptacles containing any hazardous or deleterious substance)"; and in definition of remedial action substituted "all notification, investigation, administration, monitoring, cleanup, restoration, mitigation, abatement, removal, replacement, enforcement, legal action, health studies, feasibility studies, and other actions necessary or appropriate to respond to a release or threatened release" for "all investigation, monitoring, cleanup, restoration, abatement, removal, replacement, and other actions necessary or appropriate to respond to a release". Amendment effective May 22, 1989.

1997 Amendment — Enactment: Chapter 415 in (1), at end, inserted "including but not limited to"; inserted (1)(a) and (1)(b) concerning rules for listing and delisting facilities on the priority list and rules for prioritizing facilities; inserted (2) concerning rules implementing subsection (1); and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective April 28, 1997.

Chapter 539 enacted (3) requiring the Department to adopt, amend, or repeal rules to allow for the joint selection of remedial action contractors. Enactment effective May 5, 1997.

Preamble: The preamble attached to Ch. 415, L. 1997, provided: "WHEREAS, the 1995 Legislature, in Chapter 584, Laws of 1995, directed the Department of Environmental Quality to institute a collaborative process involving all affected and interested persons to analyze the elimination of joint and several liability with respect to the cleanup of state Comprehensive Environmental Cleanup and Responsibility Act (CECRA) facilities and to submit any legislative proposals that collaboratively resulted from that process to the 55th Legislature; and

WHEREAS, the Department instituted this collaborative process with industry and business representatives; state, federal, and local government representatives; and public interest and environmental interest group representatives; and

WHEREAS, through a contract with the Department, the Montana Consensus Council designed the study process, facilitated the organization of the collaborative process, and conducted the numerous meetings of the study committees and interest group caucuses through which the parties to the collaborative process reached consensus on legislative proposals that are contained in this bill."

1997 Statement of Intent: The statement of intent attached to Ch. 415, L. 1997, provided: "It is the intent of this bill to provide an option to the concept of joint and several liability for potentially liable persons to have their proportionate share of liability for a state Comprehensive Environmental Cleanup and Responsibility Act (CECRA) facility determined through an expedited process while ensuring that the concurrent cleanup of the facility occurs. The bill clarifies defenses to liability and creates exclusions from liability. The bill also provides rulemaking authority to the department for developing guidance and criteria and involving the public and the liable parties in the decisionmaking process for listing and delisting sites on a CECRA priority list. The department will be required to provide written justification for its decisions to list, delist, and prioritize sites needing remediation. The written criteria for listing and delisting represent the legislature's intent for this rulemaking."

Applicability: Section 7, Ch. 539, L. 1997, provided: "[This act] does not apply to any facility for which an administrative order has been issued pursuant to 75-10-711 prior to [the effective date of this act] [effective May 5, 1997] or to any facility for which the department of environmental quality and a liable or potentially liable person have, prior to [the effective date of this act] [effective May 5, 1997], entered into an agreement regarding the performance of remedial action for that facility."

1985 Statement of Intent: The statement of intent attached to Ch. 711, L. 1985, provided: "This bill establishes a special fund and authorizes the department of health and environmental sciences [now department of environmental quality] to spend money from that fund for the purpose of taking emergency, remedial action in cases of release of hazardous or deleterious substances into the environment. Rulemaking is required for the implementation of these provisions. It is the intent of the legislature that the department be authorized to adopt rules clarifying and setting forth more detailed procedures and criteria in such areas as:

(1) definition of remedial actions to include such things as cleanup and restoration of water resources, provisions of alternate sources of supply, relocation of persons and property in imminent danger of injury or damage, and investigation and monitoring of releases of hazardous and deleterious substances;

(2) procedures for identifying responsible parties and notifying them of the department's intent to take remedial action;

(3) criteria for taking emergency actions in cases where prior notification to the responsible party is not possible;

(4) procedures for retaining consultants to perform remedial actions under the department's direction;

(5) procedures for accounting for funds expended in performing remedial actions; and

(6) procedures for coordination of remedial actions with the activities of other state or local government agencies with relevant expertise or authority."

75-10-704. Environmental quality protection fund.

Compiler's Comments

2009 Amendment: Chapter 486 in (1) at beginning of first sentence inserted "Subject to legislative fund transfers"; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective July 1, 2009.

2007 Amendment: Chapter 432 in (2) at beginning deleted "Except as provided in subsection (9)"; in (4)(c) after "funds" substituted "allocated" for "appropriated"; inserted (4)(d) relating to proceeds from resource indemnity and ground water assessment tax; deleted former (9) that read: "(9) (a) If funds are transferred from the orphan share fund to the environmental quality protection fund pursuant to 75-10-743(9), the department shall, subject to the limitation in subsection (9)(b) of this section, at the end of the fiscal year in which the transfer is made and in each subsequent fiscal year, transfer from the environmental quality protection fund to the orphan share fund the unencumbered amount remaining in the environmental quality protection fund at the end of the fiscal year that is in excess of the amount appropriated for the next fiscal year from the environmental quality protection fund.

(b) The total transferred pursuant to subsection (9)(a) may not exceed the total amount transferred to the environmental quality protection fund pursuant to 75-10-743(9)"; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective July 1, 2007.

2005 Amendments — Composite Section: Chapter 355 in (9)(a) near beginning after "pursuant to" and in (9)(b) at end substituted "75-10-743(9)" for "75-10-743(10)". Amendment effective July 1, 2005.

Chapter 425 in (9)(a) and (9)(b) substituted "75-10-743(9)" for "75-10-743(10)". Amendment effective July 1, 2005.

2003 Amendment: Chapter 199 in (2) at beginning inserted exception clause; inserted (9) concerning funds transferred from orphan share fund; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective July 1, 2003.

Contingent Termination Ineffective: Section 6, Ch. 199, L. 2003, provided: "If 75-10-743 terminates June 30, 2005, then [sections 1 and 2] [75-10-621 and 75-10-704] terminate June 30, 2005." However, sec. 2, Ch. 368, L. 2003, repealed sec. 30, Ch. 415, L. 1997, which would have terminated 75-10-743 June 30, 2005; therefore, the contingent termination is ineffective.

2001 Amendment: Chapter 326 inserted (4)(g) requiring deposit of interest into environmental quality protection fund; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective April 21, 2001.

Saving Clause: Section 3, Ch. 326, L. 2001, was a saving clause.

Applicability: Section 5, Ch. 326, L. 2001, provided: "The requirement to assess and collect interest in [section 2], amending 75-10-722, applies to interest accrued after [the effective date of this act]." Effective April 21, 2001.

1997 Amendments: Chapter 86 in (7)(e), after "intended", inserted "to delay" and deleted last sentence that read: "Subsections (7) and (8) do not pertain to facilities where the department has initiated actions under this part"; in (8)(d) substituted language prohibiting a person from avoiding liability or responsibility for costs or damages incurred from the release or threatened release of a hazardous or deleterious substance by subsequently donating money or in-kind services for former language that read: "This subsection does not minimize the liability, lessen the standard of liability, or otherwise shield from liability a potentially liable person under 75-10-715 or section 107 of CERCLA for costs or damages incurred as a result of a release or threatened release of a hazardous or deleterious substance"; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective March 19, 1997.

Chapter 415 in (3)(a), near middle, inserted "including the preparation of a priority list"; inserted (4)(e) and (4)(f) concerning funds received from interest income and funds received from settlements; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective July 1, 1997.

Retroactive Applicability: Section 3, Ch. 86, L. 1997, provided: "[This act] [75-10-704] applies retroactively, within the meaning of 1-2-109, to private funds or in-kind services donated after April 14, 1995."

Preamble: The preamble attached to Ch. 415, L. 1997, provided: "WHEREAS, the 1995 Legislature, in Chapter 584, Laws of 1995, directed the Department of Environmental Quality to institute a collaborative process involving all affected and interested persons to analyze the elimination of joint and several liability with respect to the cleanup of state Comprehensive Environmental Cleanup and Responsibility Act (CECRA) facilities and to submit any legislative proposals that collaboratively resulted from that process to the 55th Legislature; and

WHEREAS, the Department instituted this collaborative process with industry and business representatives; state, federal, and local government representatives; and public interest and environmental interest group representatives; and

WHEREAS, through a contract with the Department, the Montana Consensus Council designed the study process, facilitated the organization of the collaborative process, and conducted the numerous meetings of the study committees and interest group caucuses through which the parties to the collaborative process reached consensus on legislative proposals that are contained in this bill."

1995 Amendment: Chapter 452 in (3)(a), at beginning, inserted exception clause; inserted (7) creating state special revenue account for donated funds and providing for operation of account; and inserted (8) regarding donation of in-kind services. Amendment effective April 14, 1995.

1993 Amendment: Chapter 349 deleted (7) that read: "(7) The department shall, as provided in 5-11-210, submit to the legislature a complete financial report on the fund, including a description of all expenditures made since the preceding report"; and made minor changes in style.

1991 Amendments: Chapter 16 in two places in (3)(b) substituted "liable persons" for "responsible parties".

Chapter 112 near beginning of (7) inserted reference to 5-11-210 and after "legislature" deleted "at the beginning of each regular session". Amendment effective March 20, 1991.

Chapter 752 in (4)(a) inserted "forfeited financial assurance".

Severability: Section 6, Ch. 752, L. 1991, was a severability clause.

Retroactive Applicability: Section 7, Ch. 752, L. 1991, provided: "[This act] applies retroactively, within the meaning of 1-2-109, to occurrences after June 30, 1985."

1989 Amendments: Chapter 675 near beginning of (2) substituted "the fund may be used by the department only" for "the fund may only be used"; inserted (5) relating to budget amendments; and inserted (7) relating to financial report to Legislature. Amendment effective July 1, 1989.

Chapter 709 in (2) deleted second sentence providing that fund uses must include conduct of hazardous waste site remedial action program at sites where release has occurred and where EPA, under CERCLA, has conducted study and judged site not eligible for inclusion on national priority list or EPA has no authority or plan to assess site; in (3) substituted "The department shall" for "The department's program for remedial action under subsection (2) must include"; in (3)(a), at beginning, inserted "establish and implement"; in (4)(a) inserted "natural resource" and substituted "remedial action costs" for "department expenditures"; inserted (4)(b) requiring deposit of administrative penalties assessed under 75-10-714 and civil penalties under 75-10-711(5); and made minor changes in form and phraseology. Amendment effective May 22, 1989.

1987 Amendment: At beginning of (2), after "may", inserted "only" and after first sentence inserted remainder of subsection relating to fund uses (see 1987 Session Law for text); inserted (3) establishing requirements for hazardous waste site remedial action program; in (4)(a), after "all", inserted "penalties, damages, and"; in (4)(c) substituted "interest income of the resource indemnity trust fund pursuant to 15-38-202" for "environmental contingency account within the state special revenue fund established pursuant to 75-1-1101"; and in (5), after "account", deleted "within the state special revenue fund".

2013 Amendment: Chapter 342 deleted former (3) that read: "(3) A person who is not subject to an administrative or judicial order may not conduct any remedial action at any facility that is subject to an administrative or judicial order issued pursuant to this part without the written permission of the department. Remedial action performed in accordance with this part is intended to provide for the protection of the environmental life support system from degradation and to prevent unreasonable depletion and degradation of natural resources." Amendment effective October 1, 2013.

2003 Amendment: Chapter 361 inserted (2) relating to constitutional obligations and legislative intent; inserted (3) relating to remedial action not subject to an administrative or judicial order; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective April 16, 2003.

Preamble: The preamble attached to Ch. 361, L. 2003, provided: "WHEREAS, Article II, section 3, of the Montana Constitution enumerates certain inalienable individual rights, including the right to a clean and healthful environment, the right of pursuing life's basic necessities, the right of enjoying and defending an individual's life and liberty, the right of acquiring, possessing, and protecting property, and the right of seeking individual safety, health, and happiness in all lawful ways; and

WHEREAS, the constitutionally enumerated rights are by their very nature bound to result in competing interests in specific fact situations; and

WHEREAS, Article IX, section 1, of the Montana Constitution provides that the state and each person shall maintain and improve a clean and healthful environment in Montana for present and future generations and directs the Legislature to provide for the administration and enforcement of this duty and also directs the Legislature to provide adequate remedies for the protection of the environmental life support system from degradation and to provide adequate remedies to prevent unreasonable depletion and degradation of natural resources; and

WHEREAS, the Legislature has reviewed the intent of the framers of the 1972 Montana Constitution as evidenced in the verbatim transcripts of the constitutional convention; and

WHEREAS, there is no indication that one enumerated inalienable right is intended to supersede other inalienable rights, including the right to use property in all lawful means; and

WHEREAS, the Legislature, mindful of its constitutional obligation to provide for the administration and enforcement of the constitution, has enacted a comprehensive set of laws to accomplish the goals of the constitution, including the Montana Clean Indoor Air Act of 1979, Title 50, chapter 40, part 1, MCA; the Montana Environmental Policy Act, Title 75, chapter 1, parts 1 through 3, MCA; the Clean Air Act of Montana, Title 75, chapter 2, parts 1 through 4, MCA; water quality laws, Title 75, chapter 5, MCA; The Natural Streambed and Land Preservation Act of 1975, Title 75, chapter 7, part 1, MCA; The Montana Solid Waste Management Act, Title 75, chapter 10, part 2, MCA; The Montana Hazardous Waste Act, Title 75, chapter 10, part 4, MCA; the Comprehensive Environmental Cleanup and Responsibility Act, Title 75, chapter 10, part 7, MCA; the Montana Megalandfill Siting Act, sections 75-10-901 through 75-10-945, MCA; the Montana Underground Storage Tank Installer and Inspector Licensing and Permitting Act, Title 75, chapter 11, part 2, MCA; the Montana Underground Storage Tank Act, Title 75, chapter 11, part 5, MCA; the Montana Major Facility Siting Act, Title 75, chapter 20, MCA; the Open-Space Land and Voluntary Conservation Easement Act, Title 76, chapter 6, MCA; the Environmental Control Easement Act, Title 76, chapter 7, MCA; The Strip and Underground Mine Siting Act, Title 82, chapter 4, part 1, MCA; The Montana Strip and Underground Mine Reclamation Act, Title 82, chapter 4, part 2, MCA; The Opencut Mining Act, Title 82, chapter 4, part 4, MCA; and The Nongame and Endangered Species Conservation Act, Title 87, chapter 5, part 1, MCA."

2013 Amendment: Chapter 342 inserted (9) concerning prohibited remedial action and evidence in civil actions; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective October 1, 2013.

2001 Amendment: Chapter 383 in (1)(b) at beginning of first sentence substituted "none of the persons who are liable" for "the appropriate remedial action will not be done properly and expeditiously by any person liable under 75-10-715(1) and each person that is liable" and at end after "appropriate remedial action" inserted "will properly and expeditiously perform the appropriate remedial action"; in (3)(b) near beginning after "determined by the department to be" inserted "liable or potentially"; in (3)(c) at beginning after "the written notice" deleted "to each person"; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective April 28, 2001.

1997 Amendment: Chapter 539 in first sentence of (1)(b), after "person liable under 75-10-715(1)", inserted "and each person that is liable or potentially liable under 75-10-715(1) has been given the opportunity by letter to properly and expeditiously perform the appropriate remedial action" and inserted second sentence requiring liable persons to take immediate action concerning the release; deleted former first sentence in (3) that read: "Any person liable under 75-10-715(1) must take immediate action to contain, remove, and abate the release"; in (4), near beginning after "subsection (1)", deleted "or has reason to believe that a release that may pose an imminent and substantial threat to the public health, safety, or welfare or the environment has occurred or is about to occur"; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective May 5, 1997.

1997 Statement of Intent: The statement of intent attached to Ch. 539, L. 1997, provided: "It is the intent of this bill to provide potentially liable persons the opportunity to take the necessary remedial action before the state takes action and to authorize the department of environmental quality to adopt rules that allow for the joint and mutual selection of remedial action contractors by the department and the potentially liable persons responsible for taking remedial action at sites."

Applicability: Section 7, Ch. 539, L. 1997, provided: "[This act] does not apply to any facility for which an administrative order has been issued pursuant to 75-10-711 prior to [the effective date of this act] [effective May 5, 1997] or to any facility for which the department of environmental quality and a liable or potentially liable person have, prior to [the effective date of this act] [effective May 5, 1997], entered into an agreement regarding the performance of remedial action for that facility."

1995 Amendment: Chapter 490 in (3)(c), at end, substituted "this part" for "75-10-715(3)"; adjusted subsection references; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective April 14, 1995.

1995 Statement of Intent: The statement of intent attached to Ch. 490, L. 1995, provided: "A statement of intent is included with this bill because of the authorization granted to the department in 75-10-702 to adopt rules to implement Title 75, chapter 10, part 7, including implementation of the exemption from liability for persons holding indicia of ownership primarily to protect a security interest. To date, the department has not adopted rules under this section.

The legislature finds that existing state law related to the liability of persons holding security interests for environmental contamination is unclear and that this lack of clarity has created uncertainty on the part of security interest holders as to whether they are liable for environmental contamination caused by their borrowers or other third parties. The uncertainty has negatively affected the availability of credit in Montana.

In enacting Montana's Comprehensive Environmental Cleanup and Responsibility Act (CECRA), the legislature modeled the statute after and borrowed many terms from the federal Comprehensive Environmental Response, Compensation, and Liability Act of 1980 (CERCLA). The legislature specifically borrowed the term "own or operate", which excludes from liability those persons who, without participating in the management of the facility, hold indicia of ownership merely to protect a security interest.

When significant questions arose under CERCLA as to the scope of the terms "indicia of ownership" and "participating in the management of the facility", the federal government devoted substantial effort to developing a federal policy and a rule that employ a framework of specific tests to provide clearer articulation of a lender's scope of liability under CERCLA, both to governmental agencies and to third parties. The April 1992 rule, which appears at 40 CFR 300.1100, et seq., was preceded by many public hearings and public comment periods. Although the rule was recently judged to be technically beyond EPA's rulemaking authority, the contents of the rule still constitute EPA policy on the scope of the secured creditor exemption under CERCLA and the legislature finds that the rule in its current form provides a well-reasoned basis for interpreting the identical language in CECRA.

Therefore the legislature finds that the clarification of potential liability in a manner consistent with federal statutes, current EPA policy, and the regulations at 40 CFR 300.1100, et seq., is desirable in order to provide certainty for security interest holders, including persons engaged in lease financing, to enhance the availability of credit, and to encourage responsible practices by those security interest holders and borrowers to protect the public health and environment.

The legislature also finds that uncertainty exists in state law regarding the potential liability of certain fiduciaries for environmental contamination on property held in their fiduciary capacity and determines that a limited exemption from liability, comparable to the one being proposed for action by congress under CERCLA, should apply to fiduciaries and that it is necessary to add language concerning fiduciaries to Title 75, chapter 10, part 7.

Therefore, in adopting rules under 75-10-702 to implement the exemption under 75-10-701(10)(b) for holders of "the indicia of ownership", the department of health and environmental sciences [now department of environmental quality] shall adopt rules consistent with the revisions to CECRA contained in this bill, including rules that address fiduciaries within the exemption. The rules also must be consistent with the federal regulations set forth at 40 CFR 300.1100, et seq.

Finally, the legislature intends that the limited exemptions for secured creditors and fiduciaries that are clarified and granted by this legislation extend not only to liability asserted by governmental entities but also extend to claims by any third parties for cleanup or for cost recovery or contribution."

Applicability: Section 6, Ch. 490, L. 1995, provided: "[This act] does not apply to civil actions commenced prior to the [effective date of this act] or to the claims upon which such civil actions are based." Effective April 14, 1995.

1991 Amendment: Inserted (9) authorizing Department to take remedial action at sites regulated by CERCLA.

Severability: Section 6, Ch. 752, L. 1991, was a severability clause.

Retroactive Applicability: Section 7, Ch. 752, L. 1991, provided: "[This act] applies retroactively, within the meaning of 1-2-109, to occurrences after June 30, 1985."

1989 Amendment: In (1), in introductory clause after "action", deleted "necessary and appropriate to protect the public health, public welfare, or the environment"; in (1)(a), after "release", inserted "into the environment that may present an imminent and substantial endangerment to the public health, welfare, or safety of the environment"; in (1)(b), after "expeditiously by", substituted "any person liable under 75-10-715" for "the owner or operator of the vessel, vehicle, or facility from which the release emanates or by any other responsible party"; in (2), near middle, inserted "remedial action in the form of" and "as authorized by 75-10-707" and near end, before "welfare", inserted "safety"; in (3), in introductory clause near beginning of first sentence, substituted "liable under 75-10-715(1)" for "responsible for the release", near middle deleted reference to subsection (2), and near end substituted "person or persons liable" for "party or parties responsible"; in (3)(a) substituted "liable person or persons" for "responsible party"; in (3)(b), at beginning, substituted "the person or persons determined by the department to be liable under 75-10-715(1)" for "the party or parties determined by the department to be responsible for the release or threatened release"; in (3)(c) substituted "the written notice to each person informs him that if he is subsequently found liable pursuant to 75-10-715(1), he may be required to reimburse the fund for the state's remedial action costs and may be subject to penalties pursuant to 75-10-715(3)" for "The written notice to a responsible party must inform the responsible party that if that party is subsequently found liable pursuant to 75-10-715, he may be required to reimburse the fund for the costs of the remedial action taken by the department and may be subject to punitive damages"; inserted (4) allowing Department to issue cease and desist, remedial, or other orders as necessary or appropriate to protect public and environment; inserted (5) providing civil penalty of no more than $10,000 for each day a violation occurs or a failure or refusal to comply continues, allowing court to take into account, in determining penalty, circumstances of noncompliance, ability to pay, and prior history, and requiring deposit of penalties in environmental protection fund; inserted (6) stating circumstances of court's jurisdiction to review administrative order; inserted (7) placing burden of proof on objecting party to show Department's order was arbitrary and capricious or otherwise unlawful; inserted (8) allowing Department, as alternative to issuing administrative notice or order, to bring equitable action in court; and made minor changes in form and phraseology. Amendment effective May 22, 1989.

1999 Amendment: Chapter 437 in (10) substituted "75-10-701(15)(b)" for "75-10-701(14)(b)". Amendment effective April 23, 1999.

1997 Amendment: Chapter 415 in (1), at beginning, inserted exception clause and near middle inserted "and the exclusions set forth in subsection (7)"; in (5), near beginning, inserted "has a defense"; in (5)(g), near beginning, substituted "transported" for "accepted" and after "only household refuse" deleted "(garbage, trash, or septic tank sanitary wastes generated by single or multiple residences, hotels, motels, restaurants, or similar facilities) for transport to a solid waste disposal facility"; inserted (7) concerning reasons for exclusion from liability; inserted (8) concerning liability for failure to satisfy elements for each exclusion in subsection (7); in (10), near end, substituted "75-10-701(14)(b)" for "75-10-701(10)(b)"; adjusted subsection references; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective July 1, 1997.

Preamble: The preamble attached to Ch. 415, L. 1997, provided: "WHEREAS, the 1995 Legislature, in Chapter 584, Laws of 1995, directed the Department of Environmental Quality to institute a collaborative process involving all affected and interested persons to analyze the elimination of joint and several liability with respect to the cleanup of state Comprehensive Environmental Cleanup and Responsibility Act (CECRA) facilities and to submit any legislative proposals that collaboratively resulted from that process to the 55th Legislature; and

WHEREAS, the Department instituted this collaborative process with industry and business representatives; state, federal, and local government representatives; and public interest and environmental interest group representatives; and

WHEREAS, through a contract with the Department, the Montana Consensus Council designed the study process, facilitated the organization of the collaborative process, and conducted the numerous meetings of the study committees and interest group caucuses through which the parties to the collaborative process reached consensus on legislative proposals that are contained in this bill."

1997 Statement of Intent: The statement of intent attached to Ch. 415, L. 1997, provided: "It is the intent of this bill to provide an option to the concept of joint and several liability for potentially liable persons to have their proportionate share of liability for a state Comprehensive Environmental Cleanup and Responsibility Act (CECRA) facility determined through an expedited process while ensuring that the concurrent cleanup of the facility occurs. The bill clarifies defenses to liability and creates exclusions from liability. The bill also provides rulemaking authority to the department for developing guidance and criteria and involving the public and the liable parties in the decisionmaking process for listing and delisting sites on a CECRA priority list. The department will be required to provide written justification for its decisions to list, delist, and prioritize sites needing remediation. The written criteria for listing and delisting represent the legislature's intent for this rulemaking."

1995 Amendment: Chapter 490 inserted (7) through (9) regarding fiduciary and security interest liability; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective April 14, 1995.

Bank Loan for Purchase of Contaminated Real Property — Negligent Misrepresentation, Constructive Fraud, and Punitive Damages — Summary Judgment Reversed: After the Department of Health and Environmental Sciences (now Department of Environmental Quality) discovered that soil had been contaminated with gasoline leaking from Habets' and other service station gas tanks in violation of this section, Habets entered into a buy-sell agreement for sale of his service station to Mattingly. Mattingly then met with First Bank Vice President Joe Dolan to secure financing. Dolan conducted a physical inspection of the service station property in order to obtain an impression of the value of the property and to determine whether First Bank would be secure in its loan. At the time of his inspection, Dolan was aware of the contamination caused by the service station gas tanks. The loan was approved by the First Bank loan committee made up of Dolan, Susan Hemmer, the bank president, and John Mulcare, an owner of another service station, all three of whom were aware of the contamination but did not discuss it with Mattingly or the loan committee. Mattingly learned of the contamination much later when he tried to sell the station. He then brought an action against Habets, Habets' realtor, and First Bank, alleging constructive fraud, negligence, and negligent misrepresentation by First Bank and seeking punitive damages. The District Court granted summary judgment to First Bank on all issues. The Supreme Court, following Kitchen Krafters, Inc. v. Eastside Bank of Mont., 242 M 155, 789 P2d 567 (1990), stated that a threshold issue in a claim of negligent misrepresentation is whether the defendant made a representation as to a past or existing material fact upon which the claim is based. The Supreme Court pointed out that except for some basic facts involving the existence of the contamination, Dolan's visit to the gas station, and the action of the loan committee, the parties disagreed over the nature, scope, and import of the valuation of the property; disagreed whether First Bank's appraisal of the property and approval of the Mattingly loan constituted a representation as to the value of the property; and, if it was a representation, disagreed over whether Mattingly relied upon that representation. Citing McGregor v. Cushman/Mommer, 220 M 98, 714 P2d 536 (1986), the Supreme Court also stated that special circumstances may support a claim for constructive fraud when a party makes misleading statements concerning the physical condition or commercial value of real estate and pointed out that a jury might find that representations by First Bank with regard to the property would constitute these "special circumstances". Concerning the requirement of 28-2-406 that in a claim for constructive fraud one party must gain an advantage over the other, the Supreme Court cited the fact that upon closing the sale of the station to Mattingly, First Bank was able to pay off a loan for the property made to Habets and that in making the loan to Mattingly, First Bank was able to collect interest income from the loan. Because there were facts in dispute as to the foregoing issues, the Supreme Court held that summary judgment was not appropriate and that the District Court erred in granting summary judgment in favor of First Bank. Because 27-1-221 allows punitive damages against a party guilty of actual fraud or malice, the Supreme Court also reversed the District Court on the issue of punitive damages. Mattingly v. First Bank of Lincoln, 285 M 209, 947 P2d 66, 54 St. Rep. 1116 (1997).

75-10-718. Liability of remedial action contractor.

Compiler's Comments

1995 Amendment: Chapter 490 in (4), near middle after "scope of", substituted "the entity's or individual's" for "its or his"; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective April 14, 1995.

1995 Statement of Intent: The statement of intent attached to Ch. 490, L. 1995, provided: "A statement of intent is included with this bill because of the authorization granted to the department in 75-10-702 to adopt rules to implement Title 75, chapter 10, part 7, including implementation of the exemption from liability for persons holding indicia of ownership primarily to protect a security interest. To date, the department has not adopted rules under this section.

The legislature finds that existing state law related to the liability of persons holding security interests for environmental contamination is unclear and that this lack of clarity has created uncertainty on the part of security interest holders as to whether they are liable for environmental contamination caused by their borrowers or other third parties. The uncertainty has negatively affected the availability of credit in Montana.

In enacting Montana's Comprehensive Environmental Cleanup and Responsibility Act (CECRA), the legislature modeled the statute after and borrowed many terms from the federal Comprehensive Environmental Response, Compensation, and Liability Act of 1980 (CERCLA). The legislature specifically borrowed the term "own or operate", which excludes from liability those persons who, without participating in the management of the facility, hold indicia of ownership merely to protect a security interest.

When significant questions arose under CERCLA as to the scope of the terms "indicia of ownership" and "participating in the management of the facility", the federal government devoted substantial effort to developing a federal policy and a rule that employ a framework of specific tests to provide clearer articulation of a lender's scope of liability under CERCLA, both to governmental agencies and to third parties. The April 1992 rule, which appears at 40 CFR 300.1100, et seq., was preceded by many public hearings and public comment periods. Although the rule was recently judged to be technically beyond EPA's rulemaking authority, the contents of the rule still constitute EPA policy on the scope of the secured creditor exemption under CERCLA and the legislature finds that the rule in its current form provides a well-reasoned basis for interpreting the identical language in CECRA.

Therefore the legislature finds that the clarification of potential liability in a manner consistent with federal statutes, current EPA policy, and the regulations at 40 CFR 300.1100, et seq., is desirable in order to provide certainty for security interest holders, including persons engaged in lease financing, to enhance the availability of credit, and to encourage responsible practices by those security interest holders and borrowers to protect the public health and environment.

The legislature also finds that uncertainty exists in state law regarding the potential liability of certain fiduciaries for environmental contamination on property held in their fiduciary capacity and determines that a limited exemption from liability, comparable to the one being proposed for action by congress under CERCLA, should apply to fiduciaries and that it is necessary to add language concerning fiduciaries to Title 75, chapter 10, part 7.

Therefore, in adopting rules under 75-10-702 to implement the exemption under 75-10-701(10)(b) for holders of "the indicia of ownership", the department of health and environmental sciences [now department of environmental quality] shall adopt rules consistent with the revisions to CECRA contained in this bill, including rules that address fiduciaries within the exemption. The rules also must be consistent with the federal regulations set forth at 40 CFR 300.1100, et seq.

Finally, the legislature intends that the limited exemptions for secured creditors and fiduciaries that are clarified and granted by this legislation extend not only to liability asserted by governmental entities but also extend to claims by any third parties for cleanup or for cost recovery or contribution."

Applicability: Section 6, Ch. 490, L. 1995, provided: "[This act] does not apply to civil actions commenced prior to the [effective date of this act] or to the claims upon which such civil actions are based." Effective April 14, 1995.

1991 Amendment: In (8) substituted "liable person" for "responsible party".

Effective Date: Section 22, Ch. 709, L. 1989, provided that this section is effective May 22, 1989.

1997 Amendment: Chapter 415 in (4), after "reach a final settlement with a", substituted "potentially liable or liable person" for "person liable", near middle substituted "remedial action" for "response", inserted "taking into account the toxicity of the hazardous or deleterious substances involved and the person's contribution of hazardous or deleterious substances in relation to the total volume of hazardous or deleterious substances at the facility", and substituted "through (4)(d)" for "or (4)(b)"; in (4)(a) substituted current text concerning liability based on 75-10-715, contribution of less than 0.002%, and prohibition of requirement for payment of remedial action costs for "Both of the following are minimal in comparison to other hazardous or deleterious substances at the facility:

(i) the amount of the hazardous or deleterious substances contributed by that person to the facility;

(ii) the toxic or other hazardous effects of the substances contributed by that person to the facility"; inserted (4)(b) concerning liability based upon 75-10-715(1)(c) or (1)(d), proof of disposal or treatment of less than 5% of the hazardous or deleterious substances disposed of, and definition of solid waste; inserted (4)(d) concerning substantial credible evidence of a defense; inserted (5) concerning settlement; inserted (6) concerning agreement to liability settlement avoiding reservation of rights; inserted (7) concerning priority for payment of settlement funds; inserted (8) concerning settlement prohibiting application of allocation process; adjusted subsection references; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective July 1, 1997.

Preamble: The preamble attached to Ch. 415, L. 1997, provided: "WHEREAS, the 1995 Legislature, in Chapter 584, Laws of 1995, directed the Department of Environmental Quality to institute a collaborative process involving all affected and interested persons to analyze the elimination of joint and several liability with respect to the cleanup of state Comprehensive Environmental Cleanup and Responsibility Act (CECRA) facilities and to submit any legislative proposals that collaboratively resulted from that process to the 55th Legislature; and

WHEREAS, the Department instituted this collaborative process with industry and business representatives; state, federal, and local government representatives; and public interest and environmental interest group representatives; and

WHEREAS, through a contract with the Department, the Montana Consensus Council designed the study process, facilitated the organization of the collaborative process, and conducted the numerous meetings of the study committees and interest group caucuses through which the parties to the collaborative process reached consensus on legislative proposals that are contained in this bill."

1997 Statement of Intent: The statement of intent attached to Ch. 415, L. 1997, provided: "It is the intent of this bill to provide an option to the concept of joint and several liability for potentially liable persons to have their proportionate share of liability for a state Comprehensive Environmental Cleanup and Responsibility Act (CECRA) facility determined through an expedited process while ensuring that the concurrent cleanup of the facility occurs. The bill clarifies defenses to liability and creates exclusions from liability. The bill also provides rulemaking authority to the department for developing guidance and criteria and involving the public and the liable parties in the decisionmaking process for listing and delisting sites on a CECRA priority list. The department will be required to provide written justification for its decisions to list, delist, and prioritize sites needing remediation. The written criteria for listing and delisting represent the legislature's intent for this rulemaking."

1991 Amendment: Inserted (5) authorizing Department to require financial assurance; and made minor changes in style.

1991 Statement of Intent: The statement of intent attached to Ch. 752, L. 1991, provided: "A statement of intent is required for this bill to provide guidance to the department of health and environmental sciences [now department of environmental quality] concerning rulemaking to establish the specific terms and conditions of financial assurance that a liable person is required to provide pursuant to 75-10-719 and 75-10-721. The department shall consult and to the greatest extent practicable rely upon financial assurance concepts and requirements contained in federal regulations that implement the federal Comprehensive Environmental Response, Compensation, and Liability Act of 1980, as amended."

Severability: Section 6, Ch. 752, L. 1991, was a severability clause.

Common-Law Action Not Usurped by Statutory Scheme for Environmental Remediation and Cleanup: Plaintiffs brought a common-law action against defendant for restoration damages related to environmental damage caused by defendant's refinery. Defendant asserted that the action would interfere with the statutory plan in the Comprehensive Environmental Cleanup and Responsibility Act (CECRA), Title 75, ch. 10, part 7, and contended that the common-law action was preempted by the statutory provisions. The Supreme Court disagreed. As set out in Brewington v. Employers Fire Ins. Co., 1999 MT 312, 297 M 243, 992 P2d 237 (1999), statutory preemption of common-law claims is limited to situations in which there are a direct conflict between statutes and a common-law claim. However, nothing in CECRA preempts a common-law claim that seeks to recover restoration damages beyond the statutes' health-based standards, and the court declined to add to CECRA a prohibition against common-law claims when the Legislature declined to do so. (2) Section 24, Ch. 415, L. 1997, also amended sec. 18(2), Ch. 584, L. 1995, by inserting at end "and the 1998-99 biennium".

1997 Extension of Termination: Section 25, Ch. 415, L. 1997, amended sec. 27(2), Ch. 584, L. 1995, by extending the termination date imposed by Ch. 584 for [sections 14 through 20] (not codified) of Ch. 584 to June 30, 1999.

Mixed Funding Pilot Program: Sections 13 through 20, Ch. 584, L. 1995, provided: "Section 13. Study process. The department of health and environmental sciences [now department of environmental quality], with legislative oversight from the environmental quality council, shall institute a collaborative process involving all affected and interested parties that specifically analyzes the elimination of joint and several liability with respect to cleanup of state CECRA sites and any related funding necessary to clean up state CECRA sites as a result of eliminating joint and several liability. The department of health and environmental sciences [now department of environmental quality] shall submit a report and legislative proposals that collaboratively resulted from that process to the 55th legislature.

Section 14. Short title. [Sections 14 through 20] [not codified] may be cited as the "Mixed Funding Pilot Program".

Section 15. Purpose — legislative declaration. (1) The purposes of [sections 14 through 20] [not codified] are to establish a pilot remediation program to operate in conjunction with the voluntary cleanup program provided for in [sections 4 through 12] [75-10-730 through 75-10-738] and to provide information during the 2-year study process in [section 13] [not codified].

(2) The legislature further intends that the pilot program provide necessary data related to:

(a) actual costs incurred in the remediation of facilities;

(b) the costs associated with the elimination of joint and several liability;

(c) the potential use of resource indemnity trust fund money in remediating facilities;

(d) the feasibility of voluntary cleanup plans; and

(e) the coordination between an applicant and the department in the use of voluntary cleanup programs.

Section 16. Criteria. (1) The pilot program ~~must consist~~ consists of remediation of ~~three sites from the department of state lands' abandoned hard-rock mine priority list. The three sites must be selected from the top ten priority sites on that list as of April 1, 1995~~ the Joslyn street tailings facility, the Corbin flats facility, and the block P mill facility [changes made by sec. 23, Ch. 415, L. 1997].

(2) Any site remediated under this pilot program must meet the following criteria:

(a) The owner of the property has, prior to May 22, 1989, purchased or entered into a lease purchase agreement or an option to purchase property where the facility is located.

(b) The applicant has submitted a voluntary cleanup plan in accordance with the provisions of [sections 7 and 8] [75-10-733 and 75-10-734].

(c) The department has accepted and approved the application for a voluntary cleanup plan in accordance with the provisions of [sections 6 through 10] [75-10-732 through 75-10-736] by June 30, 1997 [underlined language added by sec. 23, Ch. 415, L. 1997].

(3) The department and the applicant shall negotiate an apportionment of the applicant's liability pursuant to [section 17] [not codified]. The department, as a trier of fact, shall make the final determination of the applicant's apportioned liability. If the applicant disagrees with the department's determination of the applicant's proportionate share of liability, the applicant may appeal the department's decision in accordance with the requirements of [section 6(4)] [75-10-732(4)].

~~(4) If more than three applicants submit voluntary cleanup plans for the highest priority sites on the department of state lands' [now department of environmental quality's] abandoned hard-rock mine priority list and the department approves more than three plans, the department shall select three plans to incorporate into the pilot program on a priority basis as determined by the date of submittal of a complete application.~~ [Stricken language deleted by sec. 23, Ch. 415, L. 1997.]

Section 17. Mixed funding — determination of liability. (1) An applicant who satisfies the requirements of [section 16(2)] [not codified] shall meet with the department within 30 days of approval of the voluntary cleanup plan to negotiate an apportionment of liability for the site. The burden is on the applicant to show how the applicant's liability should be apportioned. In apportioning the liability of the applicant under this section, the department shall balance all of the following factors:

(a) the extent to which the applicant caused the release of the hazardous or deleterious substance;

(b) the extent to which an applicant's contribution to the release of a hazardous or deleterious substance can be diminished;

(c) the amount of the hazardous or deleterious substance involved;

(d) the degree of toxicity of the hazardous or deleterious substance involved;

(e) the degree of involvement of and care exercised by the applicant in manufacturing, treating, transporting, or disposing of the hazardous or deleterious substance;

(f) the degree of cooperation by the applicant with state or local officials to prevent any harm to the public health, safety, or welfare or to the environment; and

(g) the applicant's knowledge of the hazardous nature of the substance.

(2) Once the department and the applicant have negotiated an apportionment of the applicant's liability, the applicant has a right of reimbursement subject to the requirements and limitations of [section 18] [not codified].

Section 18. Claims for and limitations on reimbursement. (1) After completion of the voluntary cleanup plan approved by the department, the applicant may apply to and must, in accordance with this section, receive reimbursement from the abandoned mines state special revenue account. Reimbursement must be subject to the following requirements and limitations:

(a) The applicant shall complete remediation prior to making a claim for reimbursement.

(b) The reimbursement may not exceed 90% of eligible costs up to a maximum of $300,000 per facility.

(c) The claim for reimbursement may not include legal fees or department costs incurred in the oversight of the voluntary cleanup plan.

(2) For purposes of this section, "eligible costs" means costs in excess of an applicant's proportionate share of total costs incurred in the remediation of the site during the 1996-97 biennium and the 1998-99 biennium [underlined language added by sec. 24, Ch. 415, L. 1997].

(3) If costs are reimbursed out of the abandoned mines state special revenue account, nothing in [sections 14 through 20] [not codified] prohibits the department from pursuing an action against other potentially liable parties to recover those costs.

(4) If the abandoned mines state special revenue account does not contain sufficient money to pay received claims for reimbursement, the abandoned mines state special revenue account and the department are not liable for making any reimbursement at that time. All claims are subject to appropriations to the abandoned mines state special revenue account.

Section 19. Abandoned mines state special revenue account created. (1) There is an abandoned mines state special revenue account within the state special revenue account fund established in 17-2-102.

(2) There must be paid into the abandoned mines state special revenue account money allocated from the metalliferous mines license tax pursuant to 15-37-117.

(3) Deposits to the abandoned mines state special revenue account must be placed in short-term investments. The interest on short-term investments must be deposited in the abandoned mines state special revenue account.

(4) The purpose of the abandoned mines state special revenue account is to provide the funding to the department of health and environmental sciences [now department of environmental quality] for the cleanup and reclamation of sites eligible for the pilot program in [sections 14 through 20] [not codified].

Section 20. Incorporation into study process — report to legislature. The department of health and environmental sciences [now department of environmental quality] and applicants participating in the pilot program shall submit reports to the 55th legislature detailing the success of and difficulties with the operation of the pilot program." Effective May 1, 1995.

2009 Amendment: Chapter 266 inserted (7)(b) allowing reimbursement of claims from a lead liable person upon completion and department approval of certain reports; deleted former (9)(c) through (9)(h) that read: "(c) The department shall consult with the noticed potentially liable persons regarding contractor selection and determination of the scope of the work for contract tasks. The department shall also provide the noticed potentially liable persons with contract performance updates and shall consult with the noticed potentially liable persons regarding expenses and progress on contract tasks.

(d) The department shall contract for the compilation, assessment, and summarization of the existing data pertaining to the complex described in subsection (9)(a), for recommendations for and conducting of additional investigations and studies necessary to develop remediation alternatives, and for development and assessment of remediation alternatives.

(e) Unless the department is delayed by a challenge to a contracting action, multiple contractor selection processes, or other unanticipated circumstances, the activities authorized under subsection (9)(a) must meet the following schedule:

(i) Contracts for investigations and studies must be in place by August 31, 2005.

(ii) A summary of existing data must be prepared by December 31, 2005.

(iii) The contract or contract task order for investigations, studies, and development and evaluation of final remediation alternatives must be in place by April 30, 2006.

(iv) All intended field work must be completed by November 30, 2006, and to the extent that this field work indicates that followup is necessary, the followup field work must be completed as soon as possible or addressed in the report that must be submitted pursuant to subsection (9)(g).

(v) The contractor shall submit evaluations of the extent of contamination by October 31, 2006.

(vi) The contractor shall submit final remediation alternatives by July 31, 2007.

(f) The department shall report to the environmental quality council quarterly during calendar years 2005, 2006, and 2007 regarding the progress being made to meet the requirements of subsection (9)(e). The report must include information on expenditures.

(g) If investigations completed under this subsection (9) indicate the need for additional information or for pilot tests and other related remedial action process activities, the department shall prepare a report identifying the rationale and estimated costs for additional work and present it to the environmental quality council during the spring of 2007.

(h) The department shall provide to the environmental quality council copies of investigations and reports completed pursuant to subsection (9)(d)"; in (10)(a) at beginning deleted "Beginning in the fiscal year that commences July 1, 2005"; deleted former (11) that read: "(11) For the biennium beginning July 1, 2007, the department shall transfer from the orphan share fund:

(a) $600,000 to the hazardous waste/CERCLA account provided for in 75-10-621 to provide for a positive account balance;

(b) $50,000 to the oil and gas production damage mitigation account pursuant to the conditions of 82-11-161 to provide for a positive account balance;

(c) $2 million to the environmental quality protection fund established in 75-10-704 to be used by the department to expedite the cleanup of the burlington northern Santa Fe Livingston site;

(d) $200,000 to the natural resources operations state special revenue account established in 15-38-301 to provide for a positive account balance; and

(e) $800,000 to the natural resources projects state special revenue account established in 15-38-302 to provide for a positive account balance"; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective October 1, 2009.

2007 Amendment: Chapter 432 in (1) in second sentence in exception clause substituted "subsections (9) and (10)" for "subsections (9) through (11)"; deleted former (2)(b) and (2)(c) that read: "(b) funds received from the interest income of the resource indemnity trust fund pursuant to 15-38-202;

(c) funds allocated from the resource indemnity and ground water assessment tax proceeds provided for in 15-38-106"; in (4) in exception clause inserted reference to subsection (6); in (5) at beginning inserted exception clause; inserted (6)(c) relating to reimbursement to state agencies for remedial action costs from orphan share fund; deleted former (9) that read: "(9) For the biennium beginning July 1, 2005, and subject to the provisions of section 3, Chapter 355, Laws of 2005, the department may transfer funds from the orphan share fund to the environmental quality protection fund established in 75-10-704, the hazardous waste/CERCLA account established in 75-10-621, or both. The total amount transferred pursuant to this subsection may not exceed $600,000"; inserted (11) relating to transfers from orphan share fund for biennium beginning July 1, 2007; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective July 1, 2007.

2005 Amendments — Composite Section: Chapter 278 in (1) in second sentence near end in exception clause inserted reference to subsection (11); inserted (11) relating to financing for the long-term or perpetual water treatment permanent trust fund provided for in 82-4-367; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective July 1, 2005.

Chapter 355 in (1) in second sentence after "appropriation and" inserted "except as provided in subsection (9)" and after "75-10-751 and" deleted "except as provided in subsection (10)"; deleted former (7) that read: "(7) If sufficient money remains in the orphan share fund on June 29, 2003, $999,000 must be transferred to the general fund"; in (9) near beginning after "July 1" substituted "2005" for "2003" and after "provisions of" substituted "section 3, Chapter 355, Laws of 2005" for "section 4, Chapter 199, Laws of 2003"; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective July 1, 2005.

Chapter 425 in (1) inserted reference to subsection (10); deleted former (7) that read: "(7) If sufficient money remains in the orphan share fund on June 29, 2003, $999,000 must be transferred to the general fund"; and inserted (10) authorizing use of funds for evaluating extent of contamination and formulating remediation alternatives for releases at Kalispell pole and timber, reliance refinery company, and Yale oil corporation facility complex; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective July 1, 2005.

Contingent Transfer of Orphan Share Funds — Appropriation: Section 3, Ch. 355, L. 2005, provided: "(1) Subject to the limitation in subsection (3), there is transferred from the orphan share account established in 75-10-743 to the environmental quality protection fund established in 75-10-704 an amount not to exceed $600,000 during the biennium beginning July 1, 2005, if the expenditures from the environmental quality fund exceed revenue available to the fund. The money transferred pursuant to this subsection may be appropriated to the department of environmental quality subject to the appropriation from the environmental quality protection fund in [House Bill No. 2]. The total expenditures in each fiscal year of the biennium may not exceed the appropriation made in [House Bill No. 2].

(2) Subject to the limitation in subsection (3), there is transferred from the orphan share account established in 75-10-743 to the hazardous waste/CERCLA special revenue account established in 75-10-621 an amount not to exceed $600,000 during the biennium beginning July 1, 2005, if the expenditures from the hazardous waste/CERCLA account exceed revenue available to the account. The money transferred pursuant to this subsection may be appropriated to the department of environmental quality subject to the appropriation from the hazardous waste/CERCLA account in [House Bill No. 2]. The total expenditures in each fiscal year of the biennium may not exceed the appropriation made in [House Bill No. 2].

(3) The total of the amounts transferred and appropriated pursuant to subsections (1) and (2) may not exceed $600,000."

2003 Amendments — Composite Section: Chapter 199 in (1) near end of second sentence after "75-10-751 and" inserted exception clause; in (7)(a) deleted former first sentence that read: "On August 21, 2002, $1,000 is transferred from the orphan share fund to the general fund"; in (7)(b) near middle after "2005" inserted reference to transfer pursuant to subsection (10) (amendment rendered void by Ch. 368 amendment); inserted (10) providing for fund transfers and limiting total amount transferred; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective July 1, 2003.

Chapter 368 deleted former (7)(b) that read: "(b) If any money remains in the orphan share fund after June 30, 2005, and after outstanding claims are paid, the money must be deposited in the general fund"; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective April 17, 2003.

Chapter 522 inserted (2)(d) relating to funds received from distribution of oil and natural gas production taxes; and in (7)(a) deleted former first sentence that read: "On August 21, 2002, $1,000 is transferred from the orphan share fund to the general fund"; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective April 26, 2003.

Contingent Appropriation of Orphan Share Funds: Section 4, Ch. 199, L. 2003, provided: "(1) Subject to the limitation in subsection (3), there is transferred from the orphan share account established in 75-10-743 to the environmental quality protection fund established in 75-10-704 an amount not to exceed $600,000 during the biennium beginning July 1, 2003, if the expenditures from the environmental quality fund exceed revenue available to the fund. The money transferred pursuant to this subsection may be appropriated to the department of environmental quality subject to the appropriation from the environmental quality protection fund in [House Bill No. 2] [Ch. 612, L. 2003]. The total expenditures in each fiscal year of the biennium may not exceed the appropriation made in [House Bill No. 2] [Ch. 612, L. 2003].

(2) Subject to the limitation in subsection (3), there is transferred from the orphan share account established in 75-10-743 to the hazardous waste/CERCLA special revenue account established in 75-10-621 an amount not to exceed $600,000 during the biennium beginning July 1, 2003, if the expenditures from the hazardous waste/CERCLA account exceed revenue available to the account. The money transferred pursuant to this subsection may be appropriated to the department of environmental quality subject to the appropriation from the hazardous waste/CERCLA account in [House Bill No. 2] [Ch. 612, L. 2003]. The total expenditures in each fiscal year of the biennium may not exceed the appropriation made in [House Bill No. 2] [Ch. 612, L. 2003].

(3) The total of the amounts transferred and appropriated pursuant to subsections (1) and (2) may not exceed $600,000."

Termination Provision Repealed: Section 2, Ch. 368, L. 2003, repealed sec. 30, Ch. 415, L. 1997, which terminated this section June 30, 2005. Effective April 17, 2003.

Saving Clause: Section 19, Ch. 522, L. 2003, was a saving clause.

Retroactive Applicability: Section 21, Ch. 522, L. 2003, provided: "[This act] applies retroactively, within the meaning of 1-2-109, to tax revenue derived from oil and natural gas production occurring after December 31, 2002."

2002 Amendment: Chapter 20 inserted (7)(a) concerning transfer from orphan share fund to general fund; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective August 21, 2002.

2001 Amendment: Chapter 460 deleted former (2)(a) that read: "(a) money allocated from the metalliferous mines license tax pursuant to 15-37-117"; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective July 1, 2002.

1999 Amendment: Chapter 51 in (2)(e) at end deleted "provided in section 19, Chapter 584, Laws of 1995, as of [the termination date of section 19, Chapter 584, Laws of 1995, as may be amended]". Amendment effective March 15, 1999.

Preamble: The preamble attached to Ch. 415, L. 1997, provided: "WHEREAS, the 1995 Legislature, in Chapter 584, Laws of 1995, directed the Department of Environmental Quality to institute a collaborative process involving all affected and interested persons to analyze the elimination of joint and several liability with respect to the cleanup of state Comprehensive

Environmental Cleanup and Responsibility Act (CECRA) facilities and to submit any legislative proposals that collaboratively resulted from that process to the 55th Legislature; and

WHEREAS, the Department instituted this collaborative process with industry and business representatives; state, federal, and local government representatives; and public interest and environmental interest group representatives; and

WHEREAS, through a contract with the Department, the Montana Consensus Council designed the study process, facilitated the organization of the collaborative process, and conducted the numerous meetings of the study committees and interest group caucuses through which the parties to the collaborative process reached consensus on legislative proposals that are contained in this bill."

1991 Statement of Intent: The statement of intent attached to Ch. 222, L. 1991, provided: "A statement of intent is required for this bill because the department of health and environmental sciences [now department of environmental quality] will need to promulgate rules in order to implement this bill. It is the intent of the legislature that these regulations reflect an emphasis on integrated waste management and achieving the 25% waste reduction goal by 1996. In addition, the regulations must be designed to protect the public health, safety, and welfare and the environment. It is also the intent of the legislature that state government assume a leadership role in the development and implementation of source reduction and recycling programs and in the establishment of markets for the purchase and use of recyclable materials."

75-10-1006. Generation licensing and regulation — rulemaking authority.

Compiler's Comments

2007 Amendment: Chapter 97 in (1) at beginning after "A" inserted "person that is required to obtain a license from a" and after "state" inserted "to operate a health care facility, as defined in 50-5-101, or to engage in a profession or occupation"; inserted (1)(a) prohibiting generation, storage, and transportation of infectious waste from the point of generation to an intermediate point without a license; in (1)(b) substituted "shall comply with the rules adopted under this part by the board or department responsible for licensing that person" for "that licenses a profession, occupation, or health care facility that generates infectious waste shall require each licensee to comply with this part as a condition of licensure"; in (2) in introductory clause after "department" inserted "of the state that issues a license to a person that generates infectious waste"; in (2)(a) after "part" inserted "governing the following activities by a licensee:

(i) generation of infectious waste;

(ii) storage of infectious waste at a place where infectious waste is generated;

(iii) transportation of infectious waste from the place of generation to an intermediate point"; deleted former (2) that read: "(2) A profession, occupation, or health care facility that generates or transports infectious waste or that operates treatment, storage, or disposal facilities regulated by this part that is not already licensed by a board or department under subsection (1) must obtain a permit annually from the department. The department shall adopt rules to implement this part and may establish an annual fee commensurate with the costs of regulation. Fees collected under the provisions of this part must be deposited in the solid waste management account established in 75-10-117"; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective October 1, 2007.

1991 Statement of Intent: The statement of intent attached to Ch. 483, L. 1991, provided: "A statement of intent is required for this bill because [section 6] [75-10-1006] grants rulemaking authority to the department of health and environmental sciences [now department of environmental quality] and to professional licensing boards. It is the intent of the legislature that these regulations be designed to protect the public health, safety, and welfare and the environment and that they be developed in consideration of the needs of Montana's medical service community and with the best current technical information.

It is also the intent of the legislature that [sections 1 through 6] [75-10-1001 through 75-10-1006] be implemented with minimum fiscal impact. The department and professional licensing boards shall ensure compliance with [sections 1 through 6] [75-10-1001 through 75-10-1006] through the course of normal inspections, the existing licensing process, and the investigation of complaints. The department and professional licensing boards may impose and adjust annual fees commensurate with the costs of regulation and inspection."

Case Notes

Failure to Raise Purely Legal Question to District Court — Argument Not Considered on Appeal: A family sued Lewis and Clark County for negligence after learning the county had not reported to the health department that their home was a former meth lab as required by 75-10-1306. At the end of a 3-day trial, a jury awarded the family over a half million dollars. The county appealed, arguing that it did not have a duty to report under 75-10-1306. On appeal, the Supreme Court noted that the county had neither filed any pretrial motions on the question of duty nor sought a motion for judgment as a matter of law. Because the county had failed to raise to the trial court the purely legal question of whether a duty existed under the statute, the Supreme Court would not consider the issue on appeal, and affirmed. Slack v. The Landmark Co., 2011 MT 292, 362 Mont. 514, 267 P.3d 6.

Part Compiler's Comments

Preamble: The preamble attached to Ch. 296, L. 2009, provided: "WHEREAS, mercury that is released into the atmosphere can be transported long distances and deposited in aquatic ecosystems where it is methylated to methylmercury, the organic and most toxic form of mercury; and

WHEREAS, mercury-added thermostats represent the largest amount of mercury in ordinary household products; and

WHEREAS, a single mercury-added thermostat contains 3 to 5 grams of mercury; and

WHEREAS, according to the U.S. Environmental Protection Agency's 2002 estimates, each year about 6 to 8 tons of mercury from discarded thermostats end up in solid waste facilities and between 1 and 2 tons are released into the air; and

WHEREAS, according to a 2004 study by the U.S. Environmental Protection Agency, more than 10% of the estimated mercury reservoir still currently in use in the United States resides in mercury-added thermostats; and

WHEREAS, methylmercury bioaccumulates and biomagnifies in animals, including fish and humans; and

WHEREAS, according to the Montana Department of Public Health and Human Services, mercury has been found in fish in at least 28 water bodies in Montana, including Canyon Ferry Reservoir, Cooney Reservoir, Flathead Lake, Fort Peck Reservoir, Hebgen Lake, Lake Koocanusa, Seeley Lake, Swan Lake, Tongue River Reservoir, and Whitefish Lake; and

WHEREAS, methylmercury is a known neurotoxin to which the human fetus is very sensitive; and

WHEREAS, the federal Centers for Disease Control and Prevention estimate that between 300,000 and 630,000 infants are born in the United States each year with mercury levels that are associated, at later ages, with the loss of IQ; and

WHEREAS, new evidence indicates that methylmercury exposure may increase the risk of cardiovascular disease in humans, especially adult men; and

WHEREAS, decreases in local and regional sources of mercury emissions have been shown to lead to decreases in mercury levels in fish and wildlife; and

WHEREAS, in 1998, thermostat makers General Electric, Honeywell, and White-Rodgers established the Thermostat Recycling Corporation to implement a program for collecting used mercury-added thermostats under which thermostat wholesalers and contractors, as well as household hazardous waste facilities, volunteer to collect thermostats from heating, ventilating, and air-conditioning contractors and the general public."

Compiler's Comments

2003 Amendment: Chapter 361 inserted (1) relating to constitutional obligations and legislative intent; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective April 16, 2003.

Preamble: The preamble attached to Ch. 361, L. 2003, provided: "WHEREAS, Article II, section 3, of the Montana Constitution enumerates certain inalienable individual rights, including the right to a clean and healthful environment, the right of pursuing life's basic necessities, the right of enjoying and defending an individual's life and liberty, the right of acquiring, possessing, and protecting property, and the right of seeking individual safety, health, and happiness in all lawful ways; and

WHEREAS, the constitutionally enumerated rights are by their very nature bound to result in competing interests in specific fact situations; and

WHEREAS, Article IX, section 1, of the Montana Constitution provides that the state and each person shall maintain and improve a clean and healthful environment in Montana for present and future generations and directs the Legislature to provide for the administration and enforcement of this duty and also directs the Legislature to provide adequate remedies for the protection of the environmental life support system from degradation and to provide adequate remedies to prevent unreasonable depletion and degradation of natural resources; and

WHEREAS, the Legislature has reviewed the intent of the framers of the 1972 Montana Constitution as evidenced in the verbatim transcripts of the constitutional convention; and

WHEREAS, there is no indication that one enumerated inalienable right is intended to supersede other inalienable rights, including the right to use property in all lawful means; and

WHEREAS, the Legislature, mindful of its constitutional obligation to provide for the administration and enforcement of the constitution, has enacted a comprehensive set of laws to accomplish the goals of the constitution, including the Montana Clean Indoor Air Act of 1979, Title 50, chapter 40, part 1, MCA; the Montana Environmental Policy Act, Title 75, chapter 1, parts 1 through 3, MCA; the Clean Air Act of Montana, Title 75, chapter 2, parts 1 through 4,

MCA; water quality laws, Title 75, chapter 5, MCA; The Natural Streambed and Land Preservation Act of 1975, Title 75, chapter 7, part 1, MCA; The Montana Solid Waste Management Act, Title 75, chapter 10, part 2, MCA; The Montana Hazardous Waste Act, Title 75, chapter 10, part 4, MCA; the Comprehensive Environmental Cleanup and Responsibility Act, Title 75, chapter 10, part 7, MCA; the Montana Megalandfill Siting Act, sections 75-10-901 through 75-10-945, MCA; the Montana Underground Storage Tank Installer and Inspector Licensing and Permitting Act, Title 75, chapter 11, part 2, MCA; the Montana Underground Storage Tank Act, Title 75, chapter 11, part 5, MCA; the Montana Major Facility Siting Act, Title 75, chapter 20, MCA; the Open-Space Land and Voluntary Conservation Easement Act, Title 76, chapter 6, MCA; the Environmental Control Easement Act, Title 76, chapter 7, MCA; The Strip and Underground Mine Siting Act, Title 82, chapter 4, part 1, MCA; The Montana Strip and Underground Mine Reclamation Act, Title 82, chapter 4, part 2, MCA; The Opencut Mining Act, Title 82, chapter 4, part 4, MCA; and The Nongame and Endangered Species Conservation Act, Title 87, chapter 5, part 1, MCA."

Severability: Section 39, Ch. 361, L. 2003, was a severability clause.

Retroactive Applicability: Section 41, Ch. 361, L. 2003, provided: "[This act] applies retroactively, within the meaning of 1-2-109, to actions for judicial review or other causes of action challenging the issuance of a permit, petition for review, amendment, license, arbitration, action, certificate, or inspection that are pending but not yet decided on or after [the effective date of this act]." Effective April 16, 2003.

1999 Amendment: Chapter 506 in third sentence in (1) after "closure" inserted "and inspection"; near end of (2) after "to" substituted "provide for" for "assess fees to support state and local administration of"; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective April 28, 1999.

1993 Amendment: Chapter 200 in (1) and (2) substituted "tank systems" for "tanks". Amendment effective March 26, 1993.

Applicability: Section 13, Ch. 200, L. 1993, provided: "[This act] applies to installations, closures, and all other activities described in Title 75, chapter 11, part 2, that require either a permit or a license beginning on October 1, 1993."

Effective Date: Section 21(3), Ch. 594, L. 1989, provided that this section is effective April 1, 1990.

75-11-203. Definitions.

Compiler's Comments

1999 Amendment: Chapter 506 inserted definitions of inspection, inspector, and licensed inspector; in definition of license after "under" inserted "75-11-204 or", before "installation" inserted "inspection", and after "systems" deleted "and the installation of leak detection devices or cathodic protection systems"; in definition of underground storage tank after "includes" substituted "ancillary equipment designed to prevent, detect, or contain a release from" for "a leak detection device that is external to and not attached to"; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective April 28, 1999.

1997 Amendment: Chapter 112 in definitions of regulated substance and underground storage tank substituted "75-11-503" for "75-10-403".

Saving Clause: Section 38(1), Ch. 112, L. 1997, was a saving clause.

1995 Amendments — Composite Section: Chapter 418 in definition of Board substituted "board of environmental review provided for in 2-15-3502" for "board of health and environmental sciences provided for in 2-15-2104"; and in definition of Department substituted "department of environmental quality provided for in 2-15-3501" for "department of health and environmental sciences provided for in Title 2, chapter 15, part 21". Amendment effective July 1, 1995.

Chapter 546 deleted definition of Board that read: ""Board" means the board of health and environmental sciences provided for in 2-15-2104"; pursuant to sec. 568, Ch. 546, L. 1995, a coordination section, in definition of Department the Code Commissioner substituted "department of environmental quality" for "department of health and environmental sciences"; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective July 1, 1995.

Because Ch. 418 inserted a reference to the Board of Environmental Review and Ch. 546 deleted a reference to the Board of Health and Environmental Sciences, the codifier has reflected both the insertion and the deletion.

Transition: Section 499, Ch. 418, L. 1995, provided: "The provisions of 2-15-131 through 2-15-137 apply to [this act]."

Saving Clauses: Section 503, Ch. 418, L. 1995, was a saving clause.

Section 571, Ch. 546, L. 1995, was a saving clause.

1993 Amendment: Chapter 200 throughout section substituted "tank system" or "tank systems" for "tank" or "tanks"; in definition of installation inserted last sentence regarding leak detection devices and deleted from the definition former (4)(b)(ii) and (4)(b)(iii) that read: "(ii) the installation of a leak detection device that is external to and not attached to the underground storage tank; or (iii) the installation and maintenance of a cathodic protection system"; in definition of installer substituted "installs or closes" for "is engaged in the business of installation or closure of"; in definition of license inserted last phrase regarding leak detection devices and cathodic systems; in definition of underground storage tank inserted "or "underground storage tank system"" and last phrase referring to external leak detection devices; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective March 26, 1993.

Applicability: Section 13, Ch. 200, L. 1993, provided: "[This act] applies to installations, closures, and all other activities described in Title 75, chapter 11, part 2, that require either a permit or a license beginning on October 1, 1993."

Effective Date: Section 21(3), Ch. 594, L. 1989, provided that this section is effective April 1, 1990.

75-11-204. Rulemaking authority.

Compiler's Comments

1999 Amendment: Chapter 506 at end of first sentence in (1) inserted "and rules providing for the inspection of underground storage tank systems"; at end of first sentence in (1)(b), (1)(c), and (1)(e) inserted "and inspectors"; inserted second sentence in (1)(b) requiring separate licenses for inspectors and installers; inserted second sentence in (1)(d) requiring adoption of separate qualifications for installers and inspectors; inserted (2) exempting licensed inspectors employed by designated local government unit from licensing fees; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective April 28, 1999.

1993 Amendment: Chapter 200 throughout section substituted "tank system" or "tank systems" for "tank" or "tanks". Amendment effective March 26, 1993.

1993 Statement of Intent: The statement of intent attached to Ch. 200, L. 1993, provided: "A statement of intent is required for this bill because the bill gives the department of health and environmental sciences [now department of environmental quality] authority to adopt rules for all components of underground tank systems and because it delegates authority to the department to license persons who install, repair, or modify leak detection devices that are external to and not attached to underground storage tank systems, including persons who install, repair, or modify cathodic protection systems. The legislature intends that the department use this authority to require compliance with the department's rules for the proper installation and management of all components of underground storage tank systems.

The definition of underground storage tank is expanded to include the word "system", which will serve to make it clearer to the regulated community that all parts of underground storage tank systems, including piping, are subject to regulation.

The legislature intends to require licensed workers for installation, repair, modification, and closure work performed on all components of underground storage tank systems. The legislature also intends to extend the permitting requirements to all individuals who perform installation, repair, or modification of underground storage tank systems and to not limit compliance responsibility solely to owners and operators."

Applicability: Section 13, Ch. 200, L. 1993, provided: "[This act] applies to installations, closures, and all other activities described in Title 75, chapter 11, part 2, that require either a permit or a license beginning on October 1, 1993."

Effective Date: Section 21(1), Ch. 594, L. 1989, provided that this section is effective April 20, 1989.

Part 3
Petroleum Storage Tank Cleanup

Part Compiler's Comments

1989 Statement of Intent: The statement of intent attached to Ch. 528, L. 1989, provided:

"(1) It is the intent of the legislature that the petroleum tank release compensation board enact rules that:

(a) govern submission of claims by owners or operators to the department and board;

(b) provide procedures for determining owners or operators who are eligible for reimbursement and determining the validity of claims;

(c) provide procedures for the review and approval of corrective action plans;

(d) provide procedures for conducting board meetings, hearings, and other business that are necessary for the implementation of [sections 1 through 7 and 9 through 12] [Title 75, chapter 11, part 3]; and

(e) are necessary for the administration of [sections 1 through 7 and 9 through 12] [Title 75, chapter 11, part 3], provided that the rules do not alter or conflict with the eligibility requirements and procedures provided in [sections 1 through 7 and 9 through 12] [Title 75, chapter 11, part 3] or with the laws, rules, or procedures of the federal government or the department of health and environmental sciences [now department of environmental quality] that govern releases from petroleum storage tanks.

(2) The department of health and environmental sciences [now department of environmental quality] may adopt rules necessary to administer its responsibilities under [sections 1 through 7 and 9 through 12] [Title 75, chapter 11, part 3], including requirements for approval of corrective action plans.

(3) The department of revenue [function now transferred to department of transportation] shall adopt rules governing the collection of the petroleum storage tank cleanup fee provided for in [section 7] [75-11-314]. The rules may include reporting and recordkeeping requirements, method and timing of payment, examination of records, and other provisions necessary to ensure that fees are properly and efficiently collected. The rules must be generally consistent with procedures governing the collection of the gasoline license tax provided for in Title 15, chapter 70, so that gasoline distributors experience minimum additional requirements or responsibilities."

2003 Amendment: Chapter 361 inserted (1) relating to constitutional obligations and legislative intent; at end of (5) deleted former last sentence that read: "The fee is intended to implement the legislature's duty to provide for the administration and enforcement of maintaining and improving a clean and healthful environment for present and future generations, as required by Article IX, section 1, of the Montana constitution"; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective April 16, 2003.

Preamble: The preamble attached to Ch. 361, L. 2003, provided: "WHEREAS, Article II, section 3, of the Montana Constitution enumerates certain inalienable individual rights, including the right to a clean and healthful environment, the right of pursuing life's basic necessities, the right of enjoying and defending an individual's life and liberty, the right of acquiring, possessing, and protecting property, and the right of seeking individual safety, health, and happiness in all lawful ways; and

WHEREAS, the constitutionally enumerated rights are by their very nature bound to result in competing interests in specific fact situations; and

WHEREAS, Article IX, section 1, of the Montana Constitution provides that the state and each person shall maintain and improve a clean and healthful environment in Montana for present and future generations and directs the Legislature to provide for the administration and enforcement of this duty and also directs the Legislature to provide adequate remedies for the protection of the environmental life support system from degradation and to provide adequate remedies to prevent unreasonable depletion and degradation of natural resources; and

WHEREAS, the Legislature has reviewed the intent of the framers of the 1972 Montana Constitution as evidenced in the verbatim transcripts of the constitutional convention; and

WHEREAS, there is no indication that one enumerated inalienable right is intended to supersede other inalienable rights, including the right to use property in all lawful means; and

WHEREAS, the Legislature, mindful of its constitutional obligation to provide for the administration and enforcement of the constitution, has enacted a comprehensive set of laws to accomplish the goals of the constitution, including the Montana Clean Indoor Air Act of 1979, Title 50, chapter 40, part 1, MCA; the Montana Environmental Policy Act, Title 75, chapter 1, parts 1 through 3, MCA; the Clean Air Act of Montana, Title 75, chapter 2, parts 1 through 4, MCA; water quality laws, Title 75, chapter 5, MCA; The Natural Streambed and Land Preservation Act of 1975, Title 75, chapter 7, part 1, MCA; The Montana Solid Waste Management Act, Title 75, chapter 10, part 2, MCA; The Montana Hazardous Waste Act, Title 75, chapter 10, part 4, MCA; the Comprehensive Environmental Cleanup and Responsibility Act, Title 75, chapter 10, part 7, MCA; the Montana Megalandfill Siting Act, sections 75-10-901 through 75-10-945, MCA; the Montana Underground Storage Tank Installer and Inspector Licensing and Permitting Act, Title 75, chapter 11, part 2, MCA; the Montana Underground Storage Tank Act, Title 75, chapter 11, part 5, MCA; the Montana Major Facility Siting Act, Title 75, chapter 20, MCA; the Open-Space Land and Voluntary Conservation Easement Act, Title 76, chapter 6, MCA; the Environmental Control Easement Act, Title 76, chapter 7, MCA; The Strip and Underground Mine Siting Act, Title 82, chapter 4, part 1, MCA; The Montana Strip and Underground Mine Reclamation Act, Title 82, chapter 4, part 2, MCA; The Opencut Mining Act, Title 82, chapter 4, part 4, MCA; and The Nongame and Endangered Species Conservation Act, Title 87, chapter 5, part 1, MCA."

Severability: Section 39, Ch. 361, L. 2003, was a severability clause.

Retroactive Applicability: Section 41, Ch. 361, L. 2003, provided: "[This act] applies retroactively, within the meaning of 1-2-109, to actions for judicial review or other causes of action challenging the issuance of a permit, petition for review, amendment, license, arbitration, action, certificate, or inspection that are pending but not yet decided on or after [the effective date of this act]." Effective April 16, 2003.

1993 Amendment: Chapter 339 inserted (5)(d) regarding incentives to improve tank facilities and minimize accidental releases. Amendment effective April 13, 1993.

Preamble: The preamble attached to Ch. 339, L. 1993, provided: "WHEREAS, the 1993 Legislature found that petroleum storage tanks and associated pipes connected to petroleum storage tanks must be regulated in order to protect public health and safety, the health of living organisms, and the environment; and

WHEREAS, the Department of Health and Environmental Sciences [now Department of Environmental Quality] adopted rules in 1989 that included design and construction requirements for petroleum storage tanks and associated pipes; and

WHEREAS, double-walled construction of petroleum storage tanks and associated pipes should be encouraged because it provides superior prevention of releases of regulated substances to the environment over the operational life of a petroleum storage tank system as well as superior containment of regulated substances that are released from the interior vessel until the substances can be detected and removed."

Applicability: Section 6, Ch. 339, L. 1993, provided: "[This act] applies to releases discovered on or after October 1, 1993, from properly designed and installed double-walled petroleum storage tank systems."

1991 Amendment: In (5)(c), after "assist", inserted "certain". Amendment effective May 15, 1991.

1991 Statement of Intent: The statement of intent attached to Ch. 763, L. 1991, provided: "A statement of intent is required for this bill in order to provide guidance to the petroleum tank release compensation board, the department of health and environmental sciences [now department of environmental quality], and the department of revenue for the adoption of rules authorized by the bill. The petroleum tank release compensation board shall adopt rules that:

(1) govern submission of claims from owners and operators to the board and to the department of health and environmental sciences [now department of environmental quality] for reimbursement from the petroleum tank release cleanup fund;

(2) establish procedures for determining eligibility of tank owners and operators for reimbursement from the petroleum tank release cleanup fund and the validity of claims; and

(3) are necessary for administration of the petroleum tank release cleanup fund and other provisions of this bill, provided that the rules may not conflict with the eligibility requirements and procedures provided for in this bill and Title 75, chapter 11, part 3; rules previously adopted under that part; and laws, rules, and procedures of the federal government or the department of health and environmental sciences [now department of environmental quality] pertaining to petroleum storage tank releases eligible for reimbursement from the petroleum tank release cleanup fund.

The department of health and environmental sciences [now department of environmental quality] may adopt rules or revise existing rules as necessary to implement and incorporate the provisions of this bill into the department's existing procedures and its requirements pertaining to releases from underground storage tanks.

The department of revenue shall adopt rules governing the collection of the petroleum storage tank cleanup fee, including reporting and recordkeeping requirements, the method and timing of payments from distributors, examination of records, and other provisions necessary to ensure that the petroleum storage tank cleanup fee is properly and efficiently collected."

Severability: Section 6, Ch. 763, L. 1991, was a severability clause.

Effective Date: Section 16, Ch. 528, L. 1989, provided that this section is effective April 13, 1989.

Case Notes

Authority of Petroleum Tank Release Compensation Board to Require Subrogation: This chapter provides the Montana Petroleum Tank Release Compensation Board with authority to seek reimbursement of corrective action expenses through subrogation, and by virtue of the right to statutory subrogation and pursuant to 75-11-318, the Board is authorized to adopt an administrative rule requiring tank owners to subrogate their claims against insurers. Mont. Petroleum Tank Release Comp. Bd. v. Crumleys, Inc., 2008 MT 2, 341 M 33, 174 P3d 948 (2008).

Petroleum Release From Underground Disconnected Pipes — Eligibility for Cleanup Reimbursement — Portion of Administrative Rule Invalid: The former Department of Health and Environmental Sciences notified Safeway that its property had been identified as a source of petroleum contamination in the area where Safeway had previously removed some underground storage tanks and ordered Safeway to clean up the site pursuant to ARM 16.45.601 (renumbered ARM 17.56.601). Safeway discovered that the leakage was coming from pipes that were left underground during the tank removal. Safeway subsequently submitted to the Petroleum Tank Release Compensation Board an eligibility checklist and application for voluntary registration for reimbursement for costs of cleaning up the leak. The Board denied the request because the tank had been removed prior to the release detection and because ARM 16.47.314 (renumbered ARM 17.58.312) required that the tank be in place when the release was discovered. The District Court held, and the Supreme Court affirmed, that the portion of ARM 16.47.314(1) (renumbered ARM 17.58.312(1)) that added additional requirements to the cleanup statutes was invalid and that Safeway should be compensated for cleanup costs. The Supreme Court analyzed the definition of underground storage tank in determining that nothing in the statutory language of 75-10-403 (before 1997 amendment) required that the underground storage tank itself must be in place on the date on which a petroleum release is discovered. The court also examined whether it is permissible and fair for two state entities, the Department and the Board, to use one statutory definition to reach two opposite conclusions. Despite the fact that the Department and Board are separate entities and the petroleum release cleanup statutes are separate from the reimbursement statutes, Safeway was entitled to be treated uniformly by both entities. The Department treated Safeway as the tank owner for cleanup requirements, and the Board was required to also treat Safeway as the tank owner for reimbursement purposes. Safeway, Inc. v. Mont. Petroleum Release Comp. Bd., 281 M 189, 931 P2d 1327, 54 St. Rep. 129 (1997).

Attorney General's Opinions

Loss of Reimbursement Eligibility When Tank No Longer Complies With Applicable Law: The plain language of 75-11-308(1)(e) renders ineligible for reimbursement any owner or operator whose tank falls out of compliance with applicable state and federal laws and rules, and eligibility is not restored even if the tank is subsequently brought back into compliance with applicable law. The statutory use of the phrase "remained in compliance" requires that a tank be in an ongoing state of compliance in order for it to be eligible for reimbursement. 48 A.G. Op. 9 (2000).

75-11-302. Definitions.

Compiler's Comments

2009 Amendment: Chapter 396 deleted definition of double-walled tank system that read: ""Double-walled tank system" means a petroleum storage tank and associated product piping that is designed and constructed with rigid inner and outer walls separated by an interstitial space and that is capable of being monitored for leakage. The design and construction of these tank systems must meet standards of the department and the department of justice fire prevention and investigation bureau. The material used in construction must be compatible with the liquid to be stored in the system, and the system must be designed to prevent the release of any stored liquid"; inserted definition of properly designed and installed double-walled tank system; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective October 1, 2009.

2007 Amendment: Chapter 100 in definition of distributor in (f) substituted "ethanol" for "alcohol"; and in definition of petroleum near middle after "such as" substituted "ethanol-blended gasoline" for "gasohol". Amendment effective March 30, 2007.

2003 Amendment: Chapter 114 in definition of aviation gasoline substituted "aviation fuel" for "aviation gasoline"; and in definition of "owner" in (b) after "interest in a" inserted "storage". Amendment effective October 1, 2003.

1999 Amendment: Chapter 420 in definition of owner inserted (a)(ii) expanding definition to include person that owns property on which petroleum storage tank from which release occurred was located; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective April 23, 1999.

Saving Clause: Section 3, Ch. 420, L. 1999, was a saving clause.

1997 Amendment: Chapter 112 in definition of petroleum storage tank, in (a), substituted "75-11-503" for "75-10-403".

Saving Clause: Section 38(1), Ch. 112, L. 1997, was a saving clause.

1995 Amendment: Chapter 418 in definition of Department substituted "department of environmental quality provided for in 2-15-3501" for "department of health and environmental sciences provided for in Title 2, chapter 15, part 21"; adjusted subsection references; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective July 1, 1995.

Transition: Section 499, Ch. 418, L. 1995, provided: "The provisions of 2-15-131 through 2-15-137 apply to [this act]."

Saving Clause: Section 503, Ch. 418, L. 1995, was a saving clause.

1993 Amendments: Chapter 298 at beginning inserted exception clause; inserted definitions of aviation gasoline, export, exporter, heating oil, import, and special fuel; substituted definition of distributor for former definition that read: ""Distributor" means a distributor as defined in 15-70-201"; in definition of petroleum storage tank, in (d), substituted "subsections (22)(b) and (22)(c)" for "subsections (16)(b) and (16)(c)" and in (d)(iii) substituted "subsections (22)(d)(i) and (22)(d)(ii)" for "subsections (16)(d)(i) and (16)(d)(ii)"; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective July 1, 1993.

Chapter 339 inserted definition of double-walled tank system; in definition of petroleum storage tank, in (d), substituted "subsections (22)(b) and (22)(c)" for "subsections (16)(b) and (16)(c)" and in (d)(iii) substituted "subsections (22)(d)(i) and (22)(d)(ii)" for "subsections (16)(d)(i) and (16)(d)(ii)"; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective April 13, 1993.

Preamble: The preamble attached to Ch. 339, L. 1993, provided: "WHEREAS, the 1993 Legislature found that petroleum storage tanks and associated pipes connected to petroleum storage tanks must be regulated in order to protect public health and safety, the health of living organisms, and the environment; and

WHEREAS, the Department of Health and Environmental Sciences [now Department of Environmental Quality] adopted rules in 1989 that included design and construction requirements for petroleum storage tanks and associated pipes; and

WHEREAS, double-walled construction of petroleum storage tanks and associated pipes should be encouraged because it provides superior prevention of releases of regulated substances to the environment over the operational life of a petroleum storage tank system as well as superior containment of regulated substances that are released from the interior vessel until the substances can be detected and removed."

1993 Statement of Intent: The statement of intent attached to Ch. 339, L. 1993, provided: "A statement of intent is required for this bill to provide guidance to the department of health and environmental sciences [now department of environmental quality] concerning the adoption of rules to govern double-walled petroleum storage tank systems as defined in 75-11-302(8) [now 75-11-302(9)]. Double-walled construction is to be encouraged because it provides superior prevention of releases of regulated substances to the environment over the operational life of a petroleum storage tank system as well as superior containment of regulated substances that are released from the interior vessel until the substances can be detected and removed. The department is directed to adopt rules that specify the types of materials or combination of materials that must be used to appropriately construct double-walled tank systems and that specify necessary design, construction, and installation techniques."

Effective Date — Applicability: Section 3, Ch. 298, L. 1993, provided: "[This act] is effective July 1, 1993, and applies to all tax revenue recorded on or after July 1, 1993."

Applicability: Section 6, Ch. 339, L. 1993, provided: "[This act] applies to releases discovered on or after October 1, 1993, from properly designed and installed double-walled petroleum storage tank systems."

1991 Amendments: Chapter 389 in definition of petroleum, at end, inserted reference to motor fuel blend; in definition of petroleum storage tank, near beginning after "contains", inserted "or contained" and in (b) substituted "drift" for "draft"; and in definition of release, near beginning after "means", substituted "any spilling, leaking, emitting, discharging, escaping, leaching, or disposing" for "a release, as defined in 75-10-701" and after "tank" inserted "into ground water, surface water, surface soils, or subsurface soils". Amendment effective July 1, 1991.

Chapter 763 in definition of gasoline inserted second sentence excluding JP-4 jet fuel sold to the federal defense fuel supply center. Amendment effective May 15, 1991.

Saving Clause: Section 5, Ch. 389, L. 1991, provided: "Nothing in [this act] applies to alter a claim for reimbursement that was filed before [the effective date of this act] or that arose pursuant to a corrective action plan approved by the department before [the effective date of this act]." Effective July 1, 1991.

1991 Statement of Intent: The statement of intent attached to Ch. 763, L. 1991, provided: "A statement of intent is required for this bill in order to provide guidance to the petroleum tank release compensation board, the department of health and environmental sciences [now department of environmental quality], and the department of revenue for the adoption of rules authorized by the bill. The petroleum tank release compensation board shall adopt rules that:

(1) govern submission of claims from owners and operators to the board and to the department of health and environmental sciences [now department of environmental quality] for reimbursement from the petroleum tank release cleanup fund;

(2) establish procedures for determining eligibility of tank owners and operators for reimbursement from the petroleum tank release cleanup fund and the validity of claims; and

(3) are necessary for administration of the petroleum tank release cleanup fund and other provisions of this bill, provided that the rules may not conflict with the eligibility requirements and procedures provided for in this bill and Title 75, chapter 11, part 3; rules previously adopted under that part; and laws, rules, and procedures of the federal government or the department of health and environmental sciences [now department of environmental quality] pertaining to petroleum storage tank releases eligible for reimbursement from the petroleum tank release cleanup fund.

The department of health and environmental sciences [now department of environmental quality] may adopt rules or revise existing rules as necessary to implement and incorporate the provisions of this bill into the department's existing procedures and its requirements pertaining to releases from underground storage tanks.

The department of revenue shall adopt rules governing the collection of the petroleum storage tank cleanup fee, including reporting and recordkeeping requirements, the method and timing of payments from distributors, examination of records, and other provisions necessary to ensure that the petroleum storage tank cleanup fee is properly and efficiently collected."

Severability: Section 6, Ch. 763, L. 1991, was a severability clause.

Effective Date: Section 16, Ch. 528, L. 1989, provided that this section is effective April 13, 1989.

75-11-307. Reimbursement for expenses caused by release.

Compiler's Comments

2011 Amendment: Chapter 189 inserted (1)(a)(ii) regarding establishment of petroleum mixing zone; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective April 15, 2011.

2009 Amendment: Chapter 396 inserted (2)(h) prohibiting reimbursement of expenses to an owner or operator who has received reimbursement; in (4)(a) near beginning before "fund" deleted "petroleum tank release cleanup"; deleted former (4)(a)(i) that read: "(i) 50% of the first $10,000 of eligible costs and 100% of subsequent eligible costs, up to a maximum total reimbursement of $495,000:

(A) for single-walled tank system releases; and

(B) for double-walled tank system releases for which the release date was prior to October 1, 1993"; in (4)(a)(i) before "releases" deleted "accidental" and at end inserted "and before October 1, 2009"; inserted (4)(a)(ii) concerning total of eligible costs and maximum reimbursement; in (4)(b) near beginning before "fund" deleted "petroleum tank release cleanup"; deleted former (4)(b)(i) that read: "(i) 50% of the first $35,000 of eligible costs and 100% of subsequent eligible costs, up to a maximum total reimbursement of $982,500:

(A) for single-walled tank system releases; and

(B) for double-walled tank system releases for which the release date was prior to October 1, 1993"; in (4)(b)(i) before "releases" deleted "accidental" and at end inserted "and before October 1, 2009"; inserted (4)(b)(ii) concerning total of eligible costs and maximum reimbursement; inserted (5) concerning eligible costs paid or reimbursed by the insurer; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective October 1, 2009.

Applicability: Section 5, Ch. 396, L. 2009, provided "[Section 2(5)(a) and (5)(c)] [75-11-307(5)(a) and (5)(c)] apply to requests for reimbursement submitted to the petroleum tank release cleanup fund after [the effective date of this act]." Effective October 1, 2009.

2003 Amendments — Composite Section: Chapters 137 and 245 in (2)(h) near middle of first sentence substituted "5 years" for "2 years" and inserted third, fourth, and fifth sentences relating to suspension of the limitation period; and made minor changes in style. Chapter 137 amendment effective March 26, 2003, and Ch. 245 amendment effective October 1, 2003.

Saving Clause: Section 5, Ch. 137, L. 2003, was a saving clause.

Section 8, Ch. 245, L. 2003, was a saving clause.

Applicability: Section 7, Ch. 137, L. 2003, provided: "[Section 1] [75-11-307] applies to all claims for reimbursement of expenses on file with the department of environmental quality on [the effective date of this act]." Effective March 26, 2003.

Section 9, Ch. 245, L. 2003, provided that the amendments to this section apply "to all claims for reimbursement of expenses on file with the department of environmental quality on [the effective date of this act]". Effective October 1, 2003.

1997 Amendment: Chapter 115 in (1)(a), after "costs", inserted remainder of subsection concerning corrective action plan; in (1)(b) inserted second sentence concerning corrective action plan; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective July 1, 1997.

1995 Amendment: Chapter 55 inserted (2)(h) disallowing reimbursement for expenses for work completed more than 2 years prior to a request for reimbursement, except for certain third-party claims; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective September 30, 1995.

1993 Amendment: Chapter 339 inserted (4)(a) establishing reimbursement levels for heating oil or noncommercial motor fuel releases eligible under the petroleum tank release cleanup fund; in (4)(b)(i) and (4)(b)(ii) substituted language establishing reimbursement levels for other releases eligible under the petroleum tank release cleanup fund for former language that read: "except for a tank storing heating oil for consumptive use on the premises where it is stored or a farm or residential tank with a capacity of 1,100 gallons or less that is used for storing motor fuel for noncommercial purposes; and

(b) for releases eligible for reimbursement from the petroleum tank release cleanup fund that are discovered and reported on or after April 13, 1989, the board shall reimburse an owner or operator for 50% of the first $10,000 of eligible costs and 100% of subsequent eligible costs, up to a maximum total reimbursement of $495,000, for a tank storing heating oil for consumptive use on the premises where it is stored or a farm or residential tank with a capacity of 1,100 gallons or less that is used for storing motor fuel for noncommercial purposes"; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective April 13, 1993.

Preamble: The preamble attached to Ch. 339, L. 1993, provided: "WHEREAS, the 1993 Legislature found that petroleum storage tanks and associated pipes connected to petroleum storage tanks must be regulated in order to protect public health and safety, the health of living organisms, and the environment; and

WHEREAS, the Department of Health and Environmental Sciences [now Department of Environmental Quality] adopted rules in 1989 that included design and construction requirements for petroleum storage tanks and associated pipes; and

WHEREAS, double-walled construction of petroleum storage tanks and associated pipes should be encouraged because it provides superior prevention of releases of regulated substances to the environment over the operational life of a petroleum storage tank system as well as superior containment of regulated substances that are released from the interior vessel until the substances can be detected and removed."

Applicability: Section 6, Ch. 339, L. 1993, provided: "[This act] applies to releases discovered on or after October 1, 1993, from properly designed and installed double-walled petroleum storage tank systems."

1991 Amendments: Chapter 389 at end of (3) inserted provision that owner or operator retain legal responsibility for costs and liabilities incurred as a result of a release, as a condition of designating an agent for reimbursement. Amendment effective July 1, 1991.

Chapter 763 in (2)(f) inserted "for owners or operators seeking reimbursement from the petroleum tank release cleanup fund and expenses incurred before May 15, 1991, for owners or operators seeking reimbursement from the petroleum tank release cleanup fund for a tank storing heating oil for consumptive use on the premises where it is stored or a farm or residential tank with a capacity of 1,100 gallons or less that is used for storing motor fuel for noncommercial purposes"; in (4)(a), after "releases", inserted "eligible for reimbursement from the petroleum tank release cleanup fund" and after "$982,500" inserted "except for a tank storing heating oil for consumptive use on the premises where it is stored or a farm or residential tank with a capacity of 1,100 gallons or less that is used for storing motor fuel for noncommercial purposes"; inserted (4)(b) requiring that subject to the availability of funds under subsection (5), for eligible releases for reimbursement from fund that are discovered and reported on or after April 13, 1989, Board shall reimburse owner or operator for 50% of first $10,000 of eligible costs and 100% of subsequent eligible costs, up to $495,000, for heating oil tank for consumptive use on premises where stored or for farm or residential tank with capacity of 1,100 gallons or less used for storing motor fuel for noncommercial purposes; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective May 15, 1991.

Saving Clause: Section 5, Ch. 389, L. 1991, provided: "Nothing in [this act] applies to alter a claim for reimbursement that was filed before [the effective date of this act] or that arose pursuant to a corrective action plan approved by the department before [the effective date of this act]." Effective July 1, 1991.

1991 Statement of Intent: The statement of intent attached to Ch. 763, L. 1991, provided: "A statement of intent is required for this bill in order to provide guidance to the petroleum tank release compensation board, the department of health and environmental sciences [now department of environmental quality], and the department of revenue for the adoption of rules authorized by the bill. The petroleum tank release compensation board shall adopt rules that:

(1) govern submission of claims from owners and operators to the board and to the department of health and environmental sciences [now department of environmental quality] for reimbursement from the petroleum tank release cleanup fund;

(2) establish procedures for determining eligibility of tank owners and operators for reimbursement from the petroleum tank release cleanup fund and the validity of claims; and

(3) are necessary for administration of the petroleum tank release cleanup fund and other provisions of this bill, provided that the rules may not conflict with the eligibility requirements and procedures provided for in this bill and Title 75, chapter 11, part 3; rules previously adopted under that part; and laws, rules, and procedures of the federal government or the department of health and environmental sciences [now department of environmental quality] pertaining to petroleum storage tank releases eligible for reimbursement from the petroleum tank release cleanup fund.

The department of health and environmental sciences [now department of environmental quality] may adopt rules or revise existing rules as necessary to implement and incorporate the provisions of this bill into the department's existing procedures and its requirements pertaining to releases from underground storage tanks.

The department of revenue shall adopt rules governing the collection of the petroleum storage tank cleanup fee, including reporting and recordkeeping requirements, the method and timing of payments from distributors, examination of records, and other provisions necessary to ensure that the petroleum storage tank cleanup fee is properly and efficiently collected."

Severability: Section 6, Ch. 763, L. 1991, was a severability clause.

Case Notes

Diesel Fuel Properly Considered Pollutant for Purposes of Commercial Liability Insurance Policy Exclusion: A petroleum company held commercial liability and property insurance policies that contained a standard absolute pollution exclusion clause disclaiming coverage for spills resulting from pollutants, which were defined to include liquid irritants or contaminants. The company also held a coverage extension that provided coverage for expenses to extract pollutants from land or water. When a diesel fuel spill occurred on the company's property, the company sought insurance reimbursement under the policies and also submitted claims to the Montana Petroleum Tank Release Compensation Board for reimbursement for corrective action costs. The insurer denied the claim, and after the company subrogated the claim to the Board, the Board sought reimbursement from the insurer, but the insurer denied all reimbursement requests, so the Board sued to recover corrective costs from the insurer. The District Court concluded that diesel fuel was a pollutant and that coverage was therefore excluded under the commercial general liability portion of the policy. On appeal, the Board asserted that the court erred in denying coverage, but the Supreme Court affirmed. The terms of the pollution exclusion clause were not ambiguous, and when viewed from the objective perspective of the average consumer, diesel fuel was properly included in the definition of pollutant. The District Court correctly denied coverage under the commercial general liability portion of the policy disclaiming coverage for spills resulting from pollutants. Mont. Petroleum Tank Release Comp. Bd. v. Crumleys, Inc., 2008 MT 2, 341 M 33, 174 P3d 948 (2008).

Attorney General's Opinions

Loss of Reimbursement Eligibility When Tank No Longer Complies With Applicable Law: The plain language of 75-11-308(1)(e) (now (1)(a)) renders ineligible for reimbursement any owner or operator whose tank falls out of compliance with applicable state and federal laws and rules, and eligibility is not restored even if the tank is subsequently brought back into compliance with applicable law. The statutory use of the phrase "remained in compliance" requires that a tank be in an ongoing state of compliance in order for it to be eligible for reimbursement. 48 A.G. Op. 9 (2000).

Limited Board Reimbursement Review Authority: The Petroleum Tank Release Compensation Board does not have discretion to deny a claim for reimbursement from the petroleum tank release cleanup fund for expenses actually, necessarily, and reasonably incurred in preparation or implementation of a corrective action plan approved by the Department of Health and Environmental Sciences [now Department of Environmental Quality], assuming the reimbursement criteria of 75-11-309(2) are met. 44 A.G. Op. 46 (1992).

2005 Amendment: Chapter 356 in (1)(b)(iii) near beginning after "that the" substituted "board determines was unknown to both the property owner and the department prior to its discovery if the owner applies to the department for a closure permit in accordance with

75-11-212 within 30 days of the date upon which the owner first had knowledge of the tank and closes the tank in accordance with the requirements of the permit before the permit expires" for "property owner had no previous knowledge of if the tank was in compliance with the applicable state and federal laws and rules that the board determines pertain to the prevention and mitigation of a petroleum release at the time that the release was discovered"; deleted former (1)(c) and (1)(d) that read: "(c) following the discovery of the release, the underground storage tank from which the release occurred was removed or had a valid permit pursuant to 75-11-509 and the petroleum storage tank remained in compliance with applicable state and federal laws and rules that the board determines pertain to prevention and mitigation of petroleum releases; and

(d) the owner or operator undertakes corrective action to respond to the release and the corrective action is undertaken, in accordance with a corrective action plan approved by the department, from the time of discovery until the release is resolved"; deleted former (3) that read: "(3) When, subsequent to the discovery of a release, an owner or operator fails to remain in compliance as required by subsection (1)(c) or fails to conduct corrective action as required by subsection (1)(d) and is issued a violation letter by the department, all reimbursement of claims submitted after the date of the violation letter must be suspended. Upon a determination by the department that all violations identified in the violation letter have been corrected, all suspended and future claims may be reimbursed according to criteria established by the board. In determining the amount of reimbursement, if any, the board may consider the effect and duration of the noncompliance"; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective July 1, 2005.

2003 Amendment: Chapter 245 in (1)(a) inserted conditions for eligibility for reimbursement; deleted former (1)(b) and (1)(c) that read: "(b) the department is notified of the release in the manner and within the time provided by law or rule;

(c) the department has been notified of the existence of the tank in the manner required by department rule or has waived the requirement for notification"; in (1)(c) at beginning substituted "following the discovery" for "with the exception", after "of the release" substituted "the underground storage tank from which the release occurred was removed or had a valid permit pursuant to 75-11-509 and the petroleum storage tank remained in compliance" for "the operation and management of the tank complied", and at end deleted "when the release was discovered and remained in compliance following discovery of the release"; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective October 1, 2003.

Saving Clause: Section 8, Ch. 245, L. 2003, was a saving clause.

2001 Amendment: Chapter 112 inserted (3) requiring suspension of all claim reimbursements submitted after date of violation letter when owner or operator fails to maintain compliance or to conduct corrective action subsequent to release discovery, providing for reimbursement of suspended and future claims upon determination of violation corrections, and authorizing board to consider noncompliance effect and duration in determining reimbursements. Amendment effective October 1, 2001.

Saving Clause: Section 3, Ch. 112, L. 2001, was a saving clause.

Severability: Section 4, Ch. 112, L. 2001, was a severability clause.

1999 Amendment: Chapter 420 in middle of (1))(e) after "rules" inserted "that the board determines pertain to prevention and mitigation of petroleum releases", after "release" substituted "was discovered" for "occurred", and after "following" substituted "discovery" for "detection"; inserted (1)(f) providing owner or operator is eligible for reimbursement if corrective action undertaken to respond to release according to approved plan from time of discovery until release is resolved; at end of (2)(c) inserted exception clause; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective April 23, 1999.

Saving Clause: Section 3, Ch. 420, L. 1999, was a saving clause.

Applicability: Section 5, Ch. 420, L. 1999, provided: "[Section 2] [75-11-308] applies to claims for reimbursement initially filed with the petroleum tank release compensation board on or after [the effective date of this act]." Effective April 23, 1999.

1993 Amendment: Chapter 339 near middle of (1), before "eligible costs", inserted "the applicable percentage as provided in 75-11-307(4)(a) and (4)(b)". Amendment effective April 13, 1993.

Preamble: The preamble attached to Ch. 339, L. 1993, provided: "WHEREAS, the 1993 Legislature found that petroleum storage tanks and associated pipes connected to petroleum storage tanks must be regulated in order to protect public health and safety, the health of living organisms, and the environment; and

WHEREAS, the Department of Health and Environmental Sciences [now Department of Environmental Quality] adopted rules in 1989 that included design and construction requirements for petroleum storage tanks and associated pipes; and

WHEREAS, double-walled construction of petroleum storage tanks and associated pipes should be encouraged because it provides superior prevention of releases of regulated substances to the environment over the operational life of a petroleum storage tank system as well as superior containment of regulated substances that are released from the interior vessel until the substances can be detected and removed."

Applicability: Section 6, Ch. 339, L. 1993, provided: "[This act] applies to releases discovered on or after October 1, 1993, from properly designed and installed double-walled petroleum storage tank systems."

1991 Amendments: Chapter 389 at end of (1)(c) inserted "or has waived the requirement for notification". Amendment effective July 1, 1991.

Chapter 763 in (2) inserted "from the petroleum tank release cleanup fund"; and deleted former (2)(e) that read: "(e) a farm or residential tank with a capacity of 1,100 gallons or less that is used for storing motor fuel for noncommercial purposes or a tank used for storing heating oil for consumptive use on the premises where stored". Amendment effective May 15, 1991.

Saving Clause: Section 5, Ch. 389, L. 1991, provided: "Nothing in [this act] applies to alter a claim for reimbursement that was filed before [the effective date of this act] or that arose pursuant to a corrective action plan approved by the department before [the effective date of this act]." Effective July 1, 1991.

1991 Statement of Intent: The statement of intent attached to Ch. 763, L. 1991, provided: "A statement of intent is required for this bill in order to provide guidance to the petroleum tank release compensation board, the department of health and environmental sciences [now department of environmental quality], and the department of revenue for the adoption of rules authorized by the bill. The petroleum tank release compensation board shall adopt rules that:

(1) govern submission of claims from owners and operators to the board and to the department of health and environmental sciences [now department of environmental quality] for reimbursement from the petroleum tank release cleanup fund;

(2) establish procedures for determining eligibility of tank owners and operators for reimbursement from the petroleum tank release cleanup fund and the validity of claims; and

(3) are necessary for administration of the petroleum tank release cleanup fund and other provisions of this bill, provided that the rules may not conflict with the eligibility requirements and procedures provided for in this bill and Title 75, chapter 11, part 3; rules previously adopted under that part; and laws, rules, and procedures of the federal government or the department of health and environmental sciences [now department of environmental quality] pertaining to petroleum storage tank releases eligible for reimbursement from the petroleum tank release cleanup fund.

The department of health and environmental sciences [now department of environmental quality] may adopt rules or revise existing rules as necessary to implement and incorporate the provisions of this bill into the department's existing procedures and its requirements pertaining to releases from underground storage tanks.

The department of revenue shall adopt rules governing the collection of the petroleum storage tank cleanup fee, including reporting and recordkeeping requirements, the method and timing of payments from distributors, examination of records, and other provisions necessary to ensure that the petroleum storage tank cleanup fee is properly and efficiently collected."

Administrative Rules

ARM 17.56.508 Numbering petroleum releases.

Case Notes

Notification Requirement of Underground Tank Release Not Retroactive —Compensation Properly Denied: Plaintiff discovered a possible leak in an underground tank in 2002. Even though the 2001 version of this section and related administrative rules required notice to the Department of Environmental Quality within 24 hours of the occurrence of unusual operating conditions, plaintiff waited until after the 2003 amendment of this section, which eliminated the 24-hour notice provision, to report the possible leak. Plaintiff then sought reimbursement for the cleanup. The Petroleum Tank Release Compensation Board denied the request because plaintiff did not report the unusual operating conditions within 24 hours pursuant to the 2001 law in effect at the time that plaintiff noticed the possible spill. Plaintiff appealed denial of the compensation claim, but the District Court affirmed the Board's decision, so plaintiff appealed to the Supreme Court, which affirmed. Plaintiff asserted that the 2003 amendments to this section were to be applied retroactively. However, the retroactive applicability section in the 2003 bill did not include a reference to this section, so amendments to this section were not retroactive, and the savings clause provided that the amendments to this section did not affect duties that matured prior to the 2003 amendments. Thus, the 2001 version applied, and plaintiff's failure to report the spill within 24 hours rendered plaintiff ineligible for compensation. Town Pump, Inc. v. Petroleum Tank Release Comp. Bd., 2008 MT 15, 341 M 139, 176 P3d 1017 (2008).

Petroleum Release From Underground Disconnected Pipes — Eligibility for Cleanup Reimbursement — Portion of Administrative Rule Invalid: The former Department of Health and Environmental Sciences notified Safeway that its property had been identified as a source of petroleum contamination in the area where Safeway had previously removed some underground storage tanks and ordered Safeway to clean up the site pursuant to ARM 16.45.601 (renumbered ARM 17.56.601). Safeway discovered that the leakage was coming from pipes that were left underground during the tank removal. Safeway subsequently submitted to the Petroleum Tank Release Compensation Board an eligibility checklist and application for voluntary registration for reimbursement for costs of cleaning up the leak. The Board denied the request because the tank had been removed prior to the release detection and because ARM 16.47.314 (renumbered ARM 17.58.312) required that the tank be in place when the release was discovered. The District Court held, and the Supreme Court affirmed, that the portion of ARM 16.47.314(1) (renumbered ARM 17.58.312(1)) that added additional requirements to the cleanup statutes was invalid and that Safeway should be compensated for cleanup costs. The Supreme Court analyzed the definition of underground storage tank in determining that nothing in the statutory language of 75-10-403 (before 1997 amendment) required that the underground storage tank itself must be in place on the date on which a petroleum release is discovered. The court also examined whether it is permissible and fair for two state entities, the Department and the Board, to use one statutory definition to reach two opposite conclusions. Despite the fact that the Department and Board are separate entities and the petroleum release cleanup statutes are separate from the reimbursement statutes, Safeway was entitled to be treated uniformly by both entities. The Department treated Safeway as the tank owner for cleanup requirements, and the Board was required to also treat Safeway as the tank owner for reimbursement purposes. Safeway, Inc. v. Mont. Petroleum Release Comp. Bd., 281 M 189, 931 P2d 1327, 54 St. Rep. 129 (1997).

Loss of Reimbursement Eligibility When Tank No Longer Complies With Applicable Law: The plain language of subsection (1)(e) (now (1)a)) of this section renders ineligible for reimbursement any owner or operator whose tank falls out of compliance with applicable state and federal laws and rules, and eligibility is not restored even if the tank is subsequently brought back into compliance with applicable law. The statutory use of the phrase "remained in compliance" requires that a tank be in an ongoing state of compliance in order for it to be eligible for reimbursement. (See 2001 amendment.) 48 A.G. 2011 Amendment: Chapter 189 inserted (1)(e) regarding petroleum mixing zone; in (1)(f) inserted second and third sentences regarding amendment of plan for petroleum mixing zone; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective April 15, 2011.

2009 Amendment: Chapter 396 in (1)(i) and in (1)(i)(ii) inserted "properly designed and installed"; in (1)(i)(ii) at end deleted "as defined in 75-11-302"; deleted former (1)(i)(iii) that read: "(iii) that the double-walled tank system was properly installed and made of materials and constructed in accordance with applicable department regulations"; inserted (4)(b) requiring that a written request for a hearing be received by the board within 120 days; in (4)(c) at beginning inserted "If a written request is received within 120 days"; inserted (4)(d) providing that if a written request is not received within 120 days, the determination of the board is final; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective October 1, 2009.

2005 Amendment: Chapter 356 inserted (1)(b) requiring continuing tank compliance following discovery of a release except for a tank for which a permit is sought under 75-11-308(1)(b)(iii) and that is closed within 120 days of discovery of the release; in (1)(f) near beginning after "implement the" substituted "corrective action plan or plans approved by the department until the release is resolved" for "approved plan"; inserted (2) regarding reimbursement of suspended and future claims; in (3)(b)(ii) inserted second through fourth sentences regarding suspension of reimbursement of certain pending and future claims; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective July 1, 2005.

Saving Clause: Section 6, Ch. 356, L. 2005, was a saving clause.

2003 Amendment: Chapter 245 in (1)(d) after "the owner or operator" deleted "and the board" and at end inserted "and shall promptly submit a copy of the approved corrective action plan to the board"; at end of (1)(f)(i) deleted "The board shall forward each claim and appropriate documentation to the department. The department shall notify the board of any costs that the department considers not reimbursable because of any failure to meet the requirements of subsection (2). The department shall inform the owner or operator of any notification given to the board"; inserted (1)(f)(ii) and (1)(f)(iii) requiring board review of a claim to determine if it is for actual, reasonable, and necessary costs of responding to the release and implementing corrective action and allowing board to request comment from the department and the owner or operator if the board requires additional information; inserted (1)(f)(iv) requiring the department to notify the board if the department determines that an owner or operator is failing to properly implement a corrective action plan; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective October 1, 2003.

Saving Clause: Section 8, Ch. 245, L. 2003, was a saving clause.

1997 Amendment: Chapter 112 near end of second sentence of (1)(e) deleted reference to Title 75, chapter 10, part 4, and inserted reference to Title 75, chapter 11, part 5; and made minor changes in style.

Saving Clause: Section 38(1), Ch. 112, L. 1997, was a saving clause.

1993 Amendments — Composite Section: Chapter 339 inserted (1)(h) regarding documentation when the release is claimed to have originated from a double-walled tank system; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective April 13, 1993.

Chapter 355 in second sentence of (3), after "of the board", inserted "or as otherwise permitted under the Montana Administrative Procedure Act"; and made minor changes in style.

A style change in (1)(a) was slightly different in the two chapters. The codifier chose the more appropriate of the two.

Preamble: The preamble attached to Ch. 339, L. 1993, provided: "WHEREAS, the 1993 Legislature found that petroleum storage tanks and associated pipes connected to petroleum storage tanks must be regulated in order to protect public health and safety, the health of living organisms, and the environment; and

WHEREAS, the Department of Health and Environmental Sciences [now Department of Environmental Quality] adopted rules in 1989 that included design and construction requirements for petroleum storage tanks and associated pipes; and

WHEREAS, double-walled construction of petroleum storage tanks and associated pipes should be encouraged because it provides superior prevention of releases of regulated substances to the environment over the operational life of a petroleum storage tank system as well as superior containment of regulated substances that are released from the interior vessel until the substances can be detected and removed."

Applicability: Section 6, Ch. 339, L. 1993, provided: "[This act] applies to releases discovered on or after October 1, 1993, from properly designed and installed double-walled petroleum storage tank systems."

1991 Amendment: In (1)(b), (1)(c)(i), in two places, (1)(c)(ii), and (1)(c)(iii) inserted references to tribal review of cleanup plans proposed within a tribal jurisdiction; in (1)(f), in second sentence, substituted "board" for "department", in third sentence, before "shall", substituted "board" for "department" and at end substituted "department" for "board", and at beginning of fourth sentence inserted "The department shall"; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective July 1, 1991.

Saving Clause: Section 5, Ch. 389, L. 1991, provided: "Nothing in [this act] applies to alter a claim for reimbursement that was filed before [the effective date of this act] or that arose pursuant to a corrective action plan approved by the department before [the effective date of this act]." Effective July 1, 1991.

Case Notes

Administrative Costs of Environmental Corrective Action Recoverable as Consequential Damages: A petroleum company held commercial liability and property insurance policies that contained a standard absolute pollution exclusion clause disclaiming coverage for spills resulting from pollutants. When a diesel fuel spill occurred on the company's property, the company sought insurance reimbursement under the policies and also submitted claims to the Montana Petroleum Tank Release Compensation Board for reimbursement for corrective action costs. The insurer denied the claim, and after the company subrogated the claim to the Board, the Board sought reimbursement from the insurer, but the insurer denied all reimbursement requests, so the Board sued to recover corrective costs from the insurer, including administrative costs of the corrective action. The District Court granted the Board's request for administrative costs, and on appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed. Because the Board, as subrogee, stood in the shoes of the company, as subrogor, and thus could not stand in a better position than the company, the court first considered what the company was entitled to recover for the insurer's breach of contract, noting that damages could be proximate or consequential. Pursuant to Safeco Ins. Co. v. Munroe, 165 M 185, 527 P2d 64 (1974), the company was entitled to recover its administrative costs as consequential damages if those costs were contemplated by both parties at the time that the contract was entered into and if administrative costs might naturally be expected to result from the insurer's refusal to indemnify. In this case, administrative costs were both anticipated and a natural result of the insurer's breach, so the company, and in turn the Board as subrogee, were entitled to administrative costs as consequential damages. Mont. Petroleum Tank Release Comp. Bd. v. Crumleys, Inc., 2008 MT 2, 341 M 33, 174 P3d 948 (2008).

Attorney General's Opinions

Invalidity of Rule Allowing Board to Approve and Modify Department-Approved Corrective Action Plans: The Petroleum Tank Release Compensation Board adopted ARM 16.47.342 (renumbered ARM 17.58.338 in 1996 and repealed in 1999), pursuant to rulemaking authority granted under 75-11-318(5), that arguably granted the Board authority to approve and modify corrective action plans previously approved by the Department of Health and Environmental Sciences (now Department of Environmental Quality). The rule was invalid because it granted the Board a substantive power of dual review and approval that conflicted with the Department's authority to administer the corrective action plan, as established in this section. 44 A.G. Op. 46 (1992).

Limited Board Reimbursement Review Authority: The Petroleum Tank Release Compensation Board does not have discretion to deny a claim for reimbursement from the petroleum tank release cleanup fund for expenses actually, necessarily, and reasonably incurred in preparation or implementation of a corrective action plan approved by the Department of Health and Environmental Sciences (now Department of Environmental Quality), assuming the reimbursement criteria of subsection (2) of this section are met. 44 A.G. Op. 46 (1992).

2003 Amendment: Chapter 245 in (1) in third sentence inserted reference to subsection (3)(b); in (3) in introductory clause inserted "As provided in 75-11-318"; in (3)(a) after "board" deleted "and department"; inserted (3)(b) relating to payment of actual and necessary department expenses associated with administration; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective October 1, 2003.

Saving Clause: Section 8, Ch. 245, L. 2003, was a saving clause.

1997 Amendments: Chapter 42 deleted (4) that read: "(4)(a) The legislature may appropriate to the fund repayable advances as necessary to carry out the purposes of this part. The outstanding total of repayable advances may not exceed the amount the board estimates will be received by the fund from the petroleum storage tank cleanup fee during the next 24 months.

(b) Advances to the fund must be repaid and interest earned on advances must be paid to the general fund when determined appropriate by the board. However, all advances to the fund plus the interest earned must be repaid on or before December 31, 1995." Amendment effective March 12, 1997.

Chapter 115 inserted (2)(d) concerning loans from Board of Investments; in (3)(c), after "(4)", inserted "and any loan made pursuant to 17-6-225" and at end inserted "or loan"; at end of (4)(b) substituted "by the board within 24 months of receipt of the advance" for "on or before December 31, 1995" (voided by Ch. 42 amendment); inserted (4) concerning loans from Board of Investments; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective July 1, 1997.

Code Commissioner Correction: Pursuant to sec. 314, Ch. 42, L. 1997, in (3)(c), after "advance", the Code Commissioner deleted "made under subsection (4)" to eliminate the reference to subsection (4) that was deleted by sec. 272, Ch. 42, L. 1997.

1993 Amendment: Chapter 543 in second sentence of (1), after "17-7-502", inserted remainder of second sentence and third sentence that read: "for the purposes provided for under subsections (3)(b) and (3)(c). Administrative costs under subsection (3)(a) must be paid pursuant to a legislative appropriation." Amendment effective July 1, 1993.

Effective Date: Section 16, Ch. 528, L. 1989, provided that this section is effective July 1, 1989.

Case Notes

No Separate Period of Limitations Following Each Payment for Petroleum Cleanup Costs: The Montana Petroleum Tank Release Compensation Board asserted that a separate period of limitations occurs after each payment made by the Board to the owner of a petroleum facility to pay cleanup costs. The Supreme Court disagreed. The statute of limitations in these cases is not based on payment, request for payment, or denial of payment, but rather on when the claim accrues. Thus, the statute of limitations begins to run upon discovery of a leak and the occurrence of the subsequent obligation on the part of the owner to clean up the spilled petroleum, which triggers the owner's right to maintain an action under the applicable insurance policy. Mont. Petroleum Tank Release Comp. Bd. v. Federated Serv. Ins. Co., 2008 MT 194, 344 M 45, 185 P3d 998 (2008), distinguishing St. Paul Fire & Marine Co. v. Thompson, 152 M 396, 451 P2d 98 (1969), and Fulton v. Fulton, 2004 MT 240, 322 M 516, 97 P3d 573 (2004). See also Mont. Petroleum Tank Release Comp. Bd. v. Empire Fire & Marine Ins. Co., 2008 MT 195, 344 M 54, 185 P3d 1021 (2008).

Authority of Petroleum Tank Release Compensation Board to Require Subrogation: This chapter provides the Montana Petroleum Tank Release Compensation Board with authority to seek reimbursement of corrective action expenses through subrogation, and by virtue of the right to statutory subrogation and pursuant to 75-11-318, the Board is authorized to adopt an administrative rule requiring tank owners to subrogate their claims against insurers. Mont. Petroleum Tank Release Comp. Bd. v. Crumleys, Inc., 2008 MT 2, 341 M 33, 174 P3d 948 (2008).

No Right to Subrogation From Insurance Loss Payee — Summary Judgment Proper: The Montana Petroleum Tank Release Compensation Board reimbursed a gas station owner $254,842 for expenses incurred in an environmental remediation, and the Board then sought to exercise subrogation rights against the owner's insurer and a lessee for reimbursement. The District Court granted summary judgment to the insurer after finding that the Board had no right of subrogation through the gas station owner, and the Board appealed. The Supreme Court noted that the gas station owner was at most a loss payee under its insurance policy, so the Board had no right of subrogation through the owner or through the corporation established to run the gas station, which had no part in funding the remediation or obligation to pay for any part of the remediation. The Board could not show that the owner's insurer was unjustly enriched by failing to pay a claim that the insurer did not owe, so subrogation did not apply. Thus, the Board had no right to subrogation through either the owner or the lessee to recover damages from the owner's insurer, and summary judgment was proper. Mont. Petroleum Tank Release Comp. Bd. v. Capitol Indem. Co., 2006 MT 133, 332 M 352, 137 P3d 522 (2006), distinguishing Swingley v. Riechoff, 112 M 59, 112 P2d 1075 (1941).

Subrogation Claim for Environmental Remediation Costs Barred by Statute of Limitations: The Montana Petroleum Tank Release Compensation Board submitted a claim to a gas station owner's insurer for reimbursement of environmental remediation expenses. The claim was denied, and the Board filed an action against the owner's insurer and the insurer of a subsequent lessee. In its denial letter, one insurer asserted that because 12 years elapsed before the Board brought its claim, the statute of limitations had run on the claim. The District Court granted summary judgment to both insurers, and the Board appealed. The Supreme Court noted that even if the Board had a claim against the lessee's insurer through subrogation of the owner's insurer's rights, the statute of limitations began to run from the time that all the elements accrued for the owner's insurer to file a claim with the lessee's insurer. The longest possible statute of limitations that could apply was 8 years, so the lessee's insurer was correct that any claim that the Board may have had against it was barred by the statute of limitations. Mont. Petroleum Tank Release Comp. Bd. v. Capitol Indem. Co., 2006 MT 133, 332 M 352, 137 P3d 522 (2006), affirmed in Mont. Petroleum Tank Release Comp. Bd. v. Federated Serv. Ins. Co., 2008 MT 194, 344 M 45, 185 P3d 998 (2008), and followed in Mont. Petroleum Tank Release Comp. Bd. v. Empire Fire & Marine Ins. Co., 2008 MT 195, 344 M 54, 185 P3d 1021 (2008).

Delegation of Enforcement Duties to Local Agents — Scope of Letters of Designation: Use of the nonrestrictive term "implementation" in 75-10-405(2)(c)(vi) (now in 75-11-505(8)) allows the Department of Health and Environmental Sciences (now Department of Environmental Quality) to delegate to properly designated local agents enforcement of the statutes and rules governing the underground storage tank program, and local agents may use any enforcement methods available to the Department. Letters of designation issued by the Department delegating authority to local agents are an appropriate method for delegation as long as the letters clearly define the rights, duties, and responsibilities of the Department and local agents. 43 A.G. Case Notes

Petroleum Release From Underground Disconnected Pipes — Eligibility for Cleanup Reimbursement — Portion of Administrative Rule Invalid: The former Department of Health and Environmental Sciences notified Safeway that its property had been identified as a source of petroleum contamination in the area where Safeway had previously removed some underground storage tanks and ordered Safeway to clean up the site pursuant to ARM 16.45.601 (renumbered ARM 17.56.601). Safeway discovered that the leakage was coming from pipes that were left underground during the tank removal. Safeway subsequently submitted to the Petroleum Tank Release Compensation Board an eligibility checklist and application for voluntary registration for reimbursement for costs of cleaning up the leak. The Board denied the request because the tank had been removed prior to the release detection and because ARM 16.47.314 (renumbered ARM 17.58.312) required that the tank be in place when the release was discovered. The District Court held, and the Supreme Court affirmed, that the portion of ARM 16.47.314(1) (renumbered ARM 17.58.312(1)) that added additional requirements to the cleanup statutes was invalid and that Safeway should be compensated for cleanup costs. The Supreme Court analyzed the definition of underground storage tank in determining that nothing in the statutory language of 75-10-403 (before 1997 amendment) required that the underground storage tank itself must be in place on the date on which a petroleum release is discovered. The court also examined whether it is permissible and fair for two state entities, the Department and the Board, to use one statutory definition to reach two opposite conclusions. Despite the fact that the Department and Board are separate entities and the petroleum release cleanup statutes are separate from the reimbursement statutes, Safeway was entitled to be treated uniformly by both entities. The Department treated Safeway as the tank owner for cleanup requirements, and the Board was required to also treat Safeway as the tank owner for reimbursement purposes. Safeway, Inc. v. Mont. Petroleum Release Comp. Bd., 281 M 189, 931 P2d 1327, 54 St. Rep. 129 (1997).

2007 Amendment: Chapter 51 in (7) at beginning after "a" deleted "penalty schedule and a". Amendment effective March 27, 2007.

Saving Clause: Section 4, Ch. 51, L. 2007, was a saving clause.

2003 Amendment: Chapter 137 in (4) after "issuance" inserted "nonissuance, renewal, nonrenewal, modification, revocation, suspension"; and in (6) near beginning of introductory clause after "annual fees" substituted "not to exceed $108 for a tank over 1,100 gallons and not to exceed $36 for a tank 1,100 gallons or less, for each tank, for tank registration" for "not to exceed $70 for a tank over 1,100 gallons and not to exceed $20 for a tank 1,100 gallons or less, per tank, for tank registration". Amendment effective March 26, 2003.

Saving Clause: Section 5, Ch. 137, L. 2003, was a saving clause.

1999 Amendment: Chapter 506 inserted (4) authorizing department to adopt, amend, or repeal rules related to procedures and standards for issuance and enforcement of permits authorizing underground storage tank operation; in first sentence in (6) substituted "annual fees, not to exceed $70" for "fees, not to exceed $50" and after "for tank" substituted "registration" for "notification and permits" and inserted second sentence authorizing department to prorate fees over 12 months for scheduling staggered renewal dates; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective April 28, 1999.

Saving Clause — Rules: Section 38(2), Ch. 112, L. 1997, provided: "Rules adopted pursuant to 75-10-405 that are in effect on [the effective date of this act] [effective October 1, 1997] continue in effect until amended or repealed pursuant to 75-10-405 or [section 5] [75-11-505]."

1993 Statement of Intent: The statement of intent attached to Ch. 281, L. 1993, provided: "A statement of intent is required for this bill because the bill gives the department of health and environmental sciences [now department of environmental quality] authority to adopt administrative rules. The legislature intends that the administrative penalties provided by this bill be used to encourage compliance with the Montana underground storage tank laws and rules by allowing more timely and efficient processing of enforcement actions without the need for seeking a higher penalty through district court. To promote these goals, the department should develop rules that provide for a range of penalties for specific violations, the form for notice of violation, an expedited appeal, and a penalty mitigation process. In doing so, the department shall ensure that its rules and penalty schedule are consistent with the criteria set forth in [section 3] [75-11-525]. The department shall ensure that the rules, the penalty schedule, and a statement of the department's enforcement policy are disseminated to the regulated community."

Applicability: Section 6, Ch. 281, L. 1993, provided: "[This act] applies to all department of health and environmental sciences' [now department of environmental quality] notices served on alleged violators pursuant to [section 3] [75-11-525] beginning October 1, 1993, or on the date of adoption of the department's rules under 75-10-405(2)(c)(vi) [75-11-505(6)], whichever is earlier."

1989 Statement of Intent: The statement of intent attached to Ch. 384, L. 1989, provided: "It is the intent of the legislature that the department of health and environmental sciences [now department of environmental quality] adopt rules setting forth corrective action requirements for releases from underground storage tanks and standards for tank closures.

It is the intent of the legislature that the department have the authority to develop and implement a schedule of fees to be collected for underground storage tank notifications and permits. The fees should be set at a level to defray state and local costs of implementing an underground storage tank program.

It is the intent of the legislature that the department be able to delegate authority and funds to local agents for inspections and for other duties related to the underground storage tank program.

It is the intent of the legislature that the underground storage tank program be implemented in a manner consistent with rules adopted by the state fire marshal [now state fire prevention and investigation program of the department of justice] as they relate to underground storage tanks; that the program not duplicate inspections and existing regulatory efforts conducted under the uniform fire code; and that the department and local health and fire officials work together cooperatively in implementing a program for the prevention of leakage from underground storage tanks."

1985 Statement of Intent: The statement of intent attached to Ch. 633, L. 1985, provided: "A statement of intent is required for this bill because it delegates rulemaking authority to the department of health and environmental sciences (DHES) [now department of environmental quality (DEQ)]. House Bill 676 [Ch. 633, L. 1985] adds petroleum products and certain hazardous substances stored in underground tanks as a new category of materials which may be regulated under the Montana Hazardous Waste Act (MHWA).

The DHES [now DEQ] has been increasingly involved in the cleanup of ground water problems caused by leaking underground tanks. At the national level, congress amended the federal Resource Conservation and Recovery Act of 1976 (RCRA) in November 1984 to include regulation of underground storage tanks and required the environmental protection agency (EPA) to develop a regulatory program for tanks. Since the DHES [now DEQ] now administers the existing RCRA program in Montana, it is likely that the state (through DHES) [now DEQ] will want to assume the RCRA program for underground tanks as well. Moreover, in the event that the EPA does not adopt a program adequate for Montana or fails to develop a program in a timely fashion, the DHES [now DEQ] should have the authority to establish the state's own program to meet the needs of Montana. House Bill 676 will grant the DHES [now DEQ] the authority to assume the EPA tank program to be developed under RCRA or to establish a state program independent of RCRA.

Whether DHES [now DEQ] follows the federal RCRA program or develops its own state program, it is the intent of the legislature that administrative rules that DHES [now DEQ] may adopt for underground storage tanks need not be equivalent to the comparable federal regulations to be developed by the EPA under RCRA. Rather, in view of the growing number and severity of environmental problems related to underground storage tanks in Montana, the legislature intends to grant DHES [now DEQ] the authority to establish a regulatory program for underground tanks whether or not it may include elements more stringent than any federal requirements and whether or not the EPA has established a tank program under RCRA.

The legislature intends that the rules developed by DHES [now DEQ] include requirements for:

(1) the design, construction, and installation of underground tanks in a manner that will prevent tank leakage;

(2) reporting by tank owners and operators;

(3) leak prevention and detection;

(4) corrective actions by tank owners and operators if tank leakage does occur; and

(5) financial responsibility of tank owners and operators for corrective action and compensation to third parties for damages resulting from release of regulated substances from underground tanks." (The substance of Ch. 633, L. 1985, was deleted from 75-10-405 and enacted as this section by Ch. 112, L. 1997.)

Delegation of Enforcement Duties to Local Agents — Scope of Letters of Designation: Use of the nonrestrictive term "implementation" in 75-10-405(2)(c)(vi) (now in this section) allows the Department of Health and Environmental Sciences (now Department of Environmental Quality) to delegate to properly designated local agents enforcement of the statutes and rules governing the underground storage tank program, and local agents may use any enforcement methods available to the Department. Letters of designation issued by the Department delegating authority to local agents are an appropriate method for delegation as long as the letters clearly define the rights, duties, and responsibilities of the Department and local agents. 43 A.G. Local Billboard Regulations Not Violative of Due Process Right to Notice and Opportunity to Be Heard: Plaintiff contended that city and county billboard regulations violated due process because they did not guarantee a hearing before deprivation of property. The Supreme Court disagreed. The Board of Adjustment was responsible for hearing appeals that allege an error related to enforcement of the ordinances. The Board was bound by known procedures and there was a right to appeal a Board decision to a court of record, so only under exceptional circumstances that did not apply to plaintiff could the city or county deprive someone of property without a hearing. The procedural safeguards provided for in the ordinances were sufficient and did not violate due process. Mont. Media, Inc. v. Flathead County, 2003 MT 23, 314 M 121, 63 P3d 1129 (2003).

Land Designated as "Commercial or Industrial" Activity — Issuance of Billboard Permit Upheld: The plaintiffs sued the Department of Transportation, seeking to remove two billboards from a neighboring 270-acre parcel of land for which the Department had issued a permit under the Outdoor Advertising Act, Title 75, chapter 15, part 1. The plaintiffs argued that the activity was temporary and that the entire 270-acre parcel was not the site of an industrial activity since the parcel owners were allowed to mine only a small portion of the parcel. The District Court upheld the Department's decision, concluding that the issuance of the permit was not arbitrary, capricious, or in violation of the law. The Supreme Court affirmed, concluding that the Department based its decision to issue the permit on sufficient evidence: the business activities near the location of the billboards included both mining and construction operations and therefore constituted "commercial or industrial activities" within the meaning of the Act. Hobble Diamond Ranch, LLC v. Dept. of Transportation, 2012 MT 10, 363 Mont. 310, 268 P.3d 31.

75-15-104. More restrictive regulations preserved.

Case Notes

Commercial Versus Noncommercial Speech — Analysis to Determine Validity of Commercial Speech Restriction — Local Government Billboard Prohibitions Not Overreaching: Plaintiff petitioned for a declaratory judgment requesting that city and county zoning regulations for off-premises signs and billboards be declared unconstitutional and violative of the state Outdoor Advertising Act. The petition was denied and plaintiff appealed. The Supreme Court noted that under Metromedia, Inc. v. San Diego, 453 US 490 (1981), commercial and noncommercial speech enjoy different constitutional free speech protections, and that commercial speech is afforded less constitutional protection than noncommercial speech. Commercial speech may be regulated in situations in which noncommercial speech may not. In determining the validity of a commercial speech restriction, pursuant to Cent. Hudson Gas & Elec. v. Pub. Serv. Comm'n, 447 US 557 (1980): (1) commercial speech must concern a lawful activity and may not be misleading to be protected; (2) there must be a substantial government interest for adopting a commercial speech regulation; (3) if the speech is protected and a substantial government interest exists, the regulation must directly advance the asserted government objective; and (4) the regulation must reach no further than to achieve that objective. Despite subsequent holdings related to other forms of media, Metromedia remains the controlling law in billboard cases. Here, the first prong of the Metromedia test was not disputed. With regard to the second prong, the parties conceded that aesthetics and safety constituted substantial government interests. Further, the ordinances in question directly advanced the government's goal of reducing visual blight and traffic hazards, meeting the third prong of the test. Last, because the ordinances prohibited billboards only in residential areas and restricted billboard use in commercially zoned areas, speech was restricted no more than necessary to achieve the government objectives, so the fourth prong of the test was also met. Thus, the validity of the zoning ordinances was affirmed. Mont. Media, Inc. v. Flathead County, 2003 MT 23, 314 M 121, 63 P3d 1129 (2003).

Disparate Government Treatment of Outdoor Signs Not Violative of Equal Protection: Plaintiff contended that the disparate treatment of outdoor signs under city and county zoning ordinances was violative of equal protection because the city of Whitefish did not regulate its own "Welcome to Whitefish" sign in the same manner as other off-premises signs. The Supreme Court found no constitutional violation. In contrast to plaintiff's sign, the welcome sign did not advertise an establishment, merchandise, service, or entertainment located elsewhere. Further, the welcome sign fit within the official government sign exemption in the city ordinance. The city's disparate treatment of the signs did not violate equal protection guarantees because the signs in question were not of the same class. Mont. Media, Inc. v. Flathead County, 2003 MT 23, 314 M 121, 63 P3d 1129 (2003).

Local Billboard Regulations Not Violative of Due Process Right to Notice and Opportunity to Be Heard: Plaintiff contended that city and county billboard regulations violated due process because they did not guarantee a hearing before deprivation of property. The Supreme Court disagreed. The Board of Adjustment was responsible for hearing appeals that allege an error related to enforcement of the ordinances. The Board was bound by known procedures and there was a right to appeal a Board decision to a court of record, so only under exceptional circumstances that did not apply to plaintiff could the city or county deprive someone of property without a hearing. The procedural safeguards provided for in the ordinances were sufficient and did not violate due process. Mont. Media, Inc. v. Flathead County, 2003 MT 23, 314 M 121, 63 P3d 1129 (2003).

Local Ordinance Restricting Billboards Not Considered Unconstitutional Prior Restraint on Commercial Speech: Under Desert Outdoor Advertising, Inc. v. Moreno Valley, 103 F3d 814 (9th Cir. 1996), an ordinance or regulation that subjects protected speech to prior restraint without narrow, objective, and definite standards to guide permitting officials violates the federal constitutional right to free speech. The law may not condition the exercise of free speech on the unbridled discretion of permitting officials. In the case at bar, city and county ordinances governing billboards provided objective guidelines for the issuance of billboard permits that allowed permitting officials little discretion in deciding whether to grant a permit and thus did not create an unconstitutional prior restraint on speech. Mont. Media, Inc. v. Flathead County, 2003 MT 23, 314 M 121, 63 P3d 1129 (2003).

Local Ordinances Restricting Billboards Not Unconstitutionally Vague: Plaintiff contended that city and county zoning ordinances regulating billboards were vague and subject to inconsistent and arbitrary application. The Supreme Court cited Broers v. Dept. of Revenue, 237 M 367, 773 P2d 320 (1989), for the holding that a noncriminal statute or regulation is vague if a person of common intelligence must guess at its meaning, but is not vague simply because it can be dissected or subjected to different interpretations. The court went on to analyze the various provisions of the ordinances regarding political signs, holiday signs, and the distinction between offsite signs and billboards, but found that plaintiff failed to demonstrate that any of the definitions were unconstitutionally vague. Mont. Media, Inc. v. Flathead County, 2003 MT 23, 314 M 121, 63 P3d 1129 (2003).

Commercial speech may be regulated in situations in which noncommercial speech may not. In determining the validity of a commercial speech restriction, pursuant to Cent. Hudson Gas & Elec. v. Pub. Serv. Comm'n, 447 US 557 (1980): (1) commercial speech must concern a lawful activity and may not be misleading to be protected; (2) there must be a substantial government interest for adopting a commercial speech regulation; (3) if the speech is protected and a substantial government interest exists, the regulation must directly advance the asserted government objective; and (4) the regulation must reach no further than to achieve that objective. Despite subsequent holdings related to other forms of media, Metromedia remains the controlling law in billboard cases. Here, the first prong of the Metromedia test was not disputed. With regard to the second prong, the parties conceded that aesthetics and safety constituted substantial government interests. Further, the ordinances in question directly advanced the government's goal of reducing visual blight and traffic hazards, meeting the third prong of the test. Last, because the ordinances prohibited billboards only in residential areas and restricted billboard use in commercially zoned areas, speech was restricted no more than necessary to achieve the government objectives, so the fourth prong of the test was also met. Thus, the validity of the zoning ordinances was affirmed. Mont. Media, Inc. v. Flathead County, 2003 MT 23, 314 M 121, 63 P3d 1129 (2003).

Disparate Government Treatment of Outdoor Signs Not Violative of Equal Protection: Plaintiff contended that the disparate treatment of outdoor signs under city and county zoning ordinances was violative of equal protection because the city of Whitefish did not regulate its own "Welcome to Whitefish" sign in the same manner as other off-premises signs. The Supreme Court found no constitutional violation. In contrast to plaintiff's sign, the welcome sign did not advertise an establishment, merchandise, service, or entertainment located elsewhere. Further, the welcome sign fit within the official government sign exemption in the city ordinance. The city's disparate treatment of the signs did not violate equal protection guarantees because the signs in question were not of the same class. Mont. Media, Inc. v. Flathead County, 2003 MT 23, 314 M 121, 63 P3d 1129 (2003).

Local Ordinance Restricting Billboards Not Considered Unconstitutional Prior Restraint on Commercial Speech: Under Desert Outdoor Advertising, Inc. v. Moreno Valley, 103 F3d 814 (9th Cir. 1996), an ordinance or regulation that subjects protected speech to prior restraint without narrow, objective, and definite standards to guide permitting officials violates the federal constitutional right to free speech. The law may not condition the exercise of free speech on the unbridled discretion of permitting officials. In the case at bar, city and county ordinances governing billboards provided objective guidelines for the issuance of billboard permits that allowed permitting officials little discretion in deciding whether to grant a permit and thus did not create an unconstitutional prior restraint on speech. Mont. Media, Inc. v. Flathead County, 2003 MT 23, 314 M 121, 63 P3d 1129 (2003).

Local Ordinances Restricting Billboards Not Unconstitutionally Vague: Plaintiff contended that city and county zoning ordinances regulating billboards were vague and subject to inconsistent and arbitrary application. The Supreme Court cited Broers v. Dept. of Revenue, 237 M 367, 773 P2d 320 (1989), for the holding that a noncriminal statute or regulation is vague if a person of common intelligence must guess at its meaning, but is not vague simply because it can be dissected or subjected to different interpretations. The court went on to analyze the various provisions of the ordinances regarding political signs, holiday signs, and the distinction between offsite signs and billboards, but found that plaintiff failed to demonstrate that any of the definitions were unconstitutionally vague. Mont. Media, Inc. v. Flathead County, 2003 MT 23, 314 M 121, 63 P3d 1129 (2003).

Attorney General's Opinions

Revenue Department Not Zoning Authority — Designation of Property for Assessment Purposes Only: The Department of Revenue is not a bona fide zoning authority that may designate an area as commercial for outdoor advertising purposes. Commercial Versus Noncommercial Speech — Analysis to Determine Validity of Commercial Speech Restriction — Local Government Billboard Prohibitions Not Overreaching: Plaintiff petitioned for a declaratory judgment requesting that city and county zoning regulations for off-premises signs and billboards be declared unconstitutional and violative of the state Outdoor Advertising Act. The petition was denied and plaintiff appealed. The Supreme Court noted that under Metromedia, Inc. v. San Diego, 453 US 490 (1981), commercial and noncommercial speech enjoy different constitutional free speech protections, and that commercial speech is afforded less constitutional protection than noncommercial speech. Commercial speech may be regulated in situations in which noncommercial speech may not. In determining the validity of a commercial speech restriction, pursuant to Cent. Hudson Gas & Elec. v. Pub. CHAPTER 16
TRANSBOUNDARY POLLUTION

Part 1
Uniform Transboundary Pollution Reciprocal Access Act

Part Compiler's Comments

Uniform Law: This part contains the provisions of the Uniform Transboundary Pollution Reciprocal Access Act as promulgated by the National Conference of Commissioners on Uniform State Laws and enacted in Montana.

75-16-101. Short title.

Commissioners' Note

In 1979, the Canadian Bar Association and the American Bar Association each adopted a report prepared by a joint committee of the two Associations on "The Settlement of International Disputes Between Canada and the United States of America." One of the areas on which the report focused was the equalization of rights and remedies of citizens in Canada and the U.S.A. affected by pollution emanating from the other jurisdiction. The Committee drafted enacting legislation on this topic, in treaty form, basing its draft upon the Organization for Economic Co-operation and Development's Recommendation for the Implementation of A Regime of Equal Right of Access and Non-Discrimination in Relation to Transfrontier Pollution.

The ABA-CBA Committee's Report suggested that a liaison group ought to be established between the National Conference of Commissioners on Uniform State Laws and the Uniform Law Conference of Canada, the two organizations in their respective countries dedicated to the promotion of uniformity of law. The group was to have a mandate covering review, co-ordination and drafting of legislation on topics of mutual interest. The liaison committee was established in 1979 and has held five meetings in Canada and the U.S. to discuss the drafting of a Transboundary Pollution Reciprocal Access Act.

Pollution is no respecter of artificial lines on maps. Damage can occur in one jurisdiction from pollution produced in another jurisdiction. Reported caselaw reveals many examples of this phenomenon. A discharge of waste into a river in one jurisdiction can damage property in states downstream: see for example Missouri v. Illinois, 26 S.Ct. 268, 200 U.S. 496, 50 L.Ed.2d 572 (1906). Smoke can blow from one adjoining city to another; see for example Michie et al. v. Great Lakes Steel Division, National Steel Corporation, 495 F.2d 213 (6th Circ.), certiorari denied 95 S.Ct. 310, 419 U.S. 997, 42 L.Ed.2d 270. Metal smelters can generate pollutants that can travel into other jurisdictions: see for example The Trail Smelter Arbitration, 3 U.N.R.I.A.A. 1905 (1941) or Ducktown Sulphur, Copper and Iron Company v. Barnes et al., 60 S.W. 593 (Tenn. 1900). At times, pollution from a number of jurisdictions may contribute to the damage; see for example Ohio v. Wyandotte Chemicals Corp. et al., 91 S.Ct. 1005, 401 U.S. 493, 28 L.Ed.2d 256 (1971). Pollution crossing boundaries may take a variety of forms ranging from simple escapes between adjacent land to immensely difficult problems, such as acid rain and nuclear emissions whose very complexity renders them as intractable to coherent policy or legislative treatment as they are to definitive scientific analysis and explanation.

It is a generally recognized rule of law in the Anglo-American tradition that actions for damages for trespass, nuisance, or negligent injury in respect to lands located in another state are local actions and may be brought only in the state where the land is situated. This rule has been criticized, but most courts still follow it. Its significance is that unless the alleged tortfeasor can be "found" in the state where the injury took place, an action for damages is for all intents and purposes precluded.

When only states of the United States are involved, the increasing number of state long-arm statutes may reduce the significance of this rule because valid in personam jurisdiction over the defendant can be obtained under a long-arm statute and judgment rendered, and that judgment is entitled to full faith and credit within the United States. But even if a long-arm statute is involved, two suits may be necessary—the first to obtain the judgment and a second in another state to enforce the judgment. Furthermore, whether equitable relief will be granted by the second state, is open to question.

If there is no long-arm statute, or it is not as extensive as it might be, and the prospective defendant is not "found" within the jurisdiction where the injury occurred, then the plaintiff, for all practical purposes, is without a forum. The problem can become acute in an international setting. Suppose that on the northern shore of Lake Ontario there is a manufacturing plant that regularly emits highly toxic materials into the air and these are carried by the prevailing winds across Lake Ontario and into the State of New York. A fish hatchery there is severely damaged. Assuming that a person in New York, who is damaged can establish causation, can he bring suit?

The Canadian courts will probably not entertain the action because of the rule in British South Africa Co. v. Companhia de Mozambique, [1893] AC 602 (H.L.). The New York state courts could entertain the action, but would they be able to acquire personal jurisdiction over the Canadian defendant in order to permit the action to proceed? Under the New York State long-arm statute, N.Y.C.P.L.R. §302, perhaps it could; and perhaps New York would reduce the claim to a money judgment. But no Canadian court would be bound by the doctrine of full faith and credit, and the chances are great that a judgment of a United State court reached upon a long-arm statute would not be honored by a Canadian court.

In British South Africa Company v. Companhia de Mozambique, the House of Lords decided that only the courts of a jurisdiction where an immovable is situated can adjudicate upon its title. An English court thus had no jurisdiction to try a damage action for trespass to land situated abroad. Courts in Canada have extended this rule to an extreme. Dealing with an action in New Brunswick for damages to Quebec land caused by the negligent blocking of an interprovincial river, Chief Justice Baxter of New Brunswick stated:

". . . whether title to land comes into question or not appears to be immaterial. The moment it appears that the controversy relates to land in a foreign country our jurisdiction is excluded:"

Albert v. Fraser Companies Ltd., [1937] 1 D.L.R. 39, 45, 11 M.P.R. 209, 216 [N.B.C.A.]. Applying this rule to transboundary pollution, it would prevent an American citizen from suing in Canadian courts for damage caused by a Canadian polluter, if the controversy relates in any way to land in the United States. The same obstacle for Canadians is created in the United States by the "local action rule," established in Livingston v. Jefferson, 15 Fed.Cas. 660 (No. 8411) (Cir. Ct.D.Va. 1811).

This Act is designed to eliminate this particular problem with respect to pollution. While conceptually the Act could be extended to deal with all unintentional tort actions affecting property, the Committee's mandate, and indeed the earlier work of the Joint ABA/CBA Committee and the OECD, was limited to interjurisdictional pollution problems and the difficulties which the local action rule presented in preventing non-resident litigants getting inside the courthouse door. Whether the pollution originated in Ontario or Ohio, a New Yorker injured in New York thereby, would be entitled to go into a Canadian court or an Ohio court and maintain an action for damages for injury to New York land. In other words, this proposed statute abrogates the rules in Livingston v. Jefferson and British South Africa Co. v. Companhia de Mozambique, which many believe to be anachronisms in any event.

The basic thrust of reform is to change the local action rules and provide equal access for the victims of transfrontier pollution to the courts of the jurisdiction where the contaminant originated.

The proposed statute also provides that in the event suit is brought in the province or state where the alleged pollution actually originated, the local law of that state (as distinguished from its whole law including conflict of laws rule) applies. This means that an alleged polluter sued in the state where the alleged pollution originated is governed by the substantive laws of that jurisdiction. Insofar as the courts of that state are concerned, he has one standard to meet, and he has the opportunity to defend the action on the basis of the substantive and procedural rules with which he is most familiar. Everyone would prefer to be sued in the courts of his own jurisdiction.

Of course, if service of process is achieved in the state where the pollution actually caused harm, then that state would be free, within constitutional restraints, to apply either its own law or the law of the state where the alleged pollution originated. That situation is not changed by this Act. Although total uniformity and predictability are not established, an injured party will know when choosing a particular court what law will be applied. The Act is designed to fill a procedural gap, and is not intended to alter substantive laws or standards, or change the ground rules under which individuals, corporations, or governments conduct their affairs.

75-16-102. Definitions.

Commissioners' Note

The definition of "jurisdiction" performs a number of functions. It enables the Act to be applied in interstate and inter-provincial pollution actions, in addition to actions involving pollution spanning the U.S./Canada International boundary. The Act does not apply to U.S./Mexico transboundary pollution or to pollution from any other nation.

The reciprocal aspect of the Act is achieved by [subsection (2)] providing that both the "polluting" and "polluted" jurisdictions must have "enacted this Act" or "provide substantially equivalent access to the courts and administrative agencies." The requirement of reciprocity applies to access only. This threshold test is applied by the courts in the U.S. on a case by case basis, it being regarded as a question of fact whether a particular jurisdiction is a reciprocating jurisdiction. In Canada, by contrast, it is usual for reciprocity to be formally recognized through provincial governments designating by regulation lists of reciprocating states, where they are satisfied that reciprocity exists. For jurisdictions, such as Minnesota by judicial decision and New York by statute, that already provide access to their courts for non-resident pollution victims by abandoning the rule of Livingston v. Jefferson, the words "provide substantially equivalent access" ensure that these jurisdictions will be recognized as reciprocating jurisdictions without the need to enact formally the Act. Finally, it should be noted that [subsection (2)] concludes with the words "access to the courts and administrative agencies," a specific reference to the fact that it is contemplated that the Act will also apply to proceedings before tribunals.

The definition of "person" derives from standard wording used in many uniform acts adopted by the National Conference of Commissioners on Uniform State Laws. It is designed to include all natural and legal persons within the ambit of the Act. In addition, if the Attorney General, or another public official of the state or province where the injury occurred, is able to bring an action with respect to environmental injury, then the Attorney General of another state harmed by the "originating state's" pollution should also be able to bring an action in the "originating state."

75-16-103. Forum.

Commissioners' Note

Together with [75-16-104], this section forms the main operative provision of the statute. [This section] provides access to the courts in one jurisdiction for pollution victims in another jurisdiction. A question may arise whether the pollution originated in a particular jurisdiction, and this is a question of fact which the courts must decide. It should be noted that the statute is not restricted in its scope to civil trials; it also extends to other proceedings before tribunals concerning environmental injury or threatened injury.

As used in this Act, "injury" includes wrongful death and "property" includes both real and personal property.

It has been suggested that enactment of this proposed statute would cause a rush of litigants from out of state to the state where the alleged pollution originated or where it may originate. So far as is known states with very extensive long-arm statutes have not experienced this rush of litigation, and this suggests that it would not happen if a new, and less convenient forum was made available to them.

75-16-104. Right to relief.

Commissioners' Note

This section equates the rights of an extra-jurisdictional pollution victim to those of a victim who is a resident of the jurisdiction. It is designed to ensure that the actual or potential victim of transfrontier pollution will have a remedy in the courts of the jurisdiction where the pollution originated, if a victim residing in that jurisdiction would have had a remedy for injury or threatened injury in the case of pollution caused locally. Whether or not particular pollution did originate in a jurisdiction is a question of fact for the court to decide.

Compiler's Comments

2009 Amendment: Chapter 56 made section gender neutral. Amendment effective October 1, 2009.

75-16-105. Applicable law.

Commissioners' Note

This section provides that the law of this jurisdiction will apply in actions brought under the Act. In the United States this includes federal, state and local law where applicable. The applicable law is defined to exclude choice of law rules so as to avoid the whole problem of renvoi. While the Committee initially considered drafting a definition of "pollution" for inclusion in this Act, it was decided that it would be exceptionally difficult to draft such a definition without it degenerating into an unmanageable "shopping list" and difficult to harmonize such a list in practice with the definitions provided in the substantive law of a particular jurisdiction. Jurisdictions differ markedly in their treatment of matters such as smells, radiation, vibration, and visual pollution. To avoid difficulties in interpretation, it was decided that what constitutes pollution would be decided by reference to the law of an enacting jurisdiction; such a definition might encompass both statutory definitions as well as any applicable judicial decisions under the common law. It is contemplated that it would include but not be limited to discharges and emissions into land, air or water.

75-16-107. Right additional to other rights.

Commissioners' Note

[This section and 75-16-106] clarify that the Act is designed to put non-residents on the same footing as residents with respect to access to courts and tribunals in claims involving transboundary pollution. The rights of non-residents under this Act will be no higher than those of residents, and they must accept any procedural or substantive limitations that may happen to exist under the applicable law of the originating jurisdiction. [This section] ensures that the right of access provided by the Act is supplementary and is not intended in any way to diminish existing rights under the laws of this jurisdiction, which may be enforced independently of this Act.

Commissioners' Note

[This section and a similar section which was drafted for adoption in Canada] are provided to deal with the question of sovereign or crown immunity, and to ensure that extra-jurisdictional actions will be treated under the doctrines in the same way as actions brought by residents.

CHAPTER 20
MAJOR FACILITY SITING

Chapter Compiler's Comments

Reports: Section 10, Ch. 583, L. 1995 provided: "The department of natural resources and conservation [now department of environmental quality] shall prepare and present a report to the 55th legislature with recommendations for improving and modernizing the Montana Major Facility Siting Act. The department shall convene a state dialogue to develop the report and recommendations. The participants in the dialogue shall represent a broad spectrum of interests affected by the siting, construction, and operation of major facilities, including utilities, energy development groups, interested industries, ratepayers, regulators, landowners, and citizen groups. The dialogue is to be designed to seek the involvement of a broad range of affected interest groups in the discussions of reforming the Montana Major Facility Siting Act, with the express intent of eliciting a consensus. The consensus developing process must use a facilitator who is not an employee of the department."

Chapter Case Notes

Public Utility — Authority for Condemnation: In a condemnation proceeding, the District Court dismissed a public utility's complaint for condemnation on the basis that the utility did not possess the power of eminent domain and had no authority to take private property. The Supreme Court reversed on the basis that the District Court's order conflicted with HB 198 (Ch. 321, L. 2011), which clarified a public utility's eminent domain power, codified that authority into the Major Facility Siting Act, and applied retroactively to the issues in the case. MATL, LLP v. Salois, 2011 MT 126, 360 Mont. 510, 255 P.3d 158.

Montana Major Facility Siting Act — Procedural Satisfaction of Due Process: The procedural requirements of the Montana Major Facility Siting Act meet the requirements of due process under the Montana Constitution. Mont. Power Co. v. Fondren, 226 M 500, 737 P2d 1138, 44 St. Rep. 850 (1987).

Siting Act Decision Not Estoppel for PSC Ratemaking Decision: In 1973, Montana Power Company (MPC) filed an application for a certificate of environmental compatibility and public need for Colstrip Units 3 and 4 under the Montana Major Facility Siting Act. In granting the certificate, the Board of Natural Resources and Conservation (now Board of Environmental Review) found that there was a need for the energy which would be produced and that the units would serve the public interest, convenience, and necessity. After Unit 3 was completed, MPC filed an application with the Public Service Commission (PSC) to increase electric rates to reflect Unit 3 in its rate base. At the rate hearing, the PSC took evidence regarding whether Unit 3 was "used and useful". MPC moved to strike this testimony, contending the PSC was precluded from considering this by the certificate of need issued under the Siting Act. MPC filed an application for original jurisdiction and declaratory judgment or other appropriate relief with the Supreme Court. The PSC later concluded Unit 3 was not used and useful and could not be included in the rate base. MPC argued that the PSC was collaterally estopped from considering whether Unit 3 was "used and useful". The court held that the need issue determined in the siting process was not identical to the used and useful issue, therefore collateral estoppel was not applicable. MPC also argued that because of the certificate of need, the state was promissorily estopped from excluding Unit 3 from the rate base. MPC contended that issuance of a certificate of need under the Siting Act established a contractual relationship between the state and MPC. The court held that issuance of a certificate by a governmental authority to engage in conduct that would be improper without a certificate does not create a contractual relationship between the state and the licensee. Neither the Siting Act nor the certificate of need contemplate a promise that a facility will be included in a utility's rate base. Promissory estoppel was also inapplicable. Mont. Power Co. v. P.S.C., 214 M 82, 692 P2d 432, 41 St. Rep. 2332 (1984).

Siting Act Not Implied Repeal of "Used and Useful" for Ratemaking: In 1973, Montana Power Company (MPC) filed an application for a certificate of environmental compatibility and public need for Colstrip Units 3 and 4 under the Montana Major Facility Siting Act. In granting the certificate, the Board of Natural Resources and Conservation (now Board of Environmental Review) found that there was a need for the energy which would be produced and that the units would serve the public interest, convenience, and necessity. After Unit 3 was completed, MPC filed an application with the Public Service Commission (PSC) to increase electric rates to reflect Unit 3 in its rate base. At the rate hearing, the PSC took evidence regarding whether Unit 3 was "used and useful". MPC moved to strike this testimony, contending the PSC was precluded from considering this by the certificate of need issued under the Siting Act. MPC filed an application for original jurisdiction and declaratory judgment or other appropriate relief with the Supreme Court. The PSC later concluded Unit 3 was not used and useful and could not be included in the rate base. The Supreme Court found that while the Siting Act includes factors which can be associated with the used and useful concept of utility regulation, the primary purposes of the Siting Act are to ensure minimal environmental, natural resource, and social impacts. The need determination is related primarily to environmental protection rather than rate base treatment for the facility. Once the facility is constructed, the PSC has jurisdiction to determine whether the facility is actually used and useful and whether the facility's output is required by the ratepayers. The Siting Act and the utility regulation statutes are reconcilable. The Siting Act did not impliedly repeal the PSC's authority to determine whether a facility is used and useful for ratemaking. Mont. Power Co. v. P.S.C., 214 M 82, 692 P2d 432, 41 St. Rep. 2332 (1984).

2011 Amendment: Chapter 224 inserted (5) relating to increasing the capacity of existing transmission lines; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective April 18, 2011.

Applicability: Section 4, Ch. 224, L. 2011, provided: "[This act] applies to applications for certificates filed after [the effective date of this act]." Effective April 18, 2011.

2003 Amendments — Composite Section: Chapter 217 inserted (3) providing that certain inalienable rights are constitutionally declared in this state and that balancing those rights is necessary to maintain a sustainable quality of life; in (4) at end of first sentence after "products" deleted "and that these facilities have an effect on the environment, an impact on population concentration, and an effect on the welfare of the citizens of this state" and in second sentence near middle after "geothermal facilities" substituted "are in compliance with state law and" for "will not produce unacceptable adverse effects on the environment and upon the citizens of this state by providing" and near end after "certificate of" substituted "compliance" for "environmental compatibility"; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective April 3, 2003.

Chapter 361 inserted (1) relating to constitutional obligations and legislative intent; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective April 16, 2003.

Preamble: The preamble attached to Ch. 361, L. 2003, provided: "WHEREAS, Article II, section 3, of the Montana Constitution enumerates certain inalienable individual rights, including the right to a clean and healthful environment, the right of pursuing life's basic necessities, the right of enjoying and defending an individual's life and liberty, the right of acquiring, possessing, and protecting property, and the right of seeking individual safety, health, and happiness in all lawful ways; and

WHEREAS, the constitutionally enumerated rights are by their very nature bound to result in competing interests in specific fact situations; and

WHEREAS, Article IX, section 1, of the Montana Constitution provides that the state and each person shall maintain and improve a clean and healthful environment in Montana for present and future generations and directs the Legislature to provide for the administration and enforcement of this duty and also directs the Legislature to provide adequate remedies for the protection of the environmental life support system from degradation and to provide adequate remedies to prevent unreasonable depletion and degradation of natural resources; and

WHEREAS, the Legislature has reviewed the intent of the framers of the 1972 Montana Constitution as evidenced in the verbatim transcripts of the constitutional convention; and

WHEREAS, there is no indication that one enumerated inalienable right is intended to supersede other inalienable rights, including the right to use property in all lawful means; and

WHEREAS, the Legislature, mindful of its constitutional obligation to provide for the administration and enforcement of the constitution, has enacted a comprehensive set of laws to accomplish the goals of the constitution, including the Montana Clean Indoor Air Act of 1979, Title 50, chapter 40, part 1, MCA; the Montana Environmental Policy Act, Title 75, chapter 1, parts 1 through 3, MCA; the Clean Air Act of Montana, Title 75, chapter 2, parts 1 through 4, MCA; water quality laws, Title 75, chapter 5, MCA; The Natural Streambed and Land Preservation Act of 1975, Title 75, chapter 7, part 1, MCA; The Montana Solid Waste Management Act, Title 75, chapter 10, part 2, MCA; The Montana Hazardous Waste Act, Title 75, chapter 10, part 4, MCA; the Comprehensive Environmental Cleanup and Responsibility Act, Title 75, chapter 10, part 7, MCA; the Montana Megalandfill Siting Act, sections 75-10-901 through 75-10-945, MCA; the Montana Underground Storage Tank Installer and Inspector Licensing and Permitting Act, Title 75, chapter 11, part 2, MCA; the Montana Underground Storage Tank Act, Title 75, chapter 11, part 5, MCA; the Montana Major Facility Siting Act, Title 75, chapter 20, MCA; the Open-Space Land and Voluntary Conservation Easement Act, Title 76, chapter 6, MCA; the Environmental Control Easement Act, Title 76, chapter 7, MCA; The Strip and Underground Mine Siting Act, Title 82, chapter 4, part 1, MCA; The Montana Strip and Underground Mine Reclamation Act, Title 82, chapter 4, part 2, MCA; The Opencut Mining Act, Title 82, chapter 4, part 4, MCA; and The Nongame and Endangered Species Conservation Act, Title 87, chapter 5, part 1, MCA."

Saving Clause: Section 19, Ch. 217, L. 2003, was a saving clause.

Severability: Section 20, Ch. 217, L. 2003, was a severability clause.

Section 39, Ch. 361, L. 2003, was a severability clause.

Retroactive Applicability: Section 41, Ch. 361, L. 2003, provided: "[This act] applies retroactively, within the meaning of 1-2-109, to actions for judicial review or other causes of action challenging the issuance of a permit, petition for review, amendment, license, arbitration, action, certificate, or inspection that are pending but not yet decided on or after [the effective date of this act]." Effective April 16, 2003.

2001 Amendment: Chapter 293 in (2) in first sentence after "additional" substituted "electric transmission facilities, pipeline facilities, or geothermal facilities" for "power or energy conversion facilities" and in two places in second sentence substituted reference to electric transmission facilities, pipeline facilities, or geothermal facilities for power or energy conversion facilities. Amendment effective April 20, 2001.

Saving Clause: Section 15, Ch. 293, L. 2001, was a saving clause.

1997 Amendment: Chapter 329 in (2), near beginning of last sentence, substituted "will not produce unacceptable adverse effects" for "will produce minimal adverse effects" and near end, after "environmental compatibility", deleted "and public need"; and inserted (3) concerning purpose of chapter. Amendment effective July 1, 1997.

Applicability: Section 26, Ch. 329, L. 1997 provided: "A person who, prior to January 1, 1997, has filed a correct and complete air quality permit application with the department of environmental quality for a power plant capable of generating less than 150 megawatts is not subject to the provisions of Title 75, chapter 20."

Case Notes

Siting Act Not Implied Repeal of "Used and Useful" for Ratemaking: In 1973, Montana Power Company (MPC) filed an application for a certificate of environmental compatibility and public need for Colstrip Units 3 and 4 under the Montana Major Facility Siting Act. In granting the certificate, the Board of Natural Resources and Conservation (now Board of Environmental Review) found that there was a need for the energy which would be produced and that the units would serve the public interest, convenience, and necessity. After Unit 3 was completed, MPC filed an application with the Public Service Commission (PSC) to increase electric rates to reflect Unit 3 in its rate base. At the rate hearing, the PSC took evidence regarding whether Unit 3 was "used and useful". MPC moved to strike this testimony, contending the PSC was precluded from considering this by the certificate of need issued under the Siting Act. MPC filed an application for original jurisdiction and declaratory judgment or other appropriate relief with the Supreme Court. The PSC later concluded Unit 3 was not used and useful and could not be included in the rate base. The Supreme Court found that while the Siting Act includes factors which can be associated with the used and useful concept of utility regulation, the primary purposes of the Siting Act are to ensure minimal environmental, natural resource, and social impacts. The need determination is related primarily to environmental protection rather than rate base treatment for the facility. Once the facility is constructed, the PSC has jurisdiction to determine whether the facility is actually used and useful and whether the facility's output is required by the ratepayers. The Siting Act and the utility regulation statutes are reconcilable. The Siting Act did not impliedly repeal the PSC's authority to determine whether a facility is used and useful for ratemaking. Mont. Power Co. v. P.S.C., 214 M 82, 692 P2d 432, 41 St. Rep. 2332 (1984).

Natural Gas Pipeline Not a "Facility" Under Siting Act: The Montana Power Company brought a condemnation action to acquire an easement for the construction of a natural gas pipeline. Regarding the issue of whether a natural gas pipeline is a "facility" under the Montana Major Facility Siting Act, the Supreme Court found that the common thread linking the defined facilities is the production by artificial means of an energy product through a conversion process. The key phrase is "conversion facilities". The extraction of natural gas and its transportation to the ultimate consumer do not involve conversion facilities. Mont. Power Co. v. Cremer, 182 M 277, 596 P2d 483, 36 St. Rep. 1158 (1979).

Federal Clean Air Act — Administrative Regulations — Effect — Remedies: In an action to enjoin the Environmental Protection Agency from mandating preconstruction review of electrical power facility, the U.S. District Court discussed many of the major issues involved in this type of case and found that the power companies (plaintiffs) were exempt from such review. Mont. Power Co. v. Environmental Protection Agency, 429 F. Supp. 683, 34 St. Rep. 30 (D.C. Mont. 1977).

75-20-103. Chapter supersedes other laws or rules.

Case Notes

Issuance of Certificate of Environmental Compatibility and Public Need — No District Court Jurisdiction to Determine Public Necessity: Once a certificate of environmental compatibility and public need was issued by the Board of Natural Resources and Conservation (now Board of Environmental Review), the District Court had no jurisdiction to determine the existence of public necessity with respect to a proposed electric transmission line under the Montana Utility Siting Act of 1973 (now the Montana Major Facility Siting Act) since that determination had already been made by the Board pursuant to the Act. Mont. Power Co. v. Fondren, 226 M 500, 737 P2d 1138, 44 St. Rep. 850 (1987).

Limitation of Court Jurisdiction in Centerline Determination and Eminent Domain — Noncontested Case Procedure: The Legislature did not intend the final electric transmission line centerline determination by the Board of Natural Resources and Conservation (now Board of Environmental Review) to be subject to judicial review, and once the Board sets the specific route, no court has jurisdiction to hear challenges to the location. Through enactment of 75-20-205(2) (now repealed) and 75-20-407, court jurisdiction in eminent domain cases was limited to hearing challenges to the necessity of taking private property. The preponderance of the evidence on 70-30-111 findings that must be proven to the court before a preliminary condemnation order is issued is satisfied by appending to the complaint the Board's certificate of environmental compatibility and public need and the Board's findings of fact, opinion, decision, order, and recommendations. In cases where landowners feel conditions of the certificate were breached, proper remedy lies in a mandamus action under 75-20-404. Mont. Power Co. v. Fondren, 226 M 500, 737 P2d 1138, 44 St. Rep. 850 (1987).

2011 Amendments — Composite Section: Chapter 19 in definition of facility after "means" inserted "subject to 75-20-1202"; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective October 1, 2011.

Chapter 224 in definition of facility in (a)(ii) after "69 kilovolts" deleted "but less than 230 kilovolts", in (a)(iii) substituted "lines that are collectively less than 150 miles in length and are required under state or federal regulations and laws, with respect to reliability of service, for" for "line that is less than 150 miles in length and extends from", substituted "to interconnect to a regional transmission grid or secure firm transmission service to use the grid" for "to the point at which the transmission line connects to a regional transmission grid at an existing transmission substation or other facility", after "construct the line" inserted "or lines", and at end inserted "or centerlines", in (a)(iv) inserted "of a design capacity of 50 kilovolts or more", after "line's capacity" deleted "to less than or equal to 230 kilovolts", and at end inserted provision requiring conformance to standards; in definition of upgrade inserted (e) relating to additional circuits; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective April 18, 2011.

Chapter 309 in definition of facility in (a)(iii) inserted "or energy storage facility", inserted (a)(vi) excluding energy storage facility, and in (c) at end inserted exception clause; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective October 1, 2011.

Chapter 382 inserted definition of transmission reliability agencies; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective May 12, 2011.

Applicability: Section 4, Ch. 224, L. 2011, provided: "[This act] applies to applications for certificates filed after [the effective date of this act]." Effective April 18, 2011.

Section 5, Ch. 382, L. 2011, provided: "[This act] applies to applications for a certificate under the Major Facility Siting Act filed on or after [the effective date of this act]." Effective May 12, 2011.

2009 Amendments — Composite Section: Chapter 357 in definition of facility in (a)(iii) near beginning after "facility" inserted "or biomass generation facility". Amendment effective October 1, 2009.

Chapter 469 in definition of facility in (a)(iv) in first sentence substituted "increase that line's capacity to less than or equal to 230 kilovolts, including construction outside the existing easement" for "increase that line's capacity within an existing easement", inserted second sentence providing certain requirements for newly acquired easement or right-of-way; and in (c) near middle substituted "50 megawatts" for "25 million Btu's per hour"; inserted definition of sensitive areas; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective May 6, 2009.

Applicability: Section 6, Ch. 357, L. 2009, provided: "[This act] applies to tax years beginning after December 31, 2009."

Section 3, Ch. 469, L. 2009, provided: "[This act] applies to applications filed after [the effective date of this act]." Effective May 6, 2009.

2007 Amendment: Chapter 260 in definition of facility in (a)(iii) inserted reference to wind generation facility; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective October 1, 2007.

2005 Amendment: Chapter 142 in definition of associated facilities in (a) after "pipelines" deleted "transmission substations" and in (b) after "include" inserted "a transmission substation, a switchyard, voltage support, or other control equipment or"; in definition of facility inserted (a)(iv) providing that facility does not include upgrade to existing transmission line to increase line's capacity within existing easement or right-of-way and inserted (a)(v) providing that facility does not include transmission substation, switchyard, voltage support, or control equipment; inserted definition of upgrade; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective March 30, 2005.

2003 Amendments — Composite Section: Chapter 217 in definition of certificate after "certificate of" substituted "compliance" for "environmental compatibility". Amendment effective April 3, 2003.

Chapter 324 in definition of facility inserted (a)(iii) relating to certain lines connecting an electrical generation facility to a regional transmission grid; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective April 15, 2003.

Preamble: The preamble attached to Ch. 514, L. 2003, provided: "WHEREAS, prior to 2001, the Montana Major Facility Siting Act applied to pipelines greater than 17 inches in inside diameter; and

WHEREAS, Chapter 293, Laws of 2001, amended the Montana Major Facility Siting Act so as to apply to those pipelines greater than 25 inches in inside diameter; and

WHEREAS, the applicability clause of Chapter 293, Laws of 2001, excluded pipelines 25 inches or less in inside diameter that were subject to a certificate of environmental compatibility on the day before the effective date of Chapter 293, Laws of 2001; and

WHEREAS, there is not any regulatory reason to continue the application of the Montana Major Facility Siting Act with respect to any pipeline 25 inches or less in inside diameter regardless of whether a pipeline was subject to a certificate of environmental compatibility issued under the Montana Major Facility Siting Act on or before April 19, 2001, and to do so would be to discriminate without reason between pipelines of the same or similar diameter; and

WHEREAS, the Legislature finds that it is appropriate to amend the applicability clause of Chapter 293, Laws of 2001, to make the substantive provisions of Chapter 293, Laws of 2001, apply to all pipelines 25 inches or less in inside diameter and to exempt from the Montana Major Facility Siting Act all, rather than some, pipelines 25 inches or less in inside diameter."

Saving Clause: Section 19, Ch. 217, L. 2003, was a saving clause.

Severability: Section 20, Ch. 217, L. 2003, was a severability clause.

Applicability: Section 3, Ch. 514, L. 2003, provided: "Section 17, Chapter 293, Laws of 2001, and [section 1 of this act] [amending sec. 17, Ch. 293, L. 2001] do not apply to reclamation bonds for pipelines and associated facilities held by the board of environmental review or the department of environmental quality until October 30, 2004."

2001 Amendment: Chapter 293 in middle of definition of associated facilities before "delivery" deleted "production or" and near end substituted "25 inches" for "17 inches"; in definition of facility deleted former (a) and (b) that read: "(a) except for crude oil and natural gas refineries and those facilities subject to The Montana Strip and Underground Mine Reclamation Act, each plant, unit, or other facility and associated facilities designed for or capable of:

(i) generating 250 megawatts of electricity or more or any addition thereto, except pollution control facilities approved by the department and added to an existing plant;

(ii) producing 25 million cubic feet or more of gas derived from coal per day or any addition thereto, except pollution control facilities approved by the department and added to an existing plant;

(iii) producing 25,000 barrels of liquid hydrocarbon products per day or more or any addition thereto, except pollution control facilities approved by the department and added to an existing plant;

(iv) enriching uranium minerals or any addition thereto; or

(v) for purposes of 75-20-204 only, generating 50 megawatts of hydroelectric power or more or any addition thereto;

(b) each plant, unit, or other facility and associated facilities generating less than 250 megawatts that would be defined in subsection (8)(a):

(i) emitting 300 tons a year of particulate matter at 10 microns or less;

(ii) that is not employing best available control technology pursuant to 42 U.S.C. 7479 or is not employing lowest achievable emission rates as required by Title 75, chapter 2, or rules adopted under Title 75, chapter 2;

(iii) directly affecting:

(A) a class I airshed as designated pursuant to 42 U.S.C. 7470, et seq.;

(B) a class I river or stream as designated pursuant to 33 U.S.C. 1251, et seq.;

(C) habitat used by a threatened or endangered species of plant or animal as designated pursuant to 16 U.S.C. 1531, et seq.; or

(D) one of the following exclusion areas:

(I) national wilderness areas designated pursuant to 16 U.S.C. 1131, et seq.;

(II) national primitive areas;

(III) national parks as designated pursuant to 16 U.S.C. 1a-1, et seq.;

(IV) rivers in the national wild and scenic river system as designated pursuant to 16 U.S.C. 1271, et seq.; or

(V) national wildlife refuges and ranges as designated pursuant to 16 U.S.C. 668dd, et seq.; or

(iv) that would require a permanent workforce greater than 300 workers", at beginning of (b)(i) deleted "except pipelines within the boundaries of the state that are used exclusively for the irrigation of agricultural crops", in middle substituted "greater than 25 inches" for "greater than 17 inches", substituted "50 miles" for "30 miles", and at end inserted exception clause, inserted (b)(i)(A) and (b)(i)(B) providing that facility does not include pipeline in state used exclusively for crop irrigation or drinking water or pipeline greater than 25 inches in inside diameter and 50 miles long with right-of-way agreements from 75% or more of owners, inserted (b)(ii) providing that facility includes pipeline greater than 17 inches in inside diameter and 30 miles long used to transport water-suspended coal, inserted (d) providing that facility includes plant, unit, or facility, subject to federal energy regulatory commission jurisdiction, capable of generating 50 megawatts of hydroelectric power or more, and deleted former (f) and (g) that read: "(f) any underground in situ gasification of coal; or

(g) an energy-related project for which the department has granted a petition pursuant to 75-20-201(5)"; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective April 20, 2001.

Saving Clause: Section 15, Ch. 293, L. 2001, was a saving clause.

Applicability: Section 17, Ch. 293, L. 2001, provided: "[This act] does not apply to any facility or associated facility under 75-20-104(8)(a), (8)(b), (8)(d), or (8)(f), as those subsections read on the day before [the effective date of this act] [effective April 20, 2001], that was subject to a certificate of environmental compatibility on [the effective date of this act]."

1999 Amendment: Chapter 13 in definition of facility at beginning of (d) inserted "except pipelines within the boundaries of the state that are used exclusively for the irrigation of agricultural crops". Amendment effective February 16, 1999.

1997 Amendment: Chapter 329 in definition of certificate substituted "compatibility issued by the department" for "compatibility and public need issued by the board"; in definition of facility, in (a)(i), substituted "250 megawatts" for "50 megawatts", inserted (b) relating to plants generating less than 250 megawatts, in (c)(ii), near beginning, substituted "but less than 230 kilovolts" for "and up to and including 115 kilovolts", and inserted (g) relating to energy-related projects; in definition of person inserted reference to limited liability company; adjusted subsection references; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective July 1, 1997.

Applicability: Section 26, Ch. 329, L. 1997 provided: "A person who, prior to January 1, 1997, has filed a correct and complete air quality permit application with the department of environmental quality for a power plant capable of generating less than 150 megawatts is not subject to the provisions of Title 75, chapter 20."

1995 Amendments — Composite Section: Chapter 418 in definition of Board substituted "board of environmental review provided for in 2-15-3502" for "board of natural resources and conservation provided for in 2-15-3302"; deleted former (5) that read: "(5) "Board of health" means the board of health and environmental sciences provided for in 2-15-2104"; in definition of Department substituted "department of environmental quality provided for in 2-15-3501" for "department of natural resources and conservation provided for in Title 2, chapter 15, part 33"; deleted former (9) that read: "(9) "Department of health" means the department of health and environmental sciences provided for in Title 2, chapter 15, part 21"; in definition of facility, in (a)(i) after "department", deleted "of health and environmental sciences"; adjusted subsection references; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective July 1, 1995.

Chapter 546 deleted definition of Board of Health that read: ""Board of health" means the board of health and environmental sciences provided for in 2-15-2104"; pursuant to sec. 568, Ch. 546, L. 1995, a coordination section, in definition of Department of Health and definition of facility, in (a)(i), the Code Commissioner substituted "department of environmental quality" for "department of health and environmental sciences"; adjusted subsection references; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective July 1, 1995.

Chapter 583 in definition of facility, in (a)(i), increased megawatts from 50 to 150 in temporary version, after "health" deleted "and environmental sciences", and at end deleted "having an estimated cost in excess of $10 million", in (a)(ii) and (a)(iii), at end, substituted "except pollution control facilities approved by the department of health and added to an existing plant" for "having an estimated cost in excess of $10 million", in (a)(iv), at end, deleted "having an estimated cost in excess of $10 million", substituted (a)(v) concerning facility generating 50 megawatts of hydroelectric power for purposes of 75-20-204 for facility "utilizing or converting 500,000 tons of coal per year or more or any addition thereto having an estimated cost in excess of $10 million", and at end of (d) substituted "except pollution control facilities approved by the department of health and added to an existing plant" for "having an estimated cost in excess of $750,000"; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective May 1, 1995.

Because Ch. 418 inserted a reference to the Board of Environmental Review and Ch. 546 deleted a reference to the Board of Health and Environmental Sciences, the codifier has reflected both the insertion and the deletion.

Because Ch. 418 transferred all responsibility for facilities to the Department of Environmental Quality, pursuant to sec. 568 and sec. 569, Ch. 546, the Code Commissioner has deleted the references to the Department "of Health" that was defined as the Department of Health and Environmental Sciences.

Transition: Section 499, Ch. 418, L. 1995, provided: "The provisions of 2-15-131 through 2-15-137 apply to [this act]."

Saving Clauses: Section 503, Ch. 418, L. 1995, was a saving clause.

Section 571, Ch. 546, L. 1995, was a saving clause.

Termination: Section 11, Ch. 583, L. 1995, provided: "The amendment to 75-20-104(10)(a)(i) contained in [section 1] [75-20-104] that increases the megawatts of electricity produced from "50" to "150" terminates on June 30, 1997."

Applicability: Section 12, Ch. 583, L. 1995, provided: "(1) A person who, between [the effective date of this act] [May 1, 1995] and June 30, 1997, has submitted a correct and complete application for all applicable air and water quality permits from the department of health and environmental sciences [now department of environmental quality] or has commenced to construct or commenced or applied to upgrade a power plant that has been designed for or will be capable of generating less than 150 megawatts is not subject to the provisions of Title 75, chapter 20.

(2) A person who, between [the effective date of this act] [May 1, 1995] and June 30, 1997, has filed an application for all applicable air and water quality permits from the department of health and environmental sciences [now department of environmental quality] for a power plant capable of generating less than 150 megawatts is not subject to the provisions of Title 75, chapter 20, if the application is correct and complete as of October 1, 1997."

1987 Amendment: Inserted (10)(b)(ii) establishing that facility does not include an electric transmission line with design capacity of greater than 69 kilovolts, including 115 kilovolts for which person planning to construct line has right-of-way agreements or options from more than 75% of owners who collectively own more than 75% of property along centerline.

Applicability: Section 6, Ch. 597, L. 1987, provided: "The provisions of this act do not apply to any transmission lines or associated facilities that have been certified under this chapter prior to the effective date of this act." Effective April 23, 1987.

1985 Amendment: In (3), near beginning after "diversion dams", inserted "pipelines" and at end, after "include a facility", inserted "or a natural gas or crude oil gathering line 17 inches or less in inside diameter"; in (10)(a) after "refineries", deleted "and facilities and associated facilities designed for or capable of producing, gathering, processing, transmitting, transporting, or distributing crude oil or natural gas"; and substituted present language of (10)(c) (see 1985 Session Law) for former (10)(c) that read: "each pipeline and associated facilities designed for or capable of transporting gas (except for natural gas), water, or liquid hydrocarbon products from or to a facility located within or without this state of the size indicated in subsection (10)(a) of this section".

1981 Amendment: Substituted "would significantly change the conditions under which the facility is operated" for "would significantly change the conditions under which the certificate was issued" at the end of (1); added facilities subject to The Montana Strip and Underground Mine Reclamation Act within the exception to the definition of facility in (10)(a); increased $250,000 to $10 million throughout (10)(a); deleted "refining" after "utilizing" in (10)(a)(v); and increased $250,000 to $750,000 at the end of (10)(d).

Case Notes

Natural Gas Pipeline Not a "Facility" Under Siting Act: The Montana Power Company brought a condemnation action to acquire an easement for the construction of a natural gas pipeline. Regarding the issue of whether a natural gas pipeline is a "facility" under the Montana Major Facility Siting Act, the Supreme Court found that the common thread linking the defined facilities is the production by artificial means of an energy product through a conversion process. The key phrase is "conversion facilities". The extraction of natural gas and its transportation to the ultimate consumer do not involve conversion facilities. (See 2001 amendment.) Mont. Power Co. v. Certification Proceedings

Part Case Notes

Limitation of Court Jurisdiction in Centerline Determination and Eminent Domain — Noncontested Case Procedure: The Legislature did not intend the final electric transmission line centerline determination by the Board of Natural Resources and Conservation (now Board of Environmental Review) to be subject to judicial review, and once the Board sets the specific route, no court has jurisdiction to hear challenges to the location. Through enactment of 75-20-407 and subsection (2) of 75-20-205 (now repealed), court jurisdiction in eminent domain cases was limited to hearing challenges to the necessity of taking private property. The preponderance of the evidence on 70-30-111 findings that must be proven to the court before a preliminary condemnation order is issued is satisfied by appending to the complaint the Board's certificate of environmental compatibility and public need and the Board's findings of fact, opinion, decision, order, and recommendations. In cases where landowners feel conditions of the certificate were breached, proper remedy lies in a mandamus action under 75-20-404. Mont. Power Co. v. Fondren, 226 M 500, 737 P2d 1138, 44 St. Rep. 850 (1987).

Bias of Hearing Officer Alleged to Deny Fair Hearing — No Prejudice Shown: The Board of Natural Resources and Conservation (now Board of Environmental Review) issued a certificate of environmental compatibility and public need under the Montana Utility Siting Act of 1973 (now the Montana Major Facility Siting Act of 1975). The plaintiff environmental association alleged the denial of its constitutional right to fair hearing as a result of the alleged prejudice of attorney Sabol, hearing officer and member of the Board. The Supreme Court found no denial of the plaintiff's constitutional right because: (1) Sabol's connection with another ski resort that might seek a certificate in the future was such as to make the plaintiff's claim of prejudice no more than tenuous; (2) any bias reflected in Sabol's comments to a newspaper reporter about the tactics of the plaintiff was not reflected at a hearing almost 2 months later; (3) directions to the defendant's counsel from Sabol to limit the scope of cross-examination were consistent with the fact that the parties took similar positions on the issue then in question; (4) even if Sabol was prejudiced he had either relinquished his position as hearing officer or was no longer serving on the Board itself when a decision was recommended to the Board and the Board acted on that recommendation; and (5) 75-20-220 (now repealed), specifying that a hearing officer may not be a member of the Board is inapplicable to this case because that section was enacted in 1975 and this case was tried under the law as passed in 1973. 2003 Amendments — Composite Section: Chapter 217 in (1) near end after "certificate of" substituted "compliance" for "environmental compatibility". Amendment effective April 3, 2003.

Chapter 361 inserted (7) relating to certain challenges having precedence in court and award of attorney fees and costs for certain challenges. Amendment effective April 16, 2003.

Preamble: The preamble attached to Ch. 361, L. 2003, provided: "WHEREAS, Article II, section 3, of the Montana Constitution enumerates certain inalienable individual rights, including the right to a clean and healthful environment, the right of pursuing life's basic necessities, the right of enjoying and defending an individual's life and liberty, the right of acquiring, possessing, and protecting property, and the right of seeking individual safety, health, and happiness in all lawful ways; and

WHEREAS, the constitutionally enumerated rights are by their very nature bound to result in competing interests in specific fact situations; and

WHEREAS, Article IX, section 1, of the Montana Constitution provides that the state and each person shall maintain and improve a clean and healthful environment in Montana for present and future generations and directs the Legislature to provide for the administration and enforcement of this duty and also directs the Legislature to provide adequate remedies for the protection of the environmental life support system from degradation and to provide adequate remedies to prevent unreasonable depletion and degradation of natural resources; and

WHEREAS, the Legislature has reviewed the intent of the framers of the 1972 Montana Constitution as evidenced in the verbatim transcripts of the constitutional convention; and

WHEREAS, there is no indication that one enumerated inalienable right is intended to supersede other inalienable rights, including the right to use property in all lawful means; and

WHEREAS, the Legislature, mindful of its constitutional obligation to provide for the administration and enforcement of the constitution, has enacted a comprehensive set of laws to accomplish the goals of the constitution, including the Montana Clean Indoor Air Act of 1979, Title 50, chapter 40, part 1, MCA; the Montana Environmental Policy Act, Title 75, chapter 1, parts 1 through 3, MCA; the Clean Air Act of Montana, Title 75, chapter 2, parts 1 through 4, MCA; water quality laws, Title 75, chapter 5, MCA; The Natural Streambed and Land Preservation Act of 1975, Title 75, chapter 7, part 1, MCA; The Montana Solid Waste Management Act, Title 75, chapter 10, part 2, MCA; The Montana Hazardous Waste Act, Title 75, chapter 10, part 4, MCA; the Comprehensive Environmental Cleanup and Responsibility Act, Title 75, chapter 10, part 7, MCA; the Montana Megalandfill Siting Act, sections 75-10-901 through 75-10-945, MCA; the Montana Underground Storage Tank Installer and Inspector Licensing and Permitting Act, Title 75, chapter 11, part 2, MCA; the Montana Underground Storage Tank Act, Title 75, chapter 11, part 5, MCA; the Montana Major Facility Siting Act, Title 75, chapter 20, MCA; the Open-Space Land and Voluntary Conservation Easement Act, Title 76, chapter 6, MCA; the Environmental Control Easement Act, Title 76, chapter 7, MCA; The Strip

Effective April 16, 2003.

1997 Amendment: Chapter 329 in (1), at beginning, inserted "Except for a facility under diligent onsite physical construction or in operation on January 1, 1973", after "environmental compatibility" deleted "and public need", and at end substituted "department" for "board"; in (4), near beginning, substituted "department" for "board"; inserted (5) concerning energy-related project; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective July 1, 1997.

Applicability: Section 26, Ch. 329, L. 1997 provided: "A person who, prior to January 1, 1997, has filed a correct and complete air quality permit application with the department of environmental quality for a power plant capable of generating less than 150 megawatts is not subject to the provisions of Title 75, chapter 20."

1983 Amendment: Inserted (5) providing that the Montana Major Facility Siting Act applies to federal facilities pursuant to federal law.

1978 Amendment by Initiative: Initiative No. 80, proposed by initiative petition and approved at the general election held November 7, 1978, amended this section to provide for voter approval of proposed nuclear power facilities. Amendment effective October 1, 1979.

Case Notes

Siting Act Not Implied Repeal of "Used and Useful" for Ratemaking: In 1973, Montana Power Company (MPC) filed an application for a certificate of environmental compatibility and public need for Colstrip Units 3 and 4 under the Montana Major Facility Siting Act. In granting the certificate, the Board of Natural Resources and Conservation (now Board of Environmental Review) found that there was a need for the energy which would be produced and that the units would serve the public interest, convenience, and necessity. After Unit 3 was completed, MPC filed an application with the Public Service Commission (PSC) to increase electric rates to reflect Unit 3 in its rate base. At the rate hearing, the PSC took evidence regarding whether Unit 3 was "used and useful". MPC moved to strike this testimony, contending the PSC was precluded from considering this by the certificate of need issued under the Siting Act. MPC filed an application for original jurisdiction and declaratory judgment or other appropriate relief with the Supreme Court. The PSC later concluded Unit 3 was not used and useful and could not be included in the rate base. The Supreme Court found that while the Siting Act includes factors which can be associated with the used and useful concept of utility regulation, the primary purposes of the Siting Act are to ensure minimal environmental, natural resource, and social impacts. The need determination is related primarily to environmental protection rather than rate base treatment for the facility. Once the facility is constructed, the PSC has jurisdiction to determine whether the facility is actually used and useful and whether the facility's output is required by the ratepayers. The Siting Act and the utility regulation statutes are reconcilable. The Siting Act did not impliedly repeal the PSC's authority to determine whether a facility is used and useful for ratemaking. Mont. Power Co. v. P.S.C., 214 M 82, 692 P2d 432, 41 St. Rep. 2332 (1984).

Constitutionality of Initiative: Initiative 80, amending 75-20-201 to provide for voter approval before issuance of a certificate for a nuclear facility, is not unconstitutional on its face. State ex rel. Wenzel v. Murray, 178 M 441, 585 P2d 633, 35 St. Rep. 1422 (1978).

The reference to the Department of Revenue was changed pursuant to the authority of sec. 62, Ch. 16, L. 1991, which allows the Code Commissioner to correct erroneous references. Amendment effective July 1, 1991.

1987 Amendment: In (1)(a)(i), before "location", inserted "proposed"; in (1)(a)(iv), at beginning of subsection, inserted introductory clause, before "facility" deleted "proposed", and at end of subsection, before "proposed location", deleted "primary"; in (1)(a)(v)(A) inserted introductory clause; inserted (1)(a)(v)(B) requiring baseline data, along with acceptable alternative locations, to be included in application for crude oil and gas refineries, facilities subject to The Montana Strip and Underground Mine Reclamation Act, facility using geothermal resources, and facility designed for situ gasification of coal; in (3), near end of subsection after "facility", substituted "is proposed or is alternatively proposed to be located" for "may be located, both as primarily and as alternatively proposed"; and in (5), after "area", deleted "or alternative areas" and after "facility" substituted "is proposed or is alternatively proposed to be located" for "may be located".

1981 Amendments: Chapter 274 substituted "department of commerce" for "department of community affairs" in (3)(e).

Chapter 539 substituted "for the permits required under the laws administered by the department of health and the board of health" for "for the permits required by state air and water quality laws" in (1)(a); and substituted "as the board and board of health by order or rule or the department and department of health by order or rule may require" for "as the board and board of health by rule or the department and department of health by order require" at the end of (1)(a)(vii).

Composite Section: This section was amended by Ch. 553 and Ch. 676, L. 1979, and a composite section was prepared by the Code Commissioner, 1979. Subsection (3) regarding persons and agencies to be served with a copy of an application was amended by both of the above chapters. Ch. 676 deleted "chief executive officer of each" but the Code Commissioner reinserted this phrase to incorporate the change by Ch. 553 from "municipality" to "unit of local government".

Waiver of Baseline Data Requirement if Existing Contract: Section 26, Ch. 676, L. 1979, provided: "The department may in its discretion waive the requirement that baseline data for the primary and reasonable alternate locations be submitted with an application under 75-20-211(1)(a)(v) in those cases in which the applicant has, prior to July 1, 1979, entered into a contract with the department to compile baseline information."

Case Notes

No Violation of Clear Legal Duty to Consult With County Under MEPA — Writ of Mandamus and Injunction Improper — Action Against DEQ Dismissed: After an exchange of information between the Department of Environmental Quality (DEQ) and Jefferson County about the Mountain States Transmission Intertie (MSTI), a proposed electric transmission line that would transect Jefferson County, the county filed a petition for a writ of mandamus and injunctive relief seeking to compel DEQ to satisfy its legal duty under the Montana Environmental Protection Act (MEPA) to consult with local government prior to issuing a draft Environmental Impact Statement (EIS) and to enjoin DEQ from issuing the draft EIS until after it had complied with its duty to consult. After a series of evidentiary hearings, the District Court concluded that DEQ had not satisfied its duty to consult with the county under MEPA and enjoined it from issuing a draft EIS on the MSTI project until DEQ had more thoroughly consulted with the county, and DEQ appealed. The Supreme Court concluded that the District Court had erred in issuing a writ of mandamus to compel DEQ to more thoroughly consult with the county because MEPA does not establish a clear legal duty for DEQ to consult with a local government to any specified degree. It also ruled that the writ of mandamus was improper because the county had other remedies available to it once DEQ rendered a final decision on the project. Because neither MEPA nor related regulations define the word "consult," DEQ is afforded some discretion in determining the extent to which it consults with a local government under 75-1-104. Because MEPA allows for some discretion on the part of DEQ on how to consult with local government, the Supreme Court held the requirement to consult was not ministerial and therefore did not establish a clear legal duty under MEPA. Accordingly, the Supreme Court remanded the matter to the District Court with instructions to dismiss without prejudice. Jefferson County v. Dept. of Environmental Quality, 2011 MT 265, 362 Mont. 311, 264 P.3d 715.

Part 3
Decisions

Part Case Notes

Issuance of Certificate of Environmental Compatibility and Public Need — No District Court Jurisdiction to Determine Public Necessity: Once a certificate of environmental compatibility and public need was issued by the Board of Natural Resources and Conservation (now Board of Environmental Review), the District Court had no jurisdiction to determine the existence of public necessity with respect to a proposed electric transmission line under the Montana Utility Siting Act of 1973 (now the Montana Major Facility Siting Act) since that determination had already been made by the Board pursuant to the Act. Mont. Power Co. v. Fondren, 226 M 500, 737 P2d 1138, 44 St. Rep. 850 (1987).

Limitation of Court Jurisdiction in Centerline Determination and Eminent Domain — Noncontested Case Procedure: The Legislature did not intend the final electric transmission line centerline determination by the Board of Natural Resources and Conservation (now Board of Environmental Review) to be subject to judicial review, and once the Board sets the specific route, no court has jurisdiction to hear challenges to the location. Through enactment of 75-20-205(2) (now repealed) and 75-20-407, court jurisdiction in eminent domain cases was limited to hearing challenges to the necessity of taking private property. The preponderance of the evidence on 70-30-111 findings that must be proven to the court before a preliminary condemnation order is issued is satisfied by appending to the complaint the Board's certificate of environmental compatibility and public need and the Board's findings of fact, opinion, decision, order, and recommendations. In cases where landowners feel conditions of the certificate were breached, proper remedy lies in a mandamus action under 75-20-404. Mont. Power Co. v. Fondren, 226 M 500, 737 P2d 1138, 44 St. Rep. 850 (1987).

2011 Amendment: Chapter 382 in (1)(h) substituted current language for "that the use of public lands for location of the facility was evaluated and public lands were selected whenever their use is as economically practicable as the use of private lands". Amendment effective May 12, 2011.

Applicability: Section 5, Ch. 382, L. 2011, provided: "[This act] applies to applications for a certificate under the Major Facility Siting Act filed on or after [the effective date of this act]." Effective May 12, 2011.

2003 Amendments — Composite Section: Chapter 114 in (4) substituted "75-20-104" for "77-20-104(8)"; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective October 1, 2003.

Chapter 217 in (3)(a) at end after "impacts;" substituted "and" for "or"; in (3)(b) at end after "terms" substituted "will not result in" for "do not pose any threat of serious injury or damage to"; in (3)(b)(i) at beginning inserted "a violation of a law or standard that protects"; deleted former (3)(b)(ii) that read: "(ii) the social and economic conditions of inhabitants of the affected area"; in (3)(b)(ii) substituted "a violation of a law or standard that protects the public health and safety" for "the health, safety, or welfare of area inhabitants"; in (4) near beginning after "defined in" substituted "75-20-104" for "77-20-104(8)"; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective April 3, 2003.

Saving Clause: Section 19, Ch. 217, L. 2003, was a saving clause.
Severability: Section 20, Ch. 217, L. 2003, was a severability clause.

2001 Amendment: Chapter 293 in (1) and (3) decreased facility approval time after issuing report from 45 days to 30 days; in (1) substituted "75-20-104(8)(a) and (8)(b)" for "75-20-104(8)(c) and (8)(d)"; in (3) substituted "a facility defined in 75-20-104(8)(c)" for "facilities defined in 75-20-104(8)(a), (8)(b), and (8)(e) through (8)(g)"; deleted former (4) and (5) that read: "(4) To be considered an alternative to a proposed facility defined in 75-20-104(8)(a) and (8)(b), the alternative must:

(a) meet the objective of the applicant's proposal;
(b) be available to the applicant; and
(c) be reasonable and specific to the applicant's proposed site.

(5) Consideration of alternatives for facilities defined in 75-20-104(8)(c) and (8)(d) may not be a basis for requiring considerations of alternative sites for facilities defined in 75-20-104(8)(a) and (8)(b)"; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective April 20, 2001.

Saving Clause: Section 15, Ch. 293, L. 2001, was a saving clause.

1997 Amendment: Chapter 329 deleted former (1) that read: "Within 60 days after submission of the recommended decision by the hearing examiner, the board shall make complete findings, issue an opinion, and render a decision upon the record, either granting or denying the application as filed or granting it upon the terms, conditions, or modifications of the construction, operation, or maintenance of the facility that the board considers appropriate"; in (1) substituted present language concerning Department approval for "The board may not grant a certificate unless it finds and determines"; deleted former (2)(d) that read: "(d) each of the criteria listed in 75-20-503"; in (1)(e) substituted "department" for "board"; in (1)(h), at end, deleted "and compatible with the environmental criteria listed in 75-20-503"; in (2) substituted "department" for "board"; deleted former (4) that read: "(4) Considerations of need, public need, or public convenience and necessity and demonstration thereof by the applicant apply only to utility facilities described in 75-20-104(8)(a)(i), (8)(b), (8)(c), and (8)(d)"; inserted (3) relating to approval within 45 days; inserted (4) relating to being considered an alternative; inserted (5) relating to consideration of separate alternatives; inserted (6) relating to denial of certificate if findings cannot be made; adjusted subsection references; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective July 1, 1997.

Applicability: Section 26, Ch. 329, L. 1997 provided: "A person who, prior to January 1, 1997, has filed a correct and complete air quality permit application with the department of environmental quality for a power plant capable of generating less than 150 megawatts is not subject to the provisions of Title 75, chapter 20."

1995 Amendments — Composite Section: Chapter 418 in (2)(h) substituted "department or board has issued any necessary air or water quality" for "department of health or board of health have issued a"; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective July 1, 1995.

Chapter 583 in (2), after "certificate", deleted "either as proposed by the applicant or as modified by the board"; in (4), at end, inserted "described in 75-20-104(10)(a)(i), (10)(b), (10)(c), and (10)(d)"; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective May 1, 1995.

The codifier has reflected the correct subsection reference.

Style changes in the chapters were slightly different. In each case, the codifier chose the most appropriate.

Transition: Section 499, Ch. 418, L. 1995, provided: "The provisions of 2-15-131 through 2-15-137 apply to [this act]."

Saving Clause: Section 503, Ch. 418, L. 1995, was a saving clause.

Applicability: Section 12, Ch. 583, L. 1995, provided: "(1) A person who, between [the effective date of this act] [May 1, 1995] and June 30, 1997, has submitted a correct and complete application for all applicable air and water quality permits from the department of health and environmental sciences [now department of environmental quality] or has commenced to construct or commenced or applied to upgrade a power plant that has been designed for or will be capable of generating less than 150 megawatts is not subject to the provisions of Title 75, chapter 20.

(2) A person who, between [the effective date of this act] [May 1, 1995] and June 30, 1997, has filed an application for all applicable air and water quality permits from the department of health and environmental sciences [now department of environmental quality] for a power plant capable of generating less than 150 megawatts is not subject to the provisions of Title 75, chapter 20, if the application is correct and complete as of October 1, 1997."

1987 Amendment: In (2)(c), after "facility", substituted "minimizes" for "represents the minimum".

1987 Statement of Intent: The statement of intent attached to Ch. 312, L. 1987, provided: "A statement of intent is required for this bill in order to provide guidance to the board of natural resources and conservation [now board of environmental review] concerning the board's authority to make rules on the provisions of the Montana Major Facility Siting Act that are affected by this bill.

Section 5 [75-20-301] amends the board's decision standard concerning adverse environmental impact. The term "minimizes" is substituted for the existing qualifying phrase "represents the minimum". This amendment is consistent with the historical practice and interpretation of the board in carrying out its functions under the siting act. It is the intent of the legislature that the board's rules and regulations in effect at the time of the enactment of this bill represent reasonable rules implementing and interpreting the decision standard as amended by this bill."

Case Notes

No Violation of Clear Legal Duty to Consult With County Under MEPA — Writ of Mandamus and Injunction Improper — Action Against DEQ Dismissed: After an exchange of information between the Department of Environmental Quality (DEQ) and Jefferson County about the Mountain States Transmission Intertie (MSTI), a proposed electric transmission line that would transect Jefferson County, the county filed a petition for a writ of mandamus and injunctive relief seeking to compel DEQ to satisfy its legal duty under the Montana Environmental Protection Act (MEPA) to consult with local government prior to issuing a draft Environmental Impact Statement (EIS) and to enjoin DEQ from issuing the draft EIS until after it had complied with its duty to consult. After a series of evidentiary hearings, the District Court concluded that DEQ had not satisfied its duty to consult with the county under MEPA and enjoined it from issuing a draft EIS on the MSTI project until DEQ had more thoroughly consulted with the county, and DEQ appealed. The Supreme Court concluded that the District Court had erred in issuing a writ of mandamus to compel DEQ to more thoroughly consult with the county because MEPA does not establish a clear legal duty for DEQ to consult with a local government to any specified degree. It also ruled that the writ of mandamus was improper because the county had other remedies available to it once DEQ rendered a final decision on the project. Because neither MEPA nor related regulations define the word "consult," DEQ is afforded some discretion in determining the extent to which it consults with a local government under 75-1-104. Because MEPA allows for some discretion on the part of DEQ on how to consult with local government, the Supreme Court held the requirement to consult was not ministerial and therefore did not establish a clear legal duty under MEPA. Accordingly, the Supreme Court remanded the matter to the District Court with instructions to dismiss without prejudice. Jefferson County v. Dept. of Environmental Quality, 2011 MT 265, 362 Mont. 311, 264 P.3d 715.

Siting Act Not Implied Repeal of "Used and Useful" for Ratemaking: In 1973, Montana Power Company (MPC) filed an application for a certificate of environmental compatibility and public need for Colstrip Units 3 and 4 under the Montana Major Facility Siting Act. In granting the certificate, the Board of Natural Resources and Conservation (now Board of Environmental Review) found that there was a need for the energy which would be produced and that the units would serve the public interest, convenience, and necessity. After Unit 3 was completed, MPC filed an application with the Public Service Commission (PSC) to increase electric rates to reflect Unit 3 in its rate base. At the rate hearing, the PSC took evidence regarding whether Unit 3 was "used and useful". MPC moved to strike this testimony, contending the PSC was precluded from considering this by the certificate of need issued under the Siting Act. MPC filed an application for original jurisdiction and declaratory judgment or other appropriate relief with the Supreme Court. The PSC later concluded Unit 3 was not used and useful and could not be included in the rate base. The Supreme Court found that while the Siting Act includes factors which can be associated with the used and useful concept of utility regulation, the primary purposes of the Siting Act are to ensure minimal environmental, natural resource, and social impacts. The need determination is related primarily to environmental protection rather than rate base treatment for the facility. Once the facility is constructed, the PSC has jurisdiction to determine whether the facility is actually used and useful and whether the facility's output is required by the ratepayers. The Siting Act and the utility regulation statutes are reconcilable. The Siting Act did not impliedly repeal the PSC's authority to determine whether a facility is used and useful for ratemaking. Mont. Power Co. v. P.S.C., 214 M 82, 692 P2d 432, 41 St. Rep. 2332 (1984).

Bias of Hearing Officer Alleged to Deny Fair Hearing — No Prejudice Shown: The Board of Natural Resources and Conservation (now Board of Environmental Review) issued a certificate of environmental compatibility and public need under the Montana Utility Siting Act of 1973 (now the Montana Major Facility Siting Act of 1975). The plaintiff environmental association alleged the denial of its constitutional right to fair hearing as a result of the alleged prejudice of attorney Sabol, hearing officer and member of the Board. The Supreme Court found no denial of the plaintiff's constitutional right because: (1) Sabol's connection with another ski resort that might seek a certificate in the future was such as to make the plaintiff's claim of prejudice no more than tenuous; (2) any bias reflected in Sabol's comments to a newspaper reporter about the tactics of the plaintiff was not reflected at a hearing almost 2 months later; (3) directions to the defendant's counsel from Sabol to limit the scope of cross-examination were consistent with the fact that the parties took similar positions on the issue then in question; (4) even if Sabol was prejudiced he had either relinquished his position as hearing officer or was no longer serving on the Board itself when a decision was recommended to the Board and the Board acted on that recommendation; and (5) 75-20-220 (now repealed), specifying that a hearing officer may not be a member of the Board is inapplicable to this case because that section was enacted in 1975 and this case was tried under the law as passed in 1973. Mont. Wilderness Ass'n v. Bd. of Natural Resources and Conserv., 200 M 11, 648 P2d 734, 39 St. Rep. 1238 (1982).

Certificate of Need — Findings and Conclusions in Compliance With Law: After making findings of fact and conclusions of law under this chapter, the Board of Natural Resources and Conservation (now Board of Environmental Review) issued a certificate of environmental compatibility and public need. The Supreme Court upheld the legal sufficiency of those findings and conclusions. In accordance with Mont. Consumer Counsel v. P.S.C. & Mont. Power Co., 168 M 180, 541 P2d 770 (1975), separate, express rulings on each proposed finding of fact are not required by 2-4-623(4) as long as the agency's decision and order are clear. The court also held that there was sufficient compliance with 2-4-623(1) because the findings of fact were factually supported when viewed as a whole and that there was sufficient compliance with 2-4-623(4) because the conclusions of law, while not followed immediately by an authority or opinion, were sufficiently supported by reasoned opinion to render their basis reasonably ascertainable. Mont. Wilderness Ass'n v. Bd. of Natural Resources and Conserv., 200 M 11, 648 P2d 734, 39 St. Rep. 1238 (1982).

Certificate of Need — Findings, Conclusions, and Certificate Supported by Substantial Evidence: Following completion of an environmental impact statement under the Montana Environmental Policy Act, the Board of Natural Resources and Conservation (now Board of Environmental Review) issued a certificate of environmental compatibility and public need for the construction of a powerline. The Supreme Court upheld the judgment of the District Court that there was substantial evidence supporting the Board's findings that a need for the powerline existed and that conservation measures and alternative energy sources would not reduce the need for the powerline so as to make its construction unnecessary. Mont. Wilderness Ass'n v. Bd. of Natural Resources and Conserv., 200 M 11, 648 P2d 734, 39 St. Rep. 1238 (1982).

Department or Board Determination Final: A Department or Board of Health and Environmental Sciences (now Department of Environmental Quality or Board of Environmental Review) order under this section concerning satisfaction of federal and state air and water quality standards is not interlocutory or preliminary but is final for all purposes and as such is appealable under 2-4-702 of the Montana Administrative Procedure Act and is binding on the Board of Natural Resources (now Board of Environmental Review). N. Plains Resource Council v. Bd. of Natural Resources & Conservation, 181 M 500, 594 P2d 297, 36 St. Rep. 666 (1979).

Specific Findings and Consideration of Clearcut Alternatives Required: The "minimum adverse environmental impact" test required by this section must be accompanied by a "precise and explicit statement of the underlying facts supporting the findings" as provided by 2-4-623 of the Montana Administrative Procedure Act. The Board of Natural Resources and Conservation (now Board of Environmental Review) in determining this impact must also consider clearcut alternatives in the evidence available to the applicant. In this case the Board failed to make adequate findings of fact and conclusions of law regarding which of two types of coal would represent minimum environmental impact and regarding whether mine-mouth generation, as opposed to load-center generation, would represent minimum environmental impact. (See 1987 amendment.) N. Plains Resource Council v. Bd. of Natural Resources & Conservation, 181 M 500, 594 P2d 297, 36 St. Rep. 666 (1979).

(2) It is the intent of the legislature that the grant of authority to the board referred to in subsection (1) not be construed to limit, alter, or otherwise affect the authority of the Montana public service commission to determine under 69-3-109 whether any facility is "actually used and useful for the convenience of the public"."

Case Notes

Legal Sufficiency of Certificate — Incorporation by Reference of Findings, Conclusions, and Order: The Board of Natural Resources and Conservation (now Board of Environmental Review) issued a certificate not strictly in accordance with the requirements of this section. The Supreme Court held the certificate legally sufficient because the certificate expressly incorporated by reference the findings, conclusions, and order of the Board, which, taken together with the certificate, fulfilled the requirements of this section. Mont. Wilderness Ass'n v. Bd. of Natural Resources and Conserv., 200 M 11, 648 P2d 734, 39 St. Rep. 1238 (1982).

Sufficiency of Environmental Impact Statement — Failure to Consider Alternatives — Failure to Prepare Cost Benefit Analysis: Following the completion of an environmental impact statement under the provisions of the Montana Environmental Policy Act (MEPA), the Board of Natural Resources and Conservation (now Board of Environmental Review) issued a certificate pursuant to this section for the construction of a powerline. The Supreme Court affirmed the holding of the District Court that the impact statement sufficiently considered the alternative of "no action" and that neither the siting act nor MEPA explicitly requires a formal, mathematically expressed cost/benefit analysis. The language of the impact statement makes clear that the "no action" alternative was considered and rejected and that the relative costs and benefits of the proposed powerline were considered in the impact statement. Mont. Wilderness Ass'n v. Bd. of Natural Resources and Conserv., 200 M 11, 648 P2d 734, 39 St. Rep. 1238 (1982).

Meaning of "Construction Commenced": When a power company cleared land, constructed towers and placed steel static wire on them, and ordered and stockpiled poles for the completion of a power transmission line, there was a commencement of construction prior to January 1, 1973. Bd. of Natural Resources & Conservation v. Mont. Power Co., 166 M 522, 536 P2d 758 (1975).

2001 Amendment: Chapter 293 in (5) substituted "75-20-104(8)(a) or (8)(b)" for "75-20-104(8)(c), (8)(d), (8)(e), or (8)(f)" and after "75-20-104(3)" deleted "or for any portion of or process in a facility defined in 75-20-104(8)(a) or (8)(b) to the extent that the process or portion of the facility is not subject to an air or water quality permit issued by the department". Amendment effective April 20, 2001.

1997 Amendments: Chapter 42 in (3), after "75-20-216(3)", deleted "and 75-20-303(3)(a)(iv)"; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective March 12, 1997.

Chapter 329 in (1), (2), (3), (6), and (7) substituted "department" for "board"; in (1), in two places after "75-20-216", deleted "through 75-20-222, 75-20-501"; in (3) substituted references to 75-20-301(1)(c), (2)(b), and (2)(c) for references to 75-20-301(2)(c), (3)(b), and (3)(c) and references to 75-20-211(1)(a)(iii) and (1)(a)(iv) for references to 75-20-211(1)(a)(iv) and (1)(a)(v) and after "75-20-216(3)" deleted "and 75-20-303(3)(a)(iv)"; in (5), in first reference to 75-20-104, substituted "(8)(c), (8)(d), (8)(e), or (8)(f)" for "(8)(b), (8)(c), (8)(d), or (8)(e)", after "75-20-104(8)(a)" inserted "or (8)(b)", and at end deleted "or board"; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective July 1, 1997.

Applicability: Section 26, Ch. 329, L. 1997 provided: "A person who, prior to January 1, 1997, has filed a correct and complete air quality permit application with the department of environmental quality for a power plant capable of generating less than 150 megawatts is not subject to the provisions of Title 75, chapter 20."

1995 Amendments — Composite Section: Chapter 418 in (5) substituted references to 75-20-104(8) for references to 75-20-104(10) and after "subject to" substituted "an air or water quality permit issued by the department or board" for "a permit issued by the department of health or board of health"; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective July 1, 1995.

Chapter 546 in (5) substituted "75-20-104(9)(b), (9)(c), (9)(d), or (9)(e)" for "subsections (10)(b), (c), (d), or (e) of 75-20-104", substituted "75-20-104(9)(a)" for subsection (10)(a) of 75-20-104", and at end, after "department of health", deleted "or board of health"; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective July 1, 1995.

The codifier has reflected the correct subsection reference.

Because Ch. 418 created a Board of Environmental Review and Ch. 546 eliminated the Board of Health and Environmental Sciences, the Code Commissioner has retained the reference to the Board of Environmental Review.

Section 571, Ch. 546, L. 1995, was a saving clause.

1993 Amendment: Chapter 157 in (3), near beginning after "75-20-301", deleted "and 75-20-501(5)". Amendment effective July 1, 1993.

1993 Statement of Intent: The statement of intent attached to Ch. 157, L. 1993, provided: "A statement of intent is required for this bill because [section 4] [69-3-1204] grants the public service commission rulemaking authority to adopt guidelines for an electric or natural gas utility to follow in compiling an integrated least-cost resource plan. It is the intent of the legislature that the rules not apply to rural electric cooperatives. It is also the intent of the legislature that the rules preserve the "used and useful" ratemaking standard. The rules are not intended to allow the commission to preapprove any resource use proposed in a plan. [Section 5] [69-3-1205] does not require coordination between the commission and the department of natural resources and conservation regarding their respective planning requirements. However, it is the intent of the legislature that the department and other state agencies share with the commission their expertise on environmental impacts of a utility's planned resource acquisitions. [Section 6] [69-3-1206] addresses commission rate treatment. The commission may include costs resulting from an integrated least-cost resource plan in a utility's rates."

1987 Amendment: In (5), near middle of subsection, substituted "75-20-104(3)" for "subsection (3) of 75-20-104".

1981 Amendment: Added (3) through (7) relating to a required waiver of certification proceedings upon a showing by the applicant that the proposed facility will be constructed in a county where a single employer has permanently ceased operations causing a loss of 250 or more permanent jobs within 2 years within the preceding 10-year period, a showing of beneficial economic effects of the proposed facility, and payment of all expenses by the applicant.

Case Notes

Limitation of Court Jurisdiction in Centerline Determination and Eminent Domain — Noncontested Case Procedure: The Legislature did not intend the final electric transmission line centerline determination by the Board of Natural Resources and Conservation (now Board of Environmental Review) to be subject to judicial review, and once the Board sets the specific route, no court has jurisdiction to hear challenges to the location. Through enactment of 75-20-205(2) (now repealed) and 75-20-407, court jurisdiction in eminent domain cases was limited to hearing challenges to the necessity of taking private property. The preponderance of the evidence on 70-30-111 findings that must be proven to the court before a preliminary condemnation order is issued is satisfied by appending to the complaint the Board's certificate of environmental compatibility and public need and the Board's findings of fact, opinion, decision, order, and recommendations. In cases where landowners feel conditions of the certificate were breached, proper remedy lies in a mandamus action under this section. Mont. Power Co. v. Fondren, 226 M 500, 737 P2d 1138, 44 St. Rep. 850 (1987).

75-20-407. Jurisdiction of courts restricted.

Case Notes

Issuance of Certificate of Environmental Compatibility and Public Need — No District Court Jurisdiction to Determine Public Necessity: Once a certificate of environmental compatibility and public need was issued by the Board of Natural Resources and Conservation (now Board of Environmental Review), the District Court had no jurisdiction to determine the existence of public necessity with respect to a proposed electric transmission line under the Montana Utility Siting Act of 1973 (now the Montana Major Facility Siting Act) since that determination had already been made by the Board pursuant to the Act.
